THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE

SECOND SESSION OF THE THIRTY-SIXTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND.
TWENTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HIS MAJESTY KING GEORGE V.

FIFTH SERIES—VOLUME 275

FOURTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1932–33

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 27*th February*, 1933.

The House met at a Quarter before Three of the Clock, MR. SPEAKER in the Chair.

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

INDIA.

RAILWAY ORDERS.

1. Sir WILLIAM DAVISON asked the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that tenders have been invited by the Indian state railways for 62 boilers and fittings and 62 sets of cylinders; and whether any steps are being taken by the British Government to secure the placing of these orders in this country, in view of the unemployment which at present exists in the locomotive industry?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. Butler): The orders referred to by my hon. Friend are being placed by the Indian authorities. As regards the second part of the question I would refer to the reply given on 30th November to my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich (Mr. A. Ramsay) and the other statements that have been made in this House regarding the practice in the matter of placing contracts for Indian railway stores.

Sir W. DAVISON: Seeing that the capital upon which these railways were built was provided by Great Britain, does not the hon. Member consider it desirable that representations should be made in order that equipment and repairs should also come to this country?

Sir NAIRNE STEWART SANDEMAN: Would it not be cheaper to subsidise the companies who are making these engines instead of paying the dole?

RAILWAY BOARD (INDIAN MEMBERS).

8. Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India will consider the advisability of appointing an Indian to the position of secretary to the railway board in India; and what is the present number of Indian members of the board?

Mr. BUTLER: The appointment of Secretary to the Railway Board is a matter within the discretion of the Government of India. Of the three members of the Railway Board one is at present an Indian.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Does not the hon. Member think it is worth while making representations to the Government of India on this subject?

Mr. BUTLER: In the original answer I have said that this matter is within their discretion.

RAIYA RIOT CASE.

9. Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for India what action the Government of India proposes to take with regard to the strictures passed by the High Court upon the administration of justice in the lower courts in which the Raiya communal riot case was heard?

Mr. BUTLER: I have no information as to any instructions which the Government of the United Provinces may have issued or propose to issue in consequence of the judgment in this case.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Will the hon. Member make inquiries in order to make himself acquainted, so that he can express an opinion later on?

Mr. BUTLER: Our only information on this subject, hitherto, has been from the Press, but I can assure the hon. Member that any official notice of this matter will receive our earnest consideration.

MILITARY ACADEMY (NOMINATIONS).

2. Mr. HICKS (for Mr. RHYS DAVIES) asked the Secretary of State for India whether any nominations have been made during the past year by the commander-in-chief of non-commissioned Indian soldiers for admission to the Indian military academy; and what proportion of the nominations came under the head of martial and non-martial communities, respectively?

Mr. BUTLER: Yes, Sir, I understand the number was 15. I have no details of the communities from which these cadets were drawn.

COMMUNAL REPRESENTATION.

3. Mr. DAVID GRENFELL (for Dr. JOHN WILLIAMS) asked the Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India have yet reached a decision, and, if so, what is its nature, with reference to the question of communal representation in the provincial and all-India services?

Mr. BUTLER: One-third of the vacancies in the all-India and central services which are filled by Indians are reserved for members of the minority communities. No modification of these arrangements is contemplated. It is for the various Provincial Governments to decide to what extent and in what manner representation of the minority communities shall be secured in the provincial services. If the hon. Member has in mind any possible alteration of the position after constitutional changes have been effected, I would ask him to await the forthcoming White Paper.

ALWAR.

4. Mr. D. GRENFELL (for Dr. J. WILLIAMS) asked the Secretary of State for India whether the services of any member of the Indian Civil Service have been requisitioned for use in the State of Alwar for revenue purposes; and, if so, what will be the nature of his duties?

Mr. BUTLER: An Indian Civil Service officer, who is a member of the Indian Political Department, is being lent to the Alwar Darbar to hold the appointment of Prime Minister and Revenue Minister. He will exercise control over all Departments within the State, and questions from all Departments which require to be referred to His Highness will be referred through the Prime Minister.

11. Mr. T. WILLIAMS (for Major MILNER) asked the Secretary of State for India what is the number of persons who have been arrested in British India in connection with the Alwar Meo movement; and what procedure has been followed in connection with their trial?

Mr. BUTLER: The reports received by me contain no mention of arrests made in British India in this connection. Any persons that may have been arrested there would be tried by the ordinary courts.

COMMODITY PRICES.

5. Mr. D. GRENFELL asked the Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India will consider the advisability, in connection with the forthcoming Budget, of taking steps with a view to securing a rise in the level of prices of Indian commodities?

Mr. BUTLER: While the Government of India would greatly welcome a rise in the level of the world price of Indian commodities, I am not aware of the measures in connection with the Budget that the hon. Member may have in mind for achieving this end.

RESERVE BANK.

6. Mr. D. GRENFELL asked the Secretary of State for India whether it is the intention of the Government of India to introduce the Reserve Bank Bill into the legislative assembly during the ensuing session; and, if so, whether Indian opinion will be consulted before the Bill is introduced?

Mr. BUTLER: I am not in a position to state when the Bill for setting up a Reserve Bank in India will be introduced into the Indian Legislature though, as the hon. Member will have realised from the references to the subject on pages 37-38 and 143 of the Round Table Conference Blue Book Cmd. 4238, the Government are anxious to bring a Reserve Bank into operation as early as practicable. From the passages to which I have referred, the hon. Member will see that my right hon. Friend has undertaken

> "that representative Indian opinion would be consulted in the preparation of proposals for the establishment of the Reserve Bank."

BANGALORE STATION.

7. Mr. HICKS (for Mr. RHYS DAVIES) asked the Secretary of State for India whether the Mysore durbar's case for retrocession of the Bangalore civil and military station has been considered by His Majesty's Government and by the Government of India; whether any decision has been arrived at on the matter; and when an announcement on the matter may be expected?

Mr. BUTLER: The question has not up to the present come before His Majesty's Government for consideration, and I am not in a position to make any further statement on the subject.

PROVINCIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCILS.

10. Mr. T. WILLIAMS (for Major MILNER) asked the Secretary of State for India which of the provincial legislative councils in India have come to a decision with reference to the desirability or otherwise of a second chamber as part of their constitutional machinery; and what is the nature of the decision in each case?

Mr. BUTLER: Resolutions in favour of a provincial upper chamber have been passed by the legislatures in the United Provinces and Bihar and Orissa; resolutions against by the legislatures in Madras, Bengal, Punjab, Central Provinces, Assam and North-West Frontier Province.

BERAR.

12. Mr. T. WILLIAMS (for Major MILNER) asked the Secretary of State for India what steps the Government of India propose to take to give effect to their assurance that the wishes of the people of Berar will be taken into consideration before any decision is taken with regard to the constitutional future of Berar?

Mr. BUTLER: I am not in a position to add anything to the reply given on the 13th February to the question of the hon. Member for West Walthamstow (Mr. McEntee), in which my right hon. Friend stated the purport of the assurance given.

BURMA.

13. Mr. TINKER (for Mr. PARKINSON) asked the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the legislative council of Burma passed a resolution in favour of suspending the annual migration of the Government of Burma to Maymyo, as a measure of economy; and whether the Government of India are prepared to meet the views of the legislative council?

Mr. BUTLER: This is a matter for the Government of Burma, as to whose intentions I have, as my right hon. Friend stated last week, no information.

ALL-INDIA MEDICAL COUNCIL BILL.

14. Mr. TINKER (for Mr. PARKINSON) asked the Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India will consider the advisability of delaying the introduction of the All-India Medical Council Bill until such time as the Federal Legislature has been constituted?

Mr. BUTLER: The Bill has already been introduced.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

RUSSIA.

15. Sir W. DAVISON asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will assure the House that no binding trading agreement will be entered into by the British Government with the

[Sir W. Davison.]
Russian Soviet Government until this House has had an opportunity of seeing a draft of any proposed agreement and has expressed its approval?

The SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir John Simon): It would not be in accordance with constitutional practice for any such agreement to be submitted to the House in draft for consideration prior to signature. Any agreement, however, which is subject to ratification will be laid before the House prior to ratification in the usual manner.

Sir W. DAVISON: In view of the desirability of the House being seized of what is in contemplation, will the right hon. Gentleman consider the publication of a White Paper setting out the matters proposed to be dealt with in such agreements, so that the House can discuss the matter?

Sir J. SIMON: That is the same question in a different form, and, as I have said, it would not be in accordance with constitutional practice to submit to the House in draft an agreement before it is signed.

DUTCH MILK PRODUCTS (IMPORTS).

23. Sir PERCY HURD asked the Secretary to the Overseas Trade Department if he has any information as to whether any assistance, direct or indirect, and, if so, what, is given to the exportation of Dutch milk products to the British market by the Government or otherwise?

The SECRETARY for MINES (Mr. Ernest Brown): I have been asked to reply. Under the Dairy Farmers Relief Act passed by the Netherlands Government in 1932, a surcharge is levied on all butter, cheese and whole-milk products and also on margarine and cooking fats consumed in the Netherlands. The surcharges are fixed from time to time according to market conditions by a special body set up under the Act. The sums derived from the surcharges are used to subsidise producers' milk prices. I understand that for convenience in administration the surcharge on butter is levied on all creamery butter whether sold for home consumption or for export, but a drawback equal to the surcharge is subsequently allowed on all exports of butter.

Sir P. HURD: The net effect is that substantial assistance is given to exports to this country?

Mr. BROWN: I do not understand that that is the case. I understand that the payments do not have the effect of a subsidy in the sense of allowing products to be sold below the world market price. The position is that the internal price is kept at an artificial high level, and in order that those who export are not penalised they are given the difference between the world price of exports and the home price.

JUTE WRAPPERS (MEAT IMPORTS).

24. Miss HORSBRUGH asked the Secretary to the Overseas Trade Department what percentage of meat imported into this country from the Argentine during 1931 and 1932 was in jute wrappers manufactured in the United Kingdom?

Mr. E. BROWN: I regret that the information desired is not available.

Miss HORSBRUGH: Will the hon. Member ascertain whether this information can be obtained in order that this trade may be dealt with on the same lines as the Danish bacon trade?

Mr. BROWN: One of the difficulties is that the Customs do not record the quantities or origin of coverings used for meat.

BRITISH INDUSTRIES FAIR.

25. Mr. BARCLAY-HARVEY asked the Secretary to the Overseas Trade Department if, in view of the fact that notices advertising the British Industries Fair were this year exhibited in English in foreign countries, he will arrange that in future they appear in the language of the country in which they are exhibited?

Mr. E. BROWN: Every effort has been made to avoid the complaint to which my hon. Friend refers. Such Press advertisements as were used abroad were, except possibly in the Journals of overseas British Chambers of Commerce, printed in the language of the country concerned. The same applies to posters and other printed matter which were issued in ten languages as in previous years. If the hon. Member has any specific case in mind I shall be obliged if he will bring it to my notice.

BED COVERINGS (IMPORTS).

38. Mr. CROSS asked the President of the Board of Trade the quantities and values of cotton blankets, quilts, counterpanes, and other bed coverings imported into this country in each quarter of the year 1932?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the BOARD of TRADE (Dr. Burgin): Imports of these goods are recorded by value only. The declared value of the total imports into the United Kingdom of quilts, counterpanes and other bed coverings of cotton, including cotton blankets, registered during the first, second, third and fourth quarters of 1932 amounted to £4,122, £8,956, £26,708, and £37,582, respectively.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

16, Mr. DONNER asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is in a position to make a statement with regard to the situation in Manchukuo, and particularly with regard to the military position in Jehol?

Sir J. SIMON: As regards the military situation in Jehol, my information is that Kailu was occupied on the 24th of February by Japanese and Manchukuo troops who continued to advance in a south-westerly direction. About 12,000 Chinese troops are stated by the Japanese authorities to have surrendered on the 21st of February, in the above district. The town of Peipiao was occupied on the 21st of February.

20. Mr. COCKS asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the fact that in February, 1932, the British Ambassador at Tokio was officially informed that the Japanese Government was no more likely to recognise the State of Manchukuo than any other Government and that subsequent British policy was influenced by this declaration, and seeing that in spite of this the Japanese Government proceeded to recognise Manchukuo, any protest has been made by the British Government against this conduct and action?

Sir J. SIMON: I do not know in what way it can be said that the policy of His Majesty's Government has been influenced by the statement to which the hon. Member refers. The attitude of His Majesty's Government in the matter has been made plain in the policy which they have pursued at Geneva. Apart from that, their feelings and those of other members of the League were expressed by the President of the Council when he stated his regret that the Japanese Government should have recognised the so-called State of Manchukuo before the report of the Lytton Commission had been discussed or even published.

Mr. COCKS: Does the right hon. Gentleman recollect that, in an answer in this House last year, he said that, in consequence of that assurance, he did not propose to make any protest against the establishment of this new State?

Sir J. SIMON: I should like to check that. The hon. Member is usually accurate, and it may be so.

21. Mr. COCKS asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether relations between Great Britain and Japan are still based on the obligations of full and frank communication, specified in Article 7 of the Washington Treaty of 1922, and upon the informal agreement announced in the House of Commons on 28th November, 1928, that close contact between the two Governments should be developed by constant consultation between their respective Ministers at Pekin; whether His Majesty's Government has been constantly consulted by Japan during the last 18 months respecting Japanese action in Manchuria, Shanghai and Jehol; and, if not, what action His Majesty's Government proposes to take regarding this apparent breach by Japan of both the Washington Treaty and the informal Anglo-Japanese agreement of 1928?

Sir J. SIMON: The obligations of the Washington Treaty naturally remain in force. It is not proposed to take any special action as suggested in the last part of the question.

SOUTH AMERICAN STATES (DISPUTES).

17. Mr. MANDER asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs the present position with regard to the disputes between Bolivia and Paraguay, and Peru and Colombia?

Sir J. SIMON: It is difficult within the scope of an oral reply to give the hon. Member full details as to the present position in these two disputes. Briefly, the facts are as follow: In the case of the dispute between Bolivia and Paraguay, fighting in the Chaco territory, the sovereignty over which has been in doubt for many years, broke out in June last. Efforts have been made by the Conference of Neutrals at Washington, by the neighbouring Powers, and by the League of Nations to effect a settlement. Unfortunately no success has attended these efforts so far, but fresh proposals are now, it is understood, under consideration between the Governments of the neighbouring countries.

As regards the case of Peru and Colombia, Leticia and Tarapaca, places in the territory ceded to Colombia by the 1922 treaty between those two countries, were occupied by Peruvian civilians from the Department of Loreto in September last. Tarapaca was retaken by a Colombian naval expedition on the 15th of February. No serious hostilities appear to have occurred since then, though diplomatic relations between the two countries have been broken off. The Colombian Government have referred the whole question to the League of Nations under the terms of Article XV, and the Council of the League has requested a small committee to endeavour, in collaboration with the representatives of the two parties, to effect a settlement by conciliation in accordance with paragraph 3 of the above-mentioned Article.

Mr. MANDER: Will the right hon. Gentleman be prepared to deal with the question of the export of arms to these countries in the Debate to-day?

Sir J. SIMON: I rather understand that the Debate to-day is confined to the Far East, but I will bear the suggestion in mind.

HUNGARY (MILITARY AEROPLANES).

18. Mr. MANDER asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will make a statement regarding the negotiations with the French Government concerning the 32 military aeroplanes recently flown to Hungary from Italy and there taken to pieces and hidden?

Sir J. SIMON: I have nothing to add to the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend's question on this subject on Thursday last.

Mr. MANDER: Do I understand that no communications have been received from the French Government on this matter?

Sir J. SIMON: No. In reply to an inquiry by the French Ambassador I have informed His Excellency that, in view of the denials issued by the Hungarian and Italian Governments, and the absence of any conclusive evidence, His Majesty's Government do not propose to proceed with the matter further.

FOREIGN EMBASSIES (DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITY).

19. Mr. COCKS asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what is the practice regarding the diplomatic immunity accorded to members of foreign embassies and legations; and what persons are covered by this immunity?

Sir J. SIMON: It is not possible within the limits of a reply to a Parliamentary question to state the law and practice with regard to diplomatic immunity. The answer would necessarily extend to the length of a legal treatise. I can only suggest that the hon. Member should consult one of the numerous legal works on the subject.

AGRICULTURE.

MILK REORGANISATION COMMISSION.

26. Sir P. HURD asked the Minister of Agriculture whether the Government propose to adopt the recommendations of the Milk Reorganisation Commission; what legislation will be required; and whether that legislation will be enacted before August when negotiations between producers and distributors must take place?

The MINISTER of AGRICULTURE (Major Elliot): This report is of far-reaching importance and before pronouncing on the proposals, I am anxious that time should be given for expression of opinion by those whom they closely concern. I am therefore not yet in a position to make any statement in regard to fresh legislation. I take this opportunity of expressing the hope that producers in particular will press on with the examination of the scheme under the Agricultural Marketing Act, which the Commission prepared for their consideration.

Sir P. HURD: Is there any prospect of these matters being brought to an issue before negotiations are begun for next autumn prices?

Major ELLIOT: Yes. I hope so.

Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS: Will the Minister of Agriculture assure me that he does not propose to interfere with the twice daily delivery of my milk?

Butter Blending (Prosecution).

27. Mr. LAMBERT asked the Minister of Agriculture if his attention has been called to the police proceedings at Ealing on the 17th February, where a company was convicted of selling a blend of Australian and Russian butter as Devon Vale blend; and whether, in the interests of the Home producer and consumer, he will initiate legislation whereby such frauds may be detected with more facility?

Major ELLIOT: I have seen a report of the proceedings referred to by my right hon. Friend. As regards the last part of his question, I would remind him that the powers already possessed by local authorities are sufficient to enable effective steps to be taken under the Merchandise Marks Acts to check such misdescriptions as to country of origin.

Mr. LAMBERT: Does my right hon. Friend not think that there are many frauds of this description, and will he not at any rate keep alive the Act relating to foreign imports?

Major ELLIOT: Surely my right hon. Friend has overlooked the fact that in this case proceedings were not only brought but a conviction was secured. That seems to me to meet the case.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Does the Minister think it fair continually to interfere with private enterprise?

POST OFFICE.

Contributory Pensions.

29. Mr. HICKS asked the Postmaster-General what instructions are given to men retired at 60, who have been compulsorily insured for widows' and orphans' pension, as to the action they should take to safeguard their families in the event of their death prior to reaching the age of 65; and whether arrangements will be made to provide for deduction from the pension of 3½d. a week to cover pensions for widows and orphans?

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Sir Kingsley Wood): A copy of a memorandum issued by the Ministry of Health for the information of persons who cease to be engaged in excepted employment is given to Post Office servants in the circumstances stated by the hon. Member. This memorandum includes instructions regarding the maintenance of insurance rights after retirement, but it is not practicable to make deductions from pensions for the purpose of voluntary insurance contributions.

Mr. HICKS: Do I understand that the period of pension is covered by the memorandum?

Sir K. WOOD: I will supply the hon. Gentleman with a copy of the memorandum and discuss it with him if necessary.

Pension Payments, Prescot.

30. Mr. ROBINSON asked the Postmaster-General whether he can state the total amount of moneys paid out from Post Offices in Prescot, Lancashire, in the year ended 31st December, 1932, in respect of war pensions, contributory widows', orphans', and old age pensions, non-contributory old age pensions, and other payments under his control, including blind pensions?

Sir K. WOOD: The amount paid in respect of Army, Navy and Air Force pensions and allowances was £11,310 and in respect of old age, widows' and orphans' pensions (including blind pensions) £22,340.

Stamp-Cancelling Machines.

28. Sir W. DAVISON (for Mr. HANNON) asked the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the machines now being used by the Post Office for the stamping of the words "Buy British" over postage stamps are foreign-made machines stamped with the words "Made in U.S.A."; and if it is impossible to secure machines of British origin to carry out this work?

Sir K. WOOD: No foreign-made stamp-cancelling machines have been bought by the Post Office since March, 1931, when British-made machines became available. A number of old foreign-made machines are still in use, but these are kept in running order by the replacement of worn or faulty parts with British-made components.

Mr. CHARLES WILLIAMS: Why, in March, 1931, particularly? Has there been some change?

Sir K. WOOD: When British-made machines became available.

Mr. WILLIAMS: But it was not this Government's fault that they were not available before?

HOUSING (RURAL WORKERS) ACT.

34. Sir P. HURD asked the Minister of Health what steps he is taking to encourage a larger use of the Housing (Rural Workers) Act of 1926, to provide houses for rural workers at rents they can pay?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of HEALTH (Mr. Shakespeare): Every opportunity is taken in correspondence and interviews with appropriate local authorities to bring the advantages of this Act to their notice. My right hon. Friend is considering what further general action may be practicable.

Sir P. HURD: Does the Ministry not think that the time has come when a conference of the leading county councils and other housing authorities should be summoned in order to help forward the use of this Act?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: I will convey that suggestion to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. BOOTHBY: In any action that may be taken will it apply to Scotland as well as to England?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: That is a question for another Department.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (EXPENDITURE).

35. Mr. H. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Health on what basis it has been estimated that the total local expenditure from all sources will show a reduction of as much as £20,000,000, as compared with the figure for the year 1929-30?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: The estimate to which my hon. Friend refers was that total local expenditure showed a reduction of £20 millions over the figure for the year 1929-30. This figure was, as my right hon. Friend was advised, the approximate reduction in local expenditure on the figure of 1929-30 which the Ray Committee estimated would be secured as a result of the economy measures taken in the autumn of 1931.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Is it not the case that the estimate of the Ray report related to a reduction below the figures for a subsequent year, and that as a matter of fact these economies merely bring the expenditure back to that of 1929-30 and not to £20,000,000 below that sum?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: I require notice of that question.

Mr. WILLIAMS: The question has been asked. May I not press for an answer?

UNEMPLOYMENT.

TRANSITIONAL PAYMENTS.

42. Mr. H. WILLIAMS asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what additional sum he will need to provide in order to continue transitional payments to unemployed persons for the period 1st July, 1933, to 31st March, 1934, on the basis of the existing law being extended for that period?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Hore-Belisha): My hon. Friend will, I think, agree that his question is hypothetical at the present time. My right hon. Friend will be in a better position to estimate the cost for the remainder of the year of those services for which provision has so far only been made in Estimates up to 30th June when he presents the Budget. On present indications, the cost appears likely to be in the region of from £20,000,000 to £25,000,000.

DISTRIBUTIVE TRADES.

36. Mr. DICKIE asked the Minister of Labour what is the present number of insured people engaged in the distributive trades, together with the figures for January, 1930, 1931, and 1932; the percentage of unemployment in the industry; and the number of unemployed people upon each of these dates?

The MINISTER of LABOUR (Sir Henry Betterton): As the reply includes a table of figures I will, if I may, circulate a statement in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following is the statement:

STATISTICS giving the estimated numbers of insured persons in particular industries are available only in respect of July in each year. The following table gives the information desired, so far as it is available.

Distributive Trades—Great Britain.

Year.	Estimated numbers at July.	Percentages of insured persons unemployed towards the end of January (calculated on the numbers insured at the previous July).	Numbers of insured persons recorded as unemployed towards the end of January.
1929 ...	1,646,070	—	—
1930 ...	1,729,720	7·7	127,124
1931 ...	1,836,680	11·9	205,961
1932 ...	1,913,080	13·5	247,865
1933 ...	(not yet available).	13·3	253,618

UNINSURED CLASSES.

44. Mr. BRACKEN asked the Prime Minister whether, in view of the increase in unemployment in the classes designated black-coat workers, who are not advantaged by any State unemployment legislation, the Government will take immediate action to alleviate the hardships of those classes?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Ramsay MacDonald): My hon. Friend will be aware that the Royal Commission on Unemployment Insurance made certain recommendations for raising the limit of remuneration below which unemployment insurance legislation applies, and these recommendations are at present under consideration. But it would not be possible to provide for separate or preferential treatment in regard to relief from public funds. The best relief that can be given to this class of unemployed is a revival of general trade.

Mr. BRACKEN: Have the Government any policy to relieve the hardships of these people?

Mr. MAXTON: Is the revival of trade likely to come in the near future?

Mr. BRACKEN: In view of the unsatisfactory and defeatist answers I have received from the Prime Minister, I beg to give notice that I shall raise this question on the Adjournment.

WORK SCHEMES.

45. Mr. MANDER asked the Prime Minister if he will make arrangements whereby Members may receive the assistance of expert officials in order to make effective preparation of their plans for relieving unemployment?

The PRIME MINISTER: Hon. Members may rest assured that every scheme which offers any hope of good results will be considered in detail and the help of Departmental experts enlisted by the Departments, but officials cannot possibly be employed on the conditions suggested by my hon. Friend.

Mr. MANDER: Would it not be possible for hon. Members to have an opportunity of discussing with experts the proposals they have to bring forward?

The PRIME MINISTER: Certainly, but not the experts who are officials of the Department and Government servants.

Mr. MANDER: Surely, if the Government are really serious in the matter they might consider placing at the disposal of Members facilities for discussing their plans with experts?

WEST HAM.

37. Mr. LAWSON (for Mr. THORNE) asked the Minister of Labour the number of unemployed persons registered at the Employment Exchanges in the borough of West Ham at the end of January, 1932, and for the corresponding date in 1933, or the nearest available date?

Sir H. BETTERTON: At 25th January, 1932, there were 21,748 unemployed persons on the registers of the Canning Town and Stratford Employment Exchanges, and 21,825 at 23rd January, 1933.

INCOME TAX (CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETIES).

41. Sir W. DAVISON asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can now say when the report relating to the taxation of co-operative societies will be published, and under what circumstances a deputation from the co-operative societies was received by him pending the publication of the report?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: Arrangements have been made to present the report as a White Paper, and it will be in the Vote Office this evening. Before submitting the report to the Cabinet for consideration, my right hon. Friend desired to ascertain the views of the co-operative societies on certain points, some of them of a technical character, arising out of the report, and accordingly he invited their representatives to come and see him last Thursday for this purpose.

Sir W. DAVISON: Will my hon. Friend say whether there is any precedent for a report of a committee of this kind being secretly communicated, before submission to this House and the public, to one of the interested parties; and is he aware that the "Daily Herald" had an article on Friday last stating that they had seen the report and that it was not satisfactory to the co-operative societies?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I should say that there were a great many precedents. The committee was appointed to advise the Government, and it was within the discretion of the Government as to what counsels they should seek before making their plans.

Sir BASIL PETO: Why was this opportunity of a conference held out to the co-operative societies while the representatives of private industry were denied any opportunity of stating their views?

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Was there any real reason why this White Paper should not have been published before the Rotherham by-election?

AVIATION (MUNICIPAL AERODROMES).

46. Mr. MACLAY asked the Prime Minister whether, as a contribution to the relief of unemployment and in view of the growth of civil aviation, he will encourage local authorities of all large towns to clear and level suitable ground for future aerodromes; and whether, in view of possible aerial warfare in the southern and eastern areas of England, he will encourage large-scale excavations for bomb-proof shelters, subsidising local authorities to the extent of the difference between the dole and a fair wage for unemployed men so engaged?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: I have been asked to reply. The policy of the Government in dealing with applications from local authorities for the approval of loans for public works is that approval is given if the works are remunerative or if a good case can be shown for proceeding with them at once. An application for a loan for the acquisition of land or for work in connection with an aerodrome would not be refused if it complied with either of these conditions. In some cases sanctions have recently been given for the acquisition of land and for works in connection with aerodromes. The provision of bomb-proof shelters is not a function of local authorities in the ordinary course, and in any event it does not appear that approval of loans for this purpose would be warranted at the present time.

NAVAL AND MILITARY PENSIONS AND GRANTS.

22. Mr. HARCOURT JOHNSTONE asked the Minister of Pensions whether it is the practice to make fresh medical examinations, on behalf of his Department, of men whose claims to disability pensions have been finally disallowed in cases where fresh evidence has been brought forward by independent medical men?

The MINISTER OF PENSIONS (Major Tryon): Where fresh evidence of fact is produced which indicates that the decision was given on an incomplete knowledge of the material facts, such action is taken as may be required, including further medical examination, if this is found to be necessary to determine the specific point at issue, namely the origin of the condition complained of.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there are cases in which constant representations have been made to his Department about the increasingly bad health of the individuals concerned, whose pensions have been finally refused and where no fresh medical examination has been made for as long as 10 years?

Major TRYON: It is, of course, true that there may be cases in which a man's health has undoubtedly grown worse, but that is clearly not the responsibility of this Ministry, if an independent tribunal has decided that the man's illness is not due to war service.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: But if it was decided 10 years ago——

Major TRYON: The decision of the tribunal is final.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT AREAS (STREATHAM).

40. Mr. LAWSON (for Mr. THORNE) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware that the Parliamentary Division of Streatham, in the Borough of Wandsworth, with a population of 68,467, is only one ward for municipal elections; that in the event of a by-election to fill one vacancy on the borough council the whole parliamentary election machinery has to be put into operation; and whether, in view of the cost incurred, he will take steps to divide the ward into four and increase the number of councillors?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir John Gilmour): An increase in the number of wards may lessen the cost of elections to fill casual vacancies, but it increases the cost of the triennial general elections, and in any case there are other considerations to be taken into account in deciding into how many wards a borough should be divided. I have no information that there is any desire in the Borough of Wandsworth for an alteration of the wards.

LAPSED INSURANCE POLICIES.

43. Mr. HICKS (for Mr. RHYS DAVIES) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the case of insurance policy-holders whose policies have lapsed, as they have recently fallen into arrears owing to the economic depression after many years regular payment; and if he will consider amending the law in favour of such policy-holders?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Baronet the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne, East (Sir R. Aske) on 20th December last.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that insurance agents are now on strike in the town of Greenock, because of the attitude of an insurance company in lapsing the policies of poor policy-holders?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I have referred the hon. Member who put down the question to a previous answer which, I think, fully covers the point.

Mr. WILLIAMS: In view of the fact that insurance workers are on strike as a protest against the attitude of the insurance company, what action, if any, are the Treasury likely to take to help these poor policy-holders?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: My hon. Friend is aware that the whole matter is at present the subject of an inquiry.

QUESTIONS TO MINISTERS.

Sir FRANCIS FREMANTLE: On a point of Order. I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether you have considered the fact that, out of 46 questions on the Paper to-day, no less than 20 have been put down by Members who are not present to ask them and that of those 20 questions 17 are in the names of Members of the Opposition, seven being in the names of Front Bench Members; also that this is a growing habit especially among Members on the Opposition side?

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: On that point of Order, may I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether you are aware that in the North of England and various parts of Wales, the weather is totally different from what it is here; and, further, that if the trains, which are privately-owned and run, were running on time, hon. Members would not be late in their attendance at the House?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have often known of hon. Members who had questions on the Paper being absent on a Monday.

DONCASTER AREA DRAINAGE BILL.

Reported, with Amendments, from the Joint Committee, with Minutes of Evidence.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

Bill, as amended, re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House for Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 61.]

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

SCOTTISH STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. William Nicholson reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from the Standing Committee on Scottish Bills (added in respect of the Housing (Financial Provisions) (Scotland) Bill): Lieut.-Commander Agnew; and had appointed in substitution: Colonel Crookshank.

Report to lie upon the Table.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

POST OFFICE.

AIR MAILS.

Lord APSLEY asked the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the new airgram which has been introduced by the Siamese Government, with the object of providing an air-mail letter weighing less than a quarter-ounce which can be carried for low rates, is free from the disadvantages of air-mail postcards, and eliminates the need for anything beyond a visual check in the Post Office; and whether, with a view to stimulating air-mail traffic on British Empire air routes, he will consider introducing a similar facility for the British public?

Sir K. WOOD: I would refer my Noble Friend to the answer given to the hon. Member for Southampton (Mr. Craven-Ellis) on 12th December last.

RESEARCH STATION (CINEMA APPARATUS CONTRACT).

Mr. MORGAN JONES asked the Postmaster-General whether any conditions have been attached to the contract recently given to an American company for the supply of cinema apparatus to the Post Office Research Station, Dollis Hill, stipulating that British labour and material shall be used?

Sir K. WOOD: I am having inquiry made into the question asked by the hon. Member, and will furnish a reply in due course.

TELEGRAPH POLES (CANADIAN SUPPLY).

Captain P. MACDONALD asked the Postmaster-General whether it will be possible to obtain an increased supply of Post Office telegraph poles from Canada in the near future in consequence of the recent fall in the value of the Canadian dollar?

Sir K. WOOD: Orders for the 1933 requirements of telegraph poles have already been placed; and the question of placing orders for Canadian poles is therefore not affected by present fluctuations in the dollar rate. Timber of approved species has not yet been offered to the Post Office from any Canadian source: and though I am in touch with the Canadian authorities as to the supply of samples of other species for test, considerable experience would be required before any conclusion can be drawn as to the "life" of these species in the conditions which prevail in the United Kingdom.

KENYA (INDIAN POLICE OFFICERS).

Mr. T. GRIFFITHS asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Kenya Government have given any reply to protests by white settlers against the appointment of Indian police officers to the control of stations in white settled areas; and, if so, what is the nature of such reply?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I am not aware that any such protests have been made. The second part of the question does not, therefore, arise.

AUSTRALIA (TARIFFS).

Mr. HAMMERSLEY asked the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs if he has yet received a reply to his representations to the Australian Government in respect of the prohibition by Australia of the importation of felt-hat hoods?

Mr. THOMAS: I understand that the report of the Tariff Board, which has not yet been published, is under consideration by His Majesty's Government in the Commonwealth of Australia with a view to submission to the Commonwealth Parliament when it meets next month.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

TRANSITIONAL PAYMENTS.

Mr. REA asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury what was the amount included in the Estimates for 1932-33 in respect of the grant to the Unemployment Fund for transitional payments and certain other services for the period from 30th June, 1932, to the end of the financial year, provision for which grant and services for the period 30th June, 1933, to 31st March, 1934, is not included in the Estimate now presented to Parliament; and what would be the cost of such provisions on the basis of the figure of unemployment remaining at its present level?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The answer to the first part of the question is, about £21,000,000. As regards the second part, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to-day by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury to the hon. Member for Croydon South (Mr. H. Williams).

BARMEN AND BARMAIDS.

Sir H. CROFT asked the Minister of Labour the number of barmen and barmaids who have lost their employment during the past calendar year?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I regret that separate statistics of unemployment among barmen and barmaids are not available.

AGRICULTURE.

HOP PICKERS.

Sir H. CROFT asked the Minister of Labour the number of persons employed in hop picking in 1914, 1930 and 1932?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I regret that statistics giving the information desired are not available.

BARLEY (ACREAGE).

Sir A. KNOX asked the Minister of Agriculture what was the acreage under barley in 1914, 1930 and 1932, respectively?

Major ELLIOT: The area under barley in England and Wales in 1914, 1930 and 1932, was 1,504,771 acres, 1,020,225 acres and 960,542 acres respectively.

PIG INDUSTRY.

Captain P. MACDONALD asked the Minister of Agriculture what further progress has been made in connection with the co-ordination of the schemes recently put forward by the representatives of the bacon manufacturers and the pig producers?

Major ELLIOT: I assume that my hon. and gallant Friend refers to the various incidental matters of common interest to farmers and curers that call for negotiation between them. These questions have been under discussion by the National Farmers' Union and the Food Manufacturers' Federation, in association with Scottish representatives, and considerable progress has been made. I am in consultation with the parties as to whether further progress would be facilitated by the appointment of some such body as the Provisional Pig Industry Development Board envisaged in the Pig Commission's Report.

MOTOR ACCIDENTS, LONDON.

Dr. SALTER asked the Home Secretary how many people were killed and how many injured in 1932 by motor vehicles while boarding or alighting from tramcars?

Sir J. GILMOUR: In the Metropolitan Police district, 27 persons were killed by motor vehicles in 1932 while boarding or alighting from tramcars. I regret that I have no further information as to accidents of this particular kind.

PRISON SERVICE.

Captain P. MACDONALD asked the Home Secretary whether, when vacancies occur in the rank of Governor in prisons and Borstal institutions, applicants from the discipline and clerical ranks are received and considered; whether there is a selection board to advise him; and, if so, who are the members of the board?

Sir J. GILMOUR: Any applications made by members of the clerical and discipline ranks of the prison service for appointment to the rank of Governor are received and considered. When a vacancy has to be filled, the Secretary of State, before making an appointment, receives the advice of a selection board composed of representatives of the Prison Commissioners and the Civil Service Commissioners; the membership of the board varies from time to time.

CINEMATOGRAPH FUND.

Mr. McENTEE asked the Lord President of the Council what amount of money has been received under the Home Office regulation of 17th January last out of the receipts from Sunday cinemas?

Mr. BALDWIN: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 15th February to my hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mr. Cadogan).

GOVERNMENT STAFFS (IMPORT DUTIES ACT).

Mr. RHYS DAVIES asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury the increase in the number of the staff necessitated by the administration of the Import Duties Act, 1932, and the approximate annual increase in salaries?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: The staff of the Customs and Excise Department has been increased since October, 1931, by 1,323 at an approximate annual cost of £265,000 in consequence of work arising out of a number of Acts, including besides the Import Duties Act, 1932, the Finance Act (Tea Duty), the Irish Free State (Special Duties) Act and the Ottawa Agreement Act. The increase has been mainly due to the first mentioned Act, but it is not possible to allocate it definitely. The staff of the Import Duties Advisory Committee (including the Chairman and members of the committee) consists of 97, estimated to cost £44,224 in the next financial year. There is also a small section in the Board of Trade, consisting at present of about 12 subordinate staff costing approximately £2,500 per annum which is necessitated by the administration of the Import Duties Act, 1932.

NATIONAL FINANCE.

SPIRITS, BEER AND WINE (REVENUE, NORTHERN IRELAND).

Mr. LECKIE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the estimated quantities retained for consumption in Northern Ireland of beer, spirits and wine and the estimated revenue attributed thereto for the calendar year 1932?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: The approximate quantities of spirits, beer and wine retained for consumption in Northern Ireland during the calendar year 1932, and the estimated revenue attributable thereto are as follow:—

Article.	Approximate quantity retained for consumption.	Estimated attributable revenue.
	Proof Gallons.	£
Spirits ...	223,000	788,000
Beer ...	Standard Barrels 136,000 Bulk Barrels 168,000	755,000
Wine ...	Gallons, 246,000	72,000

ENTERTAINMENTS DUTY.

Mr. ALBERY asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury the amount received on account of Entertainments Duty from cinema and part-cinema entertainments, and from theatrical performances, respectively, for the last three years?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I regret that the information requested is not available. Separate particulars of the receipts of Entertainments Duty from different classes of entertainments are not obtainable, because in the case of duty paid by the purchase of stamps or stamped tickets there is no official information as to the class of entertainment for which the stamps or tickets may be used.

CONVERSION LOAN (ADVERTISING COST).

Mr. LEONARD asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury the total cost of advertising the Conversion Loan floated last year?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: The total cost of advertising the 5 per cent. War Loan conversion was £90,760.

NAVAL AND MILITARY PENSIONS AND GRANTS.

Mr. SMEDLEY CROOKE asked the Minister of Pensions whether his attention has been drawn to the case of H. Crabtree, of 8, Lion Street, Bacup, No. 3/MC/4,886, who was granted treatment with allowances from May, 1930, until June, 1931; registered as fit for work at the Labour Exchange from June, 1931, until March, 1932, drawing unemployment benefit; again admitted to hospital from March to May, 1932, and September to December, 1932, but refused treatment allowances; and whether, in view of this and similar cases, the Minister will review the regulations governing the payment of treatment allowances in order that allowances may be paid in cases where a pensioner is removed from the labour market for the purpose of receiving treatment?

Major TRYON: I would remind my hon. Friend that treatment allowances are, as I pointed out in the detailed answer which I gave him on 30th November last, intended to compensate for actual loss of wages or profits which would be received if the man were not undergoing treatment and, although consideration is always given to cases in which the man is no more than temporarily and for a brief period out of work, I should have no authority to deal similarly with cases in which earnings have definitely ceased for a prolonged period. Up to the time of his admission to hospital in 1933 Mr. Crabtree had done no work since 1929, except for a few hours on one occasion only, and in these circumstances he was not eligible for the special allowances. During hospital treatment, while being himself maintained free of cost, he continued to draw without deduction his pension of 28s. a week.

Mr. LANSBURY: I beg to move, "That Item Class II, Vote 1 (Foreign Office), be reduced by £100."

I should have preferred that it should have been possible for the right hon. Gentleman the Foreign Secretary or someone else on behalf of the Government to make a statement on this subject first. I understand, though, that it is according to the rules of discussion in Committee of Supply that anyone who wishes to move a reduction should start. We put this Amendment down, as I think the Government are well aware, in order to get a complete statement from the Government on the situation in the Far East and the decision of the League of Nations last week in reference thereto. Had the statement been made first, it might have been possible for me and my friends not to trouble the Committee for quite so long as we shall be obliged to do now, because, if the Foreign Secretary had introduced the subject, he would have given the Committee, I take it, the full history of the matter down to the present day.

I should like to say at the outset, speaking for myself and my friends in this matter, that we are neither pro-Japanese nor pro-Chinese and that we have as much regard for the Japanese people as we have for the Chinese people. We may, and do, profoundly disagree with and dissent from the policy of the Japanese Government, but that does not alter our feelings of friendship and regard for the Japanese people, and we would like that to be quite clear. Neither in anything that I may say to-day do I stand at this Box as a self-righteous representative of either the working people who sent me here or of our nation as a whole. I say that, because the representative of Japan last Thursday or Friday stated, when the decision was arrived at against his country, "Let the nation that is without sin cast the first stone." If these events had happened previously to the Great War, before the coming of the League of Nations, it would have been a little difficult for any of the great Powers to have answered that question properly or with any justice, but the coming into being of the Covenant of the League has, at least on paper, altered the relationships of the Governments of the world. We are supposed now to have forsaken the old paths of Imperialism, war, and domination, and all of us to have pledged ourselves to other methods and means of settling our differences. That, it seems to me, rather vitiates the argument of the Japanese representative, though I am bound to say that I think, offhand, he may have had, thinking of the past, some justification for his statement.

As to this discussion, whatever other hon. and right hon. Members may feel about it, we feel that the world is facing probably one of the most serious crises since 1914, and, because we think that, we are of opinion that the Foreign Secretary, or whoever speaks for the Government, should tell us clearly and as emphatically as possible any obligations, if there are any, that we are under to any Government in certain eventualities, and make it quite clear that in this matter we are not actuated, as some people are insinuating that we ought to be, by motives of opposition to the spread of Communism either in China or anywhere else in Asia. In our view, it has nothing to do with the rest of the world whether China, or Japan, goes Communist or not. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I will repeat that. In our view, it is a matter for the Chinese people, and no one else, and to the idea that we should interfere or stand aloof because, as is claimed by the Japanese Government (she stands for the preservation of order in Asia, especially in that part of Asia, and should therefore be allowed a free hand), we object altogether, and to anything that would give countenance to that policy. We maintain that that is altogether in defiance both of the Covenant of the League and of the Nine-Power Treaty.

I should like also to say that both the Chinese Government and the Japanese Government are on an equal footing so far as recognition by the great Governments of the world is concerned. Both of those States are recognised as Sovereign States. The right hon. Gentleman, answering questions last week, gave an answer on the question over what portions of China effective control was exercised by the Government at Nanking. Yes, but the Committee should remember that the Ambassadors of the Nanking Government are accepted here, at the Court of St. James, and at Tokio, and elsewhere throughout the world, that they are both recognised by the League of Nations, and that both sat, until last Friday, as colleagues on the Supreme Council of the League. Therefore, it seems to me that there cannot be any real sense or reason in arguing whether or not there is a central Government in China. It is recognised universally throughout the world that there is.

The next point that I should like to make is that both these nations signed the Covenant of the League, that Japan signed the Nine-Power Treaty guaranteeing the integrity of Chinese territory, and that both signed the Kellogg Pact. This is what the Japanese Government signed in regard to China:

> "The contracting Powers, other than China, agree to respect the sovereignty, independence, and territorial and administrative integrity of China."

Clause 4 of Article 1 reads—and I call the attention of hon. Members who rather questioned my statement a moment or two ago to this:

> "To refrain from taking advantage of conditions in China in order to seek special rights or privileges which would abridge the rights of subjects or citizens of friendly States, and from countenancing action injurious to the security of such States. The contracting Powers agree not to enter into any treaty, agreement, arrangement, or understanding, either with one another, or, individually or collectively, with any Power or Powers, which would infringe or impair the principles stated in Article 1."

The first of those principles is that all the nine Powers acknowledge the sovereignty of the Chinese Government, and the independence of the territorial and administrative integrity of China. I call the attention of the Committee to another fact which is worth remembering in these discussions. Both China and Japan have been under a certain amount of foreign control, but Japan, as is well known, has freed herself entirely of any control in her ports or within her territory. A foreigner living in Japan has to live under the rules of the Japanese nation. That, however, is not true of China, which has not yet gained the same freedom; but we must bear in mind that ever since the Sun Yat Sen revolution which established the Chinese Republic, the successive Governments have down to the present moment persistently striven by negotiation to free the Chinese treaty ports and to establish a China free of all alien interfence or domination. It is necessary to keep this in mind while we are discussing the dispute between Japan and China, because so far her efforts have failed, and the struggle that is taking place in reference to Manchuria is part of her general struggle for national freedom.

It is said and argued in the Press, and it may be argued here to-day, that so far war has not been declared between these two nations. I am not a legal jurist, national or international, and I do not intend to argue whether a state of war exists or not between these two nations. It is sufficient for ordinary people to know that since the dispute commenced Japanese troops, armed and equipped with all the devilish machinery of modern warfare, have blasted their way across Manchuria. No one can deny that, and if that is not war, ordinary people would like to know when there is war and when there is not. As an incident in the campaign, there has been a pretty wholesale slaughter and destruction to Chinese villages and townships hundreds of miles away from Manchuria, and no one can declare that in those circumstances during the last 17 months war has not been waged between Japan and China, or rather waged by Japan on China. Further than that, at the present moment the Japanese forces are struggling to push their way into another great province. Common people do not understand the language of jurists who claim that war does not exist unless a form of words has first been used by one side or another, but there is an old English saying that actions speak louder than words, and we think that in this case there is no necessity for words to tell us that there is war. The actual happenings prove that a war is on.

For 17 months this matter has been discussed, and last week the League of Nations decided that Japan is the aggressor and that her conduct is not consistent with the obligations imposed on her by her membership of the League or by the treaty which she has signed with regard to China and war. It is something to be thankful for that at long last a decision has been reached. Speaking for my friends, and remembering the line that we have taken from the beginning, I think that it is almost criminal that the decision was not arrived at earlier. Just consider what the position is. The long delay has enabled the Japanese Government to consolidate their conquests in Manchuria and to get a jumping off place further into China. We ought to have had some more speedy method of dealing with the matter. If the League is to be effective in future, she must move more speedily or, as a consequence of delay, a war may be over long before the League comes to a decision. [Laughter.] There is nothing to laugh at in that. Some people may think that Great Britain signed the Covenant of the League and did not mean it. I think that we did mean it. If we did not mean that we were going to use this means of stopping war or of preventing war, I do not know why we signed the Covenant, and I do not understand people thinking it a matter of joking that a war should be concluded before the League took action. I should have thought it something for very serious consideration. That is what I am trying to press on the Government and on the League of Nations. Let us consider what the League of Nations has decided. Part of what I am about to say is based on the records of the League and on the Lytton Commission. We are told that on 19th September in consequence of an incident near Mukden—the explosion of a bomb or the removal of a railway sleeper—the Japanese > "put into operation with swiftness and precision . . . a carefully prepared plan to meet the case of possible hostilities between themselves and the Chinese. . . . The Chinese . . . had no plan of attacking the Japanese troops or of endangering the lives or property of Japanese nationals at this particular time or place."

According to the Lytton Commission, an explosion did take place, but > "the damage, if any, to the railroad did not in fact prevent the punctual arrival of the south-bound train and was not in itself sufficient to justify military action. The military operations of the Japanese troops during this night . . . cannot be regarded as measures of legitimate self-defence."

[Mr. Lansbury.]

I undertake to say that there has been no stronger condemnation of the action of any Government in almost any circumstances than those words of the Lytton Report. What happened afterwards is set out in the language of the President of the Assembly in presenting the report of the Special Committee of the Assembly on the 21st February. This is what he said:

> "Since 21st September, 1931, first the Council and then the Assembly endeavoured to settle the dispute with the agreement of the parties, in accordance with the Articles of the Covenant"— articles which were signed by the Japanese Government—

> "in virtue of which the matter has been referred to them. For exactly 17 months the efforts at conciliation have been pursued. At the outset of the dispute, the Council had received the assurance that the withdrawal of the Japanese troops in the zone of the South Manchurian Railway, which had already been begun, would be pursued as rapidly as possible in proportion as the safety of the lives and property of Japanese nationals was effectively secured, and that Japan hoped to carry out this intention in full as speedily as possible."

What is the position to-day, after that assurance from Japan? These are not my words:

> "To-day the three Eastern Provinces are occupied, Japanese troops have crossed the Great Wall, and it is announced that operations are being prepared to occupy the Province of Jehol."

Since then the bogus Government of Manchukuo have sent an ultimatum to China, and, as we are told in the Press, military operations are in full blast. Perhaps my knowledge of modern history is limited, but I should think there has been no more cynical, blatant disregard of solemn obligations than has been displayed by the Japanese Government in this respect. The Assembly of the League of Nations have made this declaration:

> "Without excluding the possibility that on the night of 18th September, 1931, the Japanese officers on the spot may have believed that they were acting in self-defence, the Assembly cannot regard as measures of self-defence the military operations carried out on that night by Japanese troops at Mukden and other places in Manchuria. Nor can the military measures of Japan as a whole, developed in the course of the dispute, be regarded as measures of self-defence."

After observing that in Manchuria there are many factors without an exact parallel in other parts of the world, the Assembly declare:

> "It is indisputable that without any declaration of war a large part of Chinese territory"—

Remember, the League have declared that Manchuria is Chinese territory—

> "has been forcibly seized and occupied by Japanese troops, and that in consequence of these operations it has been separated from and declared independent of the rest of China. While at the origin of the state of tension that existed before 18th September, 1931, certain responsibilities would appear to lie on one side and the other, no question of Chinese responsibility can arise for the development of events since that date."

Even after several months had elapsed since the incident at Mukden, our Government had not apparently made up their minds one way or the other on the subject, because in another place Lord Hailsham declared:

> "His Majesty's Government prefer not to express any opinion or come to any decision as to the responsibility for the situation which has arisen until they had heard the contentions of both sides and have investigated the evidence which has been laid before them by one side or the other."

We consider that was a most extraordinary view to take.

The SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. Simon): Was that before Lord Lytton's Committee gave its report?

Mr. LANSBURY: Yes, it was during a discussion raised by Lord Ponsonby. As an ordinary person I should have imagined that the invasion of another country across a great stretch of the sea was an act of war and did not need much investigation as to whether it was right or wrong. [Laughter.] I would say to those who laugh at me that if a similar thing had happened in this country we should have considered it to be war, and bloody war at that. In any case, we on these benches expressed our point of view at the time. The fact that war was being waged was self evident from the moment the Japanese Government set their troops in action on 18th September, 1931, and I repeat that it is a misuse of words to say anything else, and if the League of Nations is to be accepted by the peoples of the world as a defence against war, and is to be effective in dealing with these disputes, its rules must be modified and it must have power to act with the same swiftness and precision as the Japanese army acted under the orders of their Government. Had this been possible eighteen months ago, the world might have been spared the events developing before our eyes, and the awful prospects which unfold before the mind of even the most unimaginative of us—the international scene in the world.

Lord Cecil, who is looked upon as an authority in these matters, has declared that a war, small or large, in any part of the world, must ultimately affect the whole world, and it is from that point of view that I am speaking this afternoon. Although I have called attention to the statement of Lord Hailsham, I do not want to pursue that point except to make it clear that we who sit here have, right from the start, urged that some action should be taken, because we realised the terrible consequences which might ensue if this dispute went on and the war between these two countries continued. As I have already said the League of Nations, and our Government as members of the League, have tried patient negotiations, but at the last moment the Japanese have just flouted every single and collective appeal which has been made to them. We do not consider that there can be any inherent right in any nation to invade the territory of another nation simply because it may consider that its economic interests demand such action. We here want to say that quite definitely. Whatever may have been the case before the Great War, since the signing of the Covenant there cannot be any justification for any such claim as that.

When the Great War was launched we were told that it was a struggle to uphold treaty rights and treaty obligations and was for "a scrap of paper." Japan joined in that war. Millions of men enlisted to fight for a scrap of paper. One of the German Ministers was accused of urging that "necessity knows no law" as a justification for the invasion of Belgium. I believe that has been in the minds of statesmen many times in the history of the world. We all believe—I speak for those who sit here—that when the Covenant of the League was signed, that doctrine was abolished, at least from among civilised nations. Because that is the case, we are not concerned that people can prove that Japan has business, commercial, monetary or other interests in Manchuria. Those considerations do not enter into the matter, because they do not give her any right cynically to outrage her obligations and not to honour her pledged word. She has chosen war.

War is something that usually spreads, especially when it concerns countries like China and Japan. It is very difficult to localise. In 1931, when my colleagues and myself spoke from here, other hon. Members who took part in the Debate spoke as though the hostilities were not of much importance to ourselves or to the world in general because they would be localised, and in a few months everything would have settled down. Nothing of the kind has happened. The Japanese are now fighting in another province of China, in Jehol. I have been looking at the map. I would ask everybody here to follow the good advice of the late Lord Salisbury and to look at big maps, and if hon. Members do so they will see what an enormous territory is involved, and what the frontiers of this territory really embrace. Jehol is in inner Mongolia. What hon. Members can tell where inner Mongolia ends and outer Mongolia begins? Perhaps some expert will stand up and tell us that. Outer Mongolia is within the sphere of Russian influence. The frontiers of Manchukuo are North China, outer Mongolia and Russia. The maritime province of East Siberia separates Manchuria and the Japanese Islands and spreads to the frontier of Korea. In the four years from 1918 to 1922, the military forces of Japan occupied this province, and made an abortive attempt to separate it from Russia.

To-day Mr. Matsuoka, who was the Japanese Minister at Geneva, has stated that in Japan there are two trends of thought. One regards the Soviet Union as a menace to Japan and thinks that Japan should strike at the Soviet Union before the potential menace fully materialises. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] I hear hon. Members cheering. That reminds me of what two hon. Members said to me a few days ago. They said that it would be a good thing if Russia and Japan could be occupied with one another in the Far East, as that would make it easier to deal with Communism in Europe. That is about the maddest theory that has ever been put forward. I should not have mentioned it but for the cheers of a couple of hon. Members below the Gangway. The other opinion, says the Japanese Minister, is that the matters at issue between the two countries could be peacefully settled by means of diplomacy, and the Japanese Minister believes that. Who, in this Committee, will refuse to consider the grave possibility of a preventive war between Japan and Russia? Lord Lytton, to whom the Committee will, perhaps, listen more respectfully than to me, in a speech that he made in Paris last week is stated to have expressed the opinion that Japan's military policy is producing the very danger it fears, and that it is heading straight for war against both China and Russia that will bring these two countries together, and apparently it is the military who are in control in Tokio. Does anyone think that a war between Japan on the one hand and two great nations of 600,000,000 people on the other—or even the danger of such a war —is something that we ought to treat with humour and to think would be for for the good of the world? Yet I have been told by Members of this House that that would be a very good thing, because it would help to destroy the menace of Communism. The Japanese Government, in a statement published in the Press to-day, claim that what they are doing is heading back the forces of Communism in Asia. It is a very mad world when such a thing could be possible, or even could be contemplated.

There is another matter upon which I would like the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to give any information that he can to the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Epping (Mr. Churchill) made a remarkable speech in this House during one of our discussions, I think it was upon Disarmament, in which he called attention to the Peace Treaties and to the great dangers of war in Central Europe. Men are already saying that this expected war between Russia and Japan will be an excellent opportunity of dealing with many of the problems mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman when he spoke. This all sounds very fantastic, but when I remember the secret treaties, made before and during the Great War, it does not sound so fantastic to me. It is now proposed, and spoken of in the Press by statesmen, that Poland and Germany might come to an arrangement about the Polish Corridor whereby that might be given back to Germany and Poland be given compensation in places far away from one another, in the Ukraine and in Latvia and Lithuania. When men talk that way, and at the same time talk of the good of war in Asia for the purpose of heading back Communism in Russia and stopping its spread elsewhere, it does not seem very fantastic that those who hate the Soviet Union should have in their minds a policy of this kind.

Neither this country nor any other will escape, if the dogs of war are once again let loose. War is a cancerous growth. It is also like fire; it spreads very badly once it starts. I hope that no hon. Member will imagine that if the situation develops in China we shall be able to contract it and to keep it just there. The Japanese have said that they do not intend to go any further than this particular province—yes, always provided that the Chinese will settle down comfortably and accept an accomplished fact. But who imagines that they will do so, and does anyone here think that if because of Chinese opposition the Japanese Government think it necessary to occupy Tientsin, Peking and other places in China, it will stop there? It cannot possibly stop there. If, on the other side, Russia is brought in, it is quite certain, in my judgment, that the war monsters in Europe will break loose, and we shall have again a position like that of 1914.

What is to be done? It is for the Government to tell us what they propose to do. I speak under the disadvantage of not knowing what their proposals are, with the single exception of the public statements in the Press of what the Under-Secretary has proposed at Geneva. Our position in this matter is quite simple. We are very glad indeed that at long last the League of Nations has unanimously, and, as far as we know, with the approval of the American Government, come to certain definite conclusions. They have declared who is the aggressor, and therefore all the sanctions, all the obligations of the Covenant ought, in our judgment, to be carried through. There is an obligation not only upon Japan to honour its word, but upon those who signed the Covenant to honour their word. The Covenant lays down certain things to be done. I know it is the fashion to say that if these are carried out, the Japanese Government may run amok in the Pacific, and all kinds of terrible things may happen. I think it is a pity that those who signed the Covenant did not think of this kind of thing when they signed it, because it is very terrible if, after all the hopes and aspirations raised by the League of Nations, we are now to be told that it is useless, and cannot do anything at all.

I hope that if that is the view of the House they will say so, and will retire from the League of Nations and be done with it. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot say that this is an instrument to prevent war or to deal with the aggressor, and then tell us that it is useless, that it cannot be used. The Attorney-General, I think, is contradicting me, but I would like to say to him that for 17 months the Japanese Government has defied the League of Nations, or, rather, has violated its pledged word according to the Covenant. Now the League has come to its decision, and we ask that the Government should let the Japanese Government and the Japanese people understand that we intend neither directly nor indirectly to give her the least help in carrying out her purposes against China. It is said that armies fight on their bellies, and, in modern days, all Governments need credit and finance. We agree, as a general principle, that all the Governments connected with the League of Nations should act together, but I want to point out again, that if this matter of stopping arms, ammunition and credits is going to be the subject of committees and commissions, and interminable delay, the Japanese may be in Peking, and the whole of that part of the world be in a blaze before we come to any decision. We want a decision come to, as I said at the beginning, as rapidly as the Japanese are able to move with their forces. We must keep in mind—at the risk of boring the Committee I repeat it—that the Japanese Government have said that they do not want to go any further if there is no opposition to them; that is, they want to be allowed to go further unless the Chinese people accept the accomplished fact.

I have said already that the invasion of North China has started, and no one can tell where it will end. The Assembly of the League of Nations remains in Session, and a sub-committee has been requested to follow the development of events. While the grass is growing it is said that the horse is starving, and while we are talking, and while the League of Nations is talking, the Japanese armies can blast their way through China. Men and women by the ten thousand are being slain. History will never forget what happened outside Shanghai. It will be remembered for all time. I must say that I am very oppressed and depressed by the sort of attitude of mind some people have towards war even in these days. Is not a Chinese man or woman as valuable as we are ourselves? Is it matter for a joke that 10,000 of them are destroyed? What becomes of all the talk about the comradeship of nations, the brotherhood of nations and all the rest of it? On behalf of my friends, I want to press on the Government that we want action to be taken now. [AN HON. MEMBER: "What action?"] If the hon. Member will have patience, I will tell him. We want our Government to say at once, that no arms and no ammunition shall be exported from this country. They have got plenty of power to do it without any Act of Parliament at all.

Mr. CHURCHILL: Exports to both sides?

Mr. LANSBURY: Speaking from an entirely different point of view from the right hon. Gentleman, and only for myself as a pacifist, I should not send them to either side, but my friends take the view, and it is the view I am putting to the Government—I am speaking for them at the moment—my friends on this matter do not hold the entirely pacific view I happen to hold myself, and, therefore, I am asking for a complete embargo against the aggressor.

Captain STRICKLAND: May I ask whether in this embargo the right hon. Gentleman would include the import of arms from America into Japan, and whether he would be prepared to send a British Fleet against America to prevent that importation?

Mr. LANSBURY: The American nation and the American Government will, I am quite sure, do what they think right.

[Mr. Lansbury.]

[Interruption.] The hon. Member for one of the Lancashire Divisions seems to think that that was an extraordinary statement.

Captain Sir WILLIAM BRASS: I did not make any remark.

Mr. LANSBURY: You sit there muttering all the time.

Sir W. BRASS: I neither made any remark nor was I muttering.

Mr. LANSBURY: It is very difficult, on a subject like this, to deal with a running fire of commentary by hon. and right hon. Members. Returning to the statement I made, I really cannot see that there is anything extraordinary about it. It was that the people of the United States and the United States Government would make their own decision in this matter, and I have no doubt that they will make it on right lines. I do not think that they will want to import arms into Japan, any more than I hope our Government will, but I am asking this afternoon, quite definitely, that the Government shall prohibit the export of arms to Japan. I am asking that they shall use the power which the Order-in-Council passed in May, 1931, gives them of holding up the export licences. It will not need any Act of Parliament. They have power at the moment either to grant the licence or to withhold it. We also ask that there shall be an embargo on finance and credit. We believe that if these two things were done, then neither Japan nor any other Government could carry on a war. It is said, "Why should we do this alone?" It is said by some people, "Well, if you do it, the Japanese, contrary to your belief, will have power to continue fighting against the Chinese, or, alternatively, if we do not export arms, other nations will, and if we do not allow our factories to work for the supply of these weapons of destruction, other nations will garner a very rich harvest."

I have heard that argument a good many times, but I should like to put it to the House that it is a very unworthy argument indeed, and one for which we, at least, ought not to stand. If a thing is right, it is right; if a thing is wrong, it is wrong. Here is Japan brought to the bar of the greatest court in the world, and found guilty, not by people without experience, but by the statesmen of the world, and we ask that, instead of our Government waiting, they should take action now, and say that from this country no arms of any kind should go——

Mr. MABANE: Will the right hon. Gentleman define "arms"?

Mr. LANSBURY: If the hon. Gentleman cannot define "arms, ammunition and war equipment," the War Office, the Air Ministry and the Naval authorities can easily advise the Government. It does not need a layman like me to advise them. They have plenty of experience—[An HON. MEMBER: "Cotton?"]—everything of contraband. We want the export from this country prohibited of everything that will aid and abet Japan in its cruel, cynical war on China, and its outraging of its obligations to the League of Nations and the world. I hope I have spoken quite clearly. We ask for that for the sole purpose of freeing our nation from any responsibility in the matter. I have only this to say in conclusion. There are in this country many good people who have much of their money invested in armament firms and firms that supply the kind of things that are needed to carry on a war. I should like to see the bishops and the clergy and the statesmen who hold those shares take action and call meetings of the various companies and stop the manufacture of these things for the time being. It is said that these people invest their money for self-defence, for the defence of our country, and so on. Here is an opportunity of testing their bona fides.

I should also like to say that I take my stand on the doctrines laid down by the Lord President of the Council in the powerful speech that he delivered on Disarmament only a very few weeks ago. He appealed to the young men and the young women of the land, and it is often said about this House that old men like myself and others stand in the way of the young men. Very well; here is a chance for the young men to exert themselves; here is an opportunity for the young men who do not want to be landed into another Armageddon to come forward and take their stand and try to put an end to the danger of this terrible catastrophe that may overtake the world —another world war.

I want to remind hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, though again it will probably be only a matter for humour with them, that 10,000,000 men were sacrificed in the last Great War, and that, in our own country, literally millions were bruised and battered and destroyed. We old men survived because we were not called upon to go, but the youth who ought now to be carrying on in this country were decimated and destroyed, and they were destroyed because people put expediency first. I sat on those benches in the years from 1910 to 1912, when all the discussions used to take place about our engagements with the French in case of war, and I heard the statement of Sir Edward Grey, now Lord Grey of Fallodon, in regard to our assertions as to what would happen if certain things continued. In the end we were proved right, and the Government of the day and its advisers were proved wrong. The Great War came. To-day, I believe, the world is living under the shadow of an even greater catastrophe; I believe that events in the Far East may lead to more widespread devastation; and it is because I believe that that I stand here to-day and ask that this Committee should call upon the Government to act on its own behalf and on behalf of the British people, and say that, while Japan holds on her path of Imperialist crushing of a nation weaker than herself, we will have no part or lot with her at all, but will just stand outside it.

I would also like our Government to make one more effort with the Japanese Government to bring them to reason. Imperialism has been of no use for this nation, and of no use to the world. You can see the wreckage that it has caused all over the world to-day. The Japanese Government and the Japanese nation have come into the whirlpool of commercial expansion later than others, but they have come in at a time when the great Imperialist nations of the world are all trembling to ruin, and it is because I believe that that I think our Government should make even another appeal to the Japanese people and the Japanese Government to hold their hands, and, instead of pursuing the way of force and slaughter and domination, to try to come to an understanding with the people of China. I do not believe that that is impossible. I believe that, if the Japanese Government would give up their, so to speak, forcible will, and come to reason, they could come to an understanding with the Chinese nation that would be satisfactory to them and satisfactory to China.

Sir J. SIMON: It will, I think, be for the convenience of the Committee if I follow the right hon. Gentleman at once, and before the end of the Debate, if necessary, some further statement can still be made from the Government Bench. I would like to begin by saying that I find myself in entire agreement with the right hon. Gentleman in respect of something that he said at the beginning of his speech, and in respect of something that he said just at the end. I think we shall all be in agreement with him in both the sentiments to which I refer. He said in his first sentence that, in taking part in the Debate, he and his friends dealt with the subject on the basis that he wished this country to be and to remain the good friend both of China and of Japan. I am grateful to him for having stated that so clearly. It is the basis upon which we all ought to proceed, and I am sure that nothing that anybody will say in any part of this Committee will be designed for one moment to suggest the opposite. I also agree with what the right hon. Gentleman said in his concluding sentences. He said that, after all the many efforts that had been made, he still wanted to appeal and to do anything that he could to induce the parties to this unhappy conflict to meet together and reach a mode of conciliation. That is everybody's desire, and that is the justification for the time that has been occupied at Geneva on the effort to conciliate. I am very glad indeed that the right hon. Gentleman, in his peroration, should have admitted that it was a worthy object, and even now should be pursued.

The course of the British Government in this matter has been perfectly clear, perfectly consistent, and perfectly straightforward from beginning to end, and I was a little sorry not to hear from the right hon. Gentleman an admission that he now recognised how mistaken all those critics were who were suggesting or insinuating some months ago that the British Government was not prepared to stand by the Lytton Report. The truth is that from the very beginning, quite openly, and in speaking both to the Chinese and to the Japanese representatives privately, I have made plain what has been throughout the position of the British Government. It is that this is a matter which by every possible means ought to be brought to an end by conciliation; but, if conciliation failed, or failed for the time being, there was no view of this contest which could possibly be put in rivalry or in contrast with the view that has been expressed by the report of the Lytton Commission. A great many people some months ago were insinuating doubt and suggesting that when the time came we should not stand by our word, or that I in the meantime was endeavouring to pursue some other course. Never. From beginning to end, without the slightest change of attitude, we have said that conciliation is the first task. It is the provision of Article 15 of the Covenant that you should endeavour to conciliate. Let us do it by every manner of means. But, should conciliation unhappily fail, then the view that must be taken of this matter is the view that is unanimously taken by the League's own Commission, the Commission presided over by Lord Lytton. The right hon. Gentleman at one moment seemed to me not to have read the Lytton Report as closely as I feel sure he must have done. He was explaining his view that we were here in the presence of nothing more than a simple, uncomplicated transgression over the frontier of one country of the armies of a foreign State. May I ask his attention to a paragraph in the Lytton Report? I will read it to the Committee. It is at page 126:

> "It must be apparent to every reader of the preceding chapters that the issues involved in this conflict are not as simple as they are often represented to be. They are on the contrary exceedingly complicated, and only an intimate knowledge of all the facts, as well as of their historical background, should entitle anyone to express a definite opinion upon them. This is not a case in which one country has declared war on another country without previously exhausting the opportunities for conciliation provided in the Covenant of the League of Nations. Neither is it a simple case of the violation of the frontier of one country by the armed forces of a neighbouring country, because in Manchuria there are many features without an exact parallel in other parts of the world."

The right hon. Gentleman is quite entitled to say, and as a matter of fact I agree with him, that it is to the last degree regrettable that, as month has followed month, the situation has become more and more aggravated, and that this advance of Japanese troops is not in accordance with the Covenant of the League. I agree with him entirely, but he is not entitled to say that we were faced in the first instance with one of those simple issues which any sensible man could dispose of.

Mr. LANSBURY: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman does not want to misinterpret what I said or what I meant. The simple point that I made was that the Japanese Government, instead of referring the dispute to the League, simply invaded and has carried on an invasion of the territory, and herself has determined by force to do just what she thinks is right.

Sir J. SIMON: I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman will find that on this point we are necessarily at issue. I must be allowed to speak within the recollection of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman's point was that there has been a highly regrettable delay on the part of the Government of this country, and, in particular, he quoted Lord Hailsham in another place to confirm it. The reason I interposed to ask him what was the date of the quotation was that it appeared as the result of that inquiry that Lord Hailsham's statement was made before the Lytton Commission had ever reported. If there is a difference between us, I am well content that it should be thus defined. It is right for people to form a conclusion, after having appointed a Commission to find out the facts, by examining what the Commission said, and I do not think it would be in the least degree in accordance with the traditions of this country or of fair international dealing that, after first requiring that a Commission should be appointed, over which a fellow subject of our own was appointed to preside, the British Government should make a pronouncement when the Commission itself had not yet reported. But the Commission has now reported. It is a perfectly simple and straightforward document. It it a unanimous report by members drawn from five different countries including one from the United States. It is the report of a Commission appointed by the League of Nations itself and all the experience at Geneva goes to show that, if you appoint a Commission, adequately staffed, it goes to the spot, gets its information on the spot and then presents a unanimous report, it would be an extremely strong order if the League of Nations did not pay due attention to what the report says. I have never varied from that view from one moment to another since the report has been made.

What does the report say? Let me at once agree with the right hon. Gentleman on what is the main point, that there is no doubt at all that the methods that have been followed by Japan in this controversy and the actions that she has taken are not in accordance with the provisions of the Covenant of the League. To use a common expression, Japan has taken the law into her own hands, and it is beyond any possibility of doubt or dispute that the Covenant of the League lays down that you should not take the law into your own hands, but shall use the machinery which the League provides. I hope I have stated that with as much bluntness and plainness as to satisfy everyone. I have no doubt about it at all. But you do a grave injustice if you stop there and do not admit that the case of Japan was one which involved many complications, that she has in fact had very severe trials to put up with, that she has been dealing with a neighbour who has been extremely difficult to deal with and that her situation, apparently her lawful situation in Manchuria, is something quite exceptional in the history of the world. Consequently, in the first instance the action of the Japanese army does not in the least resemble the invasion by a foreign force of some other country, because Japan in fact has exceptional rights over strips of territory there.

You must also, if you are going to be fair, admit, as I said at Geneva, that the Lytton Report is not a one-sided document. It endeavours to produce a balanced judgment, and I notice that very epithet "a balanced statement" comes in the unanimous report which has now been adopted by the League itself. I have got into terrible hot water because I pointed out at Geneva that this document contains a balanced judgment. It says it is quite true that the anti-foreignism of China and the lengths to which she and her people have carried the boycott created a situation of the greatest possible difficulty. If you want a simple proof of it it is to be found in the fact that, although the Lytton Commission makes the strong recommendation which it makes and which the British Government adopt and support, it also says it would not be satisfactory to go back and to restore the status quo as it was before 18th September, 1931.

I believe I have stated without any sort of bias or prejudice what is the substance of this report. I have never doubted for a moment that it was a report which should be adopted by the League, and, when I say adopted, I mean not only the eight chapters which are a historical statement, but the recommendations that are found in it. That is what the League of Nations has done. The Committee will be well advised to observe that Lord Lytton and his colleagues, studying this thing so closely, have not made recommendations for sanctions or vehement action or compulsion in any form at all. What they have done is to recommend a series of methods of approach between one side and the other, and they have urged that we of the League of Nations should do everything we can in order to promote that approach. I was a little astonished when I heard the right hon. Gentleman, with his well-known record from a point of view which we greatly respect, saying in effect that in his view, unless the League of Nations was to proceed by methods of sanction and compulsion, he did not see what was the good of our belonging to the League of Nations at all. I should have thought he was the last man in the world to belittle the moral effect of the judgment of the world. I take the view that the fact that 42 nations have pronounced a unanimous judgment, in which they have adopted the report of a perfectly fair commission, is a fact and an event in the history of the world. Gentlemen of the right hon. Gentleman's opinions and persuasion ought to be the first to rejoice over it. I altogether repudiate the idea that, when the League of Nations has adopted that unanimous view, it has not itself done a great thing. I am very glad that the Government of this country has from first to last taken its full share in getting that done. I wish to express my obligations to the Under-Secretary who with great skill and to our complete satisfaction, has seen to it that the British Government took its proper stand and played its proper part.

Now the right hon. Gentleman asks what are we going to do—a perfectly proper and a very important question to ask. In particular, he has referred to the question I am now going to deal with, namely, what could or could not be done in the matter of the continued supply of arms to the Far East. Even if nothing was done, I should regard the unanimous declaration of the League as a great fact and a real contribution on the long view to world peace. I should regard it as wholly unfair to Japan if we did not recognise that her circumstances and her trials were undoubtedly exceptional, and I should regard it as wholly unfair to China, and not being a faithful member of the League if we did not say that, after all, the Covenant of the League does not authorise people to take the law into their own hands, and that Japan has not acted in the way that the Covenant of the League suggested.

In those circumstances, it is perfectly natural that a demand should arise which calls for action which would prevent the sustaining, the fostering, the fomenting of the conflict by the supply of arms. I do not think I should be in the least representing the feelings of the vast mass of my fellow-countrymen if I were to speak of that sentiment and attitude in any way but in the way of sincere respect and understanding and sympathy. It would be a great satisfaction to many of us, especially in view of the efforts that we have made and are making to promote disarmament and spread the basis of peace, if we could feel that our own country was taking no part in supplying the means of carrying on the conflict, or if we could secure international action to produce that result more effectively. That is a sentiment which is a deep and sincere sentiment not in the least confined to cranks and queer people. It is the view of many a man who does not otherwise think very deeply of this class of issue. It is a horrible thing in their view that profit should be made out of the supply of the means of provoking fighting which is neither necessary nor just. The Government have started with that very clearly before our minds.

Now I am going to analyse the situation and then I will answer the right hon. Gentleman's question. A very little consideration and reflection leads inevitably to this view that, if this kind of thing is going to be effectively and finally stopped, it can only be stopped by international agreement. I do not ask anyone to approve that sentiment as an easy means of relieving our own conscience. I state it as a fact, and it is a very obvious fact. As a matter of fact, we have had a little experience of this. Some years ago an effort was made to stop the supply of arms to China at a time when civil war was rampant. Very great international efforts were made, but it is a very moot point whether we really succeeded in stopping arms going in. In this country we certainly stopped the supply, but with one or two other exceptions I doubt whether it would be said that armaments from other countries in the world ceased to go in. The thing has to be done internationally if it is to be really effective. President Hoover said in Congress the other day that the efforts of a single nation to stop the armaments traffic was bound to be futile. As a matter of fact, in this country we are provided with rather better machinery for the purpose of stopping the arms traffic than most countries, I think than any other, because we have an armaments Order-in-Council which means that when arms and ammunition according to a prescribed list are going to be exported from any port in the United Kingdom they will only be passed by the Customs if a licence is produced which authorises that particular traffic to proceed, and, therefore, we must face the fact that we in this country whether for good or for evil have a machine in our hands which could be used. Most other countries, I am informed, are not in that position, and, with regard to the United States, I understand the position really is that the executive has no power to stop it. I am very glad to see that a message was sent to Congress suggesting that they might legislate so as to confer power on the President, but they have not at present done so.

It is perfectly plain, therefore, that, if you are going to do this thing effectively it can only be done by international agreement. The British Government lost no time in trying to find out what could be done in that direction and as soon as ever it became plain that the report of the Committee of Nineteen would be adopted by the League, but that unhappily Japan would not accept it we made inquiries. We communicated with some half-dozen of the principal arms-producing countries in the world. As a matter of fact, before you can get a system of international control you will have to do more than that, because there are countries which sell arms and do not produce them. There are all sorts of roundabout ways in which the thing may happen. Those inquiries have not yet been answered; and in no case have they been answered finally. But I will say this, that we have been very active in making those inquiries.

In the discussions at Geneva the representative of the United Kingdom Government was instructed to raise this matter before a committee which is called the Advisory Committee. I believe that to-day or to-morrow it is likely to come under consideration there. Therefore, I would like to say to the Committee in regard to the first point, realising, as everybody must, that the only effective method of stopping the thing is International agreement, we have ourselves been as energetic and active about it as any Government could possibly be. That does not exhaust the matter. As the right hon. Gentleman said, one thing is to do your best to secure the effective International control of arms to the Far East. If you do that, you should be active in making inquiries of other countries, which is what we have done; but at the very best it will take a little time, not only to get a decision, but to get enough information to know whether a decision is possible.

We therefore have by no means overlooked the other question which the right hon. Gentleman put across the Table just now. The question is: Is there any action which can be taken by this country by itself? On that I have two propositions to put to the Committee. The first is, that when you have passed from the sort of action which the League of Nations, or which a great International Conference, including America, might take to the sort of action which an individual country might take, you manifestly are moving into a very different atmosphere, and, for practical and conclusive reasons, very different considerations apply. I therefore lay down this proposition from which we shall not budge. It is impracticable for a single country like ourselves acting alone to differentiate between one combatant and another. I do not think the Committee would require that I should develop the reasons, some of which will occur to any man of ordinary sense and prudence.

Mr. MAXTON: I wish you would. I should like to hear those reasons.

Sir J. SIMON: For the benefit of the hon. Member, I will certainly develop one at once. It would be the height of absurdity for a cargo designed to go to the port of "X" at a time when we have decreed that in no circumstances it shall go to the port of "Y," to find itself in the China Seas and in danger of being interfered with, because the authority of "Y" have plenty of powers in those seas and "X" have no power. I think that I am myself enough of a pacifist to take this view, that, however we handle this matter, I do not intend my own country to get into trouble about it. I have made the first of my two propositions purely for the purpose of clearing the mind of the hon. Member. I think that what I have said will satisfy the Members of the Committee of this: First of all, that international consideration as quickly as possible is, no doubt, the best process and the one most likely to lead to effective results, and, secondly, that if there was to be any action by a single nation like ourselves, it could not be differentially distinguished between "X" and "Y." The choice, therefore, is between Departments here day by day granting positive licences to exporters whether the cargo is going to be consigned to China or Japan, and refusing licences for either one or the other.

We have done everything in our power to hasten international consideration of the subject, and, pending that consideration, as from now we believe that any efforts and any sacrifices are worth making which will reduce the risk of widening the field of conflict or of prolonging the bloodshed. We believe that the general sense of the country at this time would be opposed to a decision which, by freely admitting the dispatch of arms—and it involves a positive authority from a Government Department—would undoubtedly help to foment the struggle and increase the slaughter. Contracts which have been already made—existing contracts already entered into—must be respected or you may get demands for compensation and have all sorts of injustices done. But subject to this we have decided that as from to-day, and pending the opportunity of international consultation and decision such as I hope for, the Government will not authorise the issue of licences for export to either China or Japan of any article mentioned in the Arms Export Prohibition Order, 1931.

I am perfectly well aware—no doubt if I said so you would point it out to me at once—that that decision will not in itself prevent the supply of arms to the Far East from other sources—certainly not. Some people may say that it may even stimulate it. Yet, it will be the first time, Mr. Chairman, as far as I know, in which any neutral Government, certainly any neutral Government which manufactures arms, has taken positive action of this kind in reference to a distant conflict with which we do not mean in any circumstances to concern ourselves. But we ask for the approval of the House for a bold decision which involves the country in no controversy with either party and which, we believe, will commend itself to the better judgment of the country.

Let me say a single word in conclusion. The right hon. Gentleman when he began, said that in his view these recent developments in the Far East were bringing about a situation fit to be compared with the fearful situation of 1914 to 1918. The Government have good reason to know, and I have had good reason to know for many months, how anxious is the task of so handling this matter as not to involve these frightful circumstances. There is one great difference between 1914 and now, and it is this: in no circumstances will this Government authorise this country to be a party to the struggle.

Sir HERBERT SAMUEL: The Committee have listened with very close attention to the important statement made by the Foreign Secretary on a matter which is one, not only of very grave moment to this country but to the whole world. In the first place, I should like to express my concurrence with what has been said both by the right hon. Gentleman and by the Leader of the Opposition as to the general attitude in which the House of Commons and, I believe, the country at large approaches this dispute. It is not in the least an attitude of enmity or hostility to Japan. For years we were proud to be the allies of Japan. We were the first country to give her a helping hand when she came out from her isolation into the full comity of nations. This country has a profound respect for the ancient civilisation of Japan, for her high culture, her art and her literature, and has an admiration for her modern efficiency. We should be fully as ready to side for Japan as to side against her, and, if in this matter public opinion is running strongly against the action of the Japanese Government, it is solely upon the merits of the case.

It is recognised fully that the wrongs, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, are not all on one side. The Lytton Commission, which was a wholly impartial body, fully recognised that fact. They appreciated the Japanese standpoint as well as the Chinese. They did not recommend merely a return to the status quo. On the contrary, they proposed large changes, having regard to the special interests of Japan. The most significant feature in the whole of this matter is the complete unanimity which has been obtained for international action along certain lines. The Lytton Commission, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, was completely unanimous, like the Simon Commission, and, I may add, the Samuel Commission. It contained, be it remembered, not only a British chairman but also members drawn from America, France, Germany and Italy, all of them bringing impartial minds to bear and all reaching to the same conclusion without even a single note of dissension. The Committee of Nineteen, containing representatives of that number of nations, was, again, absolutely unanimous, and when the matter came before the Assembly of the League more than 40 nations declared unanimously their opinions. Since then a most important event has occurred. It is announced in the Press to-day that the Government of the United States, in general terms, adheres to the decision of the League of Nations. It is a contrast compared with what used to happen in the past. My right hon. Friend sitting behind me can well remember the discussions on matters, not of the Far East but the Near East, when what was called the Concert of Europe always struck a discordant note, each Power playing its own instrument in its own way, and unanimity was never obtainable.

It is a most remarkable fact that to-day we have complete unanimity on the part of all authorities who have brought their minds to bear on the problem, and I think that the thanks of this House, and of the country, are due to the members of the League of Nations, the members of the Lytton Commission, and the members of the committee led by Monsieur Hymans, its distinguished Chairman, who by great care and tact have succeeded in securing a unanimous guidance for the world. It has proved how widespread is the recognition now that it is essential that there should be a world order, and that the League of Nations should be effectively its initiator and its guardian. When the Japanese say to us, as their delegate said when quitting the Assembly two days ago: "Look at history. All you European Powers have in the past scrambled for territory, how can you cast the stone at us?", the answer, clearly, is, that although it is true that there is substance in it, looking at past history, the modern world has turned to different courses. The very fact that the League of Nations exists to prevent the great scramble of imperialist Powers from engaging in aggression shows that we have turned to other lines.

With regard especially to China, all the Powers concerned at the Washington Conference, including Japan, solemnly resolved that they would not take advantage of the disunion and weakness of China to promote their own separate interests. The British Government restored to China the Port of Wei-hai-Wei and the surrounding territory as earnest of our sincerity in the matter. If the old international morality had prevailed, with modern armaments, China would have been dismembered long ago. There is no reason why all the great Powers should pass a self-denying ordinance and say that they would not for their own selfish interests intervene in China, in order that one among their number, without rivalry or competition, should take advantage of that self-denying ordinance in order herself alone to promote her own interests, to the detriment of China.

There is one further consideration which, I am sure, the House will have in mind with respect to the supply of arms and with respect to the levying of any embargo upon imports and exports. This matter should be considered in no degree from the point of view of national trade. If we forgo the right to supply arms to Japan, we should have no regard to the fact that that involves the sacrifice of orders, profits and employment to many of our manufacturers and workmen. It will be a sacrifice, but the matter should not be considered on that plane. That cannot be the predominant motive. Similarly, if the question arises now or in the future of joining in any embargo on imports into Japan, or exports from Japan, that would have the opposite effect of being an advantage to our trade in many particulars, but that consideration also should be quite sincerely dismissed from our minds. If such action should ever come forward for consideration, whether it be right or wrong, expedient or inexpedient, it should be considered solely from the standpoint of whether it is legitimate or necessary in order to secure the observance of the judgment of the League of Nations.

These are the general considerations which form the background for any conclusions which we may reach with respect to the urgent question of an embargo upon the export of arms either to Japan alone or to both countries. I am convinced that the thoughts predominant in the minds of the people of this country at this moment are these: The fact that the Chinese should have been unjustifiably attacked, is very bad; that we and other Powers are unable immediately and effectively to intervene and protect them is worse; but that they should be continuously attacked with the aid of guns, tanks, aeroplanes, shells and bombs, which British people shall have made and sold for that purpose, would be quite intolerable. If it should prove to be the case that the Chinese are able to raise a gallant defence of their territory, and if ship after ship were to leave our ports containing cargoes of munitions of war to enable the Japanese to bear down that defence, I believe the conscience of the British nation would revolt against that and that public opinion would not endure it. That should be the predominant consideration, and our policy in all these matters must conform with that view.

[Sir H. Samuel.]

Having said that, I agree with what the Leader of the Opposition and the Foreign Secretary declared that, obviously, the right course to pursue is by international action; the duty does not lie on this country alone or upon any other country alone. The duty of such intervention as may be necessary rests upon all equally. I am sure the whole of the Committee will have heard with satisfaction the Foreign Secretary's declaration that already the British Government have taken the initiative in bringing this matter before the League of Nations and asking for a very early decision. We trust that the matter will be quickly discussed by the League and that they will be able to arrive at a decision with the same unanimity as in these other matters, and that they will receive the endorsement, the concurrence and the co-operation of both the United States and Russia.

The Foreign Secretary has made a clear declaration of the course which the Government intend to take with regard to the immediate situation. He has pointed out the difficulties of taking individual action on the part of this country, if that action were to discriminate between Japan and China. At the same time the fact has to be realised that in stopping the import of arms to both China and Japan the practical effect will be injurious to Chinese interests, because China depends upon the purchase of arms from foreign countries far more than does Japan. Consequently, if both countries were isolated from the world in the matter of arms it would be an enormous advantage to the Japanese attack, which is fed by her great arsenals, and a great disadvantage to the Chinese defence, which has to be supplied largely from foreign sources. If this were the case and were seen to be the case after a lapse of some months, if, unhappily, the hostilities were to continue so long, it might be that in any future eventuality countries would realise that they might, if put on their own self-defence against an aggressive Power, acting in defiance of the Covenant of the League of Nations, be cut off from supplies, and that it would be to their interest to meet the case beforehand by establishing their own arsenals. Therefore it might be that action of this kind, taken with the best of intentions by this country, individually, or conceivably by the League collectively, would result in giving an impetus to the establishment of more arsenals, State arsenals, in many countries where they do not now exist and where they would be a centre of militarist influence.

On the other hand, it is a fact that the imposition of an embargo upon the supply of arms to Japan alone, whether by this country or by the League, will create a new situation, certainly new in international law. The old rule of neutrality doubtfully applies in the present situation. There are three differences between the situation now and what it would have been before the Great War in the matter of the supply of what is regarded as contraband of war by neutral nations. In the first place, the whole conception of neutrality must be altered by the fact of the existence of the League and the declaration of a judgment by the League. Can there be a legal neutrality when there has been a formal declaration of a judgment internationally against one of the parties to the dispute? Can the old conception of neutrality hold, particularly in this matter of the supply of arms? Mr. Stimson has very clearly declared to the contrary. The Secretary of State of the United States in a formal document, a memorandum officially communicated to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives of Congress, has said, in a case where the League has passed judgment that one of two parties is the aggressor.

> "If the League or any other comprehensive group of important States mutually arrived at such a verdict the participation of the United States in a general arms embargo would be not merely practical and sound but practically necessary to preserve our national dignity and standing as a peaceful nation."

This declaration, coming from that source, is of profound importance in this connection. It shows that Mr. Stimson is taking a different view from that which would have been taken before the War in regard to the matter of neutrality.

Mr. WALLHEAD: Is that in connection with the present dispute?

Sir H. SAMUEL: Yes. It was made a few days ago. Secondly, we have now in the Far East a state of warfare though not a state of war. The Pact of Paris has in this situation not succeeded in preventing war from being waged but only in preventing war from being declared. What is the outcome from the standpoint of international law? Are we to regard the situation as being one in which war de facto exists, or one in which the ordinary rules of commerce in times of peace are still to apply? Thirdly, there is this difference between the present situation and that which existed before the War, that we have the Order-in-Council, to which the Foreign Secretary has made reference, which imposes upon the Government the duty of granting or of withholding licences for particular consignments of arms to be sent from particular ports in this country to particular ports abroad. That means that to-day the Government have to take specific action one way or the other by granting or withholding from this country or to that country the supply of arms. Previously, the supply of arms was a matter for private enterprise, and the contractor took his own risk and acted on his own authority. Now, there is and must be direct Government intervention. Consequently, the action of the Government becomes a matter of international law and international policy, and it has to be considered from that point of view.

All these circumstances make the situation an entirely new one and, for the first time, very grave decisions have to be taken by individual countries and the League of Nations. The difficulties that may arise from individual action to the detriment of an individual Power has been indicated by the Foreign Secretary, but that is not a reason for taking no action; it is a very strong reason for urgently desiring joint action, for if the whole world take the necessary steps simultaneously the situation will be quite different from that which might occur if only one nation takes action alone. We have the duty to participate with other Powers in the establishment of world order, but there is no obligation to make the British Navy the sole policeman of the world. Those who believe most strongly in collective action should be unwilling to anticipate it by individual action. The right hon. Gentleman has said that, for the time being and pending an international decision, the Government are withholding any further licences for the export of arms to the Far East, with the exception of those that are sent in accordance with running contracts. I think the Committee would like to have at some stage information as to what those running contracts are and how long they are likely to continue. If it means that Japan will be entitled to secure for a period of months, or it may be years, very large quantities of arms from manufacturers in this country, the conscience of the nation would revolt against it, and it would be urged that some steps should be taken to terminate the obligation under those contracts. I trust that this temporary arrangement will be only for a very brief period, for it would work to the detriment of China rather than that of Japan.

Lastly, I am convinced that the Committee and the country would desire that in other directions, apart from the supply of arms, Great Britain should withhold aid and assistance of every kind from Japan, who have been declared to be the aggressor in this matter, particularly, as the Leader of the Opposition suggested, in respect of loans and credits. Japan will find herself subject to very severe economic strain. There has already been a great increase in her national expenditure and a great decline in her revenue. There was a deficit in her Budget of this year of £90,000,000. Her currency has fallen to nearly half its value and there has been consequently a rapid rise in domestic prices. Meanwhile, she has undertaken the task of maintaining order and good government throughout the vast territory of Manchukuo, in which it is estimated that there are at the present time no fewer than 200,000 so-called bandits, who overrun the country.

It may be that economic forces, combined with the moral pressure of world opinion, will after no long interval bring Japan to a more reasonable state of mind. That is what I am sure all her wellwishers, and there are many in this country, will most earnestly desire. For generations Japan kept herself in isolation from the world, and in that isolation developed her own distinguished and distinctive civilisation. Then she came into the full stream of international life, cultural, industrial, commercial, political. Now, for the moment perhaps let us hope, she has withdrawn again into a position of moral isolation; she is alone at this moment in the whole world. The Japanese are a proud, a sensitive and a great, people and they cannot be insensible to the opinion of the world. It is in no spirit of enmity but rather in a spirit of true and abiding friendship that humanity says to Japan: "You are on the wrong path; aggressive militarism by anyone, anywhere, is an injury to us all everywhere; and if you wish to recover the respect of mankind you should change your course." That should be the message to Japan in these days from all the Parliaments of mankind, and first from this Parliament, the oldest and not the least illustrious of them all.

Mr. LANSBURY: May I be allowed to ask the Foreign Secretary whether he is able to state to the House the actual proposal as to an embargo which the Under-Secretary is recommending to the Committee that is to be set up?

Sir J. SIMON: I cannot make a precise statement on that subject at the moment. The matter, as I have said, has been the subject of some communications to a number of Governments. I am a long way from Geneva, and Geneva is a long way from here, and I must await a report from the Under-Secretary as to the state of feeling he finds there. If the object is to arrange some international action it is better to consult with one another without prejudice rather than for one country to try to dictate to the rest.

Mr. LANSBURY: It is not a question of dictation.

Sir AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Like other hon. Members I awaited the discussion to-day with great interest and with some anxiety as to what might be the declaration made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Nobody who recalls the previous speeches I have made in our discussions on this Far Eastern trouble will accuse me of being actuated other than by motives of sincere respect for the great island Empire of the East and a real friendship for her people. When these troubles began in Manchuria the facts were obscure, and, having regard to the long continued and severe provocation which the Japanese had suffered at the hands of China, my sympathies were wholly with Japan, and I found it difficult to keep a balanced judgment, which it was right and proper we should maintain, until the facts were more clearly known. Gradually as the situation has developed my sympathy with Japan and Japanese policy has diminished, and we have reached a stag at which, in the light of the report of th Lytton Commission and the discussions a Geneva, it seems to me that it is impossible to contend that the action o Japan in Manchuria is compatible wit the obligations she undertook when sh signed the Covenant, is reconcilabl with the terms of the Pact of Paris, t which her signature is also attached, o does not directly contradict and disavo the obligations of the Nine Power Treaty. I think that Japan has bee hurried, rashly and unwisely, into a adventure, the end of which may be fa distant and the expenditure of which i blood and treasure may be far greate than her people now foresee.

I was glad to hear my right hon Friend the Foreign Secretary make som answer to the suggestion of the right hon Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition that if the League could not stop this wa at once, or stop these warlike operation at once, or did not at once enforc sanctions against the party which wa found to be in the wrong, the League wa a failure and those of us who were prepared to leave it at that had better mov that this country should leave the League I cannot really believe that on reflectio the right hon. Member for Bow an Bromley (Mr. Lansbury) holds thos views. Although the success of the Leagu is very imperfect, although its first decision has been long delayed in the effor for conciliation, and even though the results of that decision may be delayed stil longer, I cannot think that the verdict o the assembled world united at Genev will count for nothing in the settlemen of these issues when that settlemen comes. There is no nation in the worl to-day, however strong, however mighty however powerful its arms, that ca afford to neglect the judgments a Geneva. I have a shrewd suspicion tha in Japan, as elsewhere, as these judgments and their meaning come to b known, they will exercise a decisive effec on the ultimate settlement of th questions in dispute.

Those of us who pin some part of ou faith to the League of Nations hav naturally been asking ourselves th question which the right hon. Member fo Bow and Bromley put to my right hon Friend: what is to follow upon the dec sion of the League? There was one sentence used by the right hon. Gentlema in which once again, I think, he failed to convey his real meaning. I hope he will look it up in the Official Report, and I think he will find that it may be necessary to make some correction. If the words of the right hon. Gentleman are taken literally, he is an advocate of the most bellicose policy, amounting to a blockade by this nation, even if we stand alone, of commerce with Japan. I know that men who are passionately devoted to peace are apt to feel more bellicose than anyone else, but surely the right hon. Gentleman does not contemplate the possibility of thrusting this country into this struggle, and thrusting it in with no international mandate and as no part of any common international action. I am quite certain that in no quarter of the House would a policy of that kind meet with wholehearted support, and I am also quite certain that opinion outside would not support a Government which acted so unwisely and so rashly.

The country, I believe, will applaud the statement of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. His Majesty's Government do not mean this country to be actively involved in this dispute. Having regard to the fact that the export of arms from this country is no longer a matter simply of letting be, but requires an active act by the Government, His Majesty's Government are right to say that arms shall not go to a nation which has been found in default by its refusal to accept the award, the decision, the advice, or whatever you like to call it, unanimously given by the League of Nations. And reluctant as I am to agree, I say it quite frankly, I do agree that, acting for the present alone and without international agreement, it follows that if we do not supply arms to one party we must not supply arms to the other. I rejoice that my right hon. Friend has moved, I think he said as soon as it became clear, that the decision of the Assembly would be unanimous—I do not think I should wrong him if I guessed that he had moved even earlier—in order to obtain international action in this matter. I hope he will press for international action, and press for it not only at Geneva but with other Governments, great Governments, which have been co-operating with the League in this matter and co-operating also in the Disarmament Conference.

Can any nation which has signed the Covenant feel that it is in accordance with the spirit of that Covenant that it should by a trade in arms lend aid and comfort to some other nation which is in default in the observation of the obligations it has undertaken? Can any nation which has signed the Pact of Paris say that it is compatible with the meaning and spirit of that Pact, that when a nation dishonours its signature to it and acts in defiance of it, the other signatories to the Pact should supply it with the arms with which to continue its wrongdoing? I think we can make a strong appeal to our fellow-signatories of the Covenant, and, what is equally important, to our fellow-signatories of the Pact of Paris or the Kellogg Pact, who do not happen to be members of the League of Nations, to accept the consequences which follow from those two instances, and to join us in an international agreement to give effect to it. I attach the more importance to that because it is quite evident, as my right hon. Friend has just said, that a mere refusal to supply arms to both parties may in many cases do great injustice.

Indeed, if I may I would treat this subject not as merely being a feature of the Sino-Japanese dispute, but as a great question of world policy at this moment, with examples arising not merely in the Far East, but in South America, where similar questions arise and similar decisions may have to be taken by the League and by other nations not concerned in the League. Again I venture to emphasise the point that I am not now discussing the Sino-Japanese difficulties; I am discussing a broad question in general terms, and not in reference to any two particular countries, whether they be countries of the Far East or of South America. It must be evident that if one country, A, is meditating war against another country, B, in defiance of its engagements under the Pact of Paris or Kellogg Pact, it will not take overt action until it has secured what it thinks is a sufficient armament to carry through the campaign which it sees in front of it. It is the nation which is not preparing for war, which is contemplating no act of aggression on its neighbours but desires only to live in peace with them and all the world, which is the one that is likely to be found short, and if the only rule that the world can come to is that, where there is a struggle between two nations in defiance of those engagements, neither shall draw supplies of arms from any part of the world, very imperfect justice will be done.

I think the adoption of a rule that, where the League had been appealed to, a unanimous decision given and concurred in by the great Powers not represented directly in the League, no arms should go from any of them to the country which refuses to accept that decision, would ultimately be the right one, though for the time being the compromise adopted by His Majesty's Government seems to me the only wise, and indeed the only safe course. The Government do not need my incentive because they have already acted, but I beg them to press these considerations on the other Powers concerned, whilst they continue, as my right hon. Friend throughout these anxious months has continued, to try yet to bring together the two parties in the Far East, and to cause them to compose their differences and accept a solution which will be honourable and satisfactory to both.

Mr. MORGAN JONES: I think the whole Committee will join with me in expressing thanks to the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken on the very valuable contribution he has made to our discussion. The right hon. Gentleman knows that I rarely find myself able to congratulate him upon the sentiments that he expresses, and it is a pleasure therefore to do so to-day. I was not only impressed by what the right hon. Gentleman said concerning the problem that now arises for our consideration, but I was deeply impressed by his observations on the problems that are consequential to this present dispute, especially the very big and increasingly pressing problem as to what arrangements the League of Nations could undertake in order to safeguard the interests of nations while they are loyal to their membership of the League. But I do not propose to follow the right hon. Gentleman along that very interesting line of inquiry, because primarily that is a matter for the League itself to discuss. I would, however, like to say something upon the first part of the Foreign Secretary's speech.

When the Leader of the Opposition was speaking he was subjected, a little unfairly at times, I thought, to interruption by supporters of the Government. It was not an unfair deduction to make that some of the interrupters desired to imply more or less their whole-hearted approval of Japan's attitude in this crisis. It seemed to me not unfair to assume also that they regarded their attitude as in consonance with the attitude of their own party in the last few years. In point of fact every single political party in this House is definitely committed upon the question as to whether Japan or China has the right of exercising suzerainty over the area called Manchuria. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Sir A. Chamberlain) when he was Foreign Secretary in the year 1928 made that clear on two occasions. On 13th July, 1928, he answered a question addressed to him by Mr. Malone, and used these very clear and precise words:

> "His Majesty's Government regard Manchuria as being part of China. They do not recognise Japan as having any special interests in that territory other than those conferred by Treaty and those referred to in Baron Shidehara's statement at the Plenary Session of the Washington Conference on 4th February, 1922."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 13th July, 1928; col. 2637, Vol. 219.]

The same Member, Mr. Malone, referred to the problem again by an interruption of a speech made by the right hon. Gentleman on 30th July, 1928, and I will read the passage from the OFFICIAL REPORT:

> "Mr. MALONE: What is our attitude towards Japanese intervention in Manchuria?
> Sir A. CHAMBERLAIN: We do not recognise Manchuria as anything but a part of China. We recognise that Japan has great interests in Manchuria, which has a great Japanese population, and may well have a certain anxiety as to the protection of those persons. But our interest is a united China under one Government, which can take obligations and keep obligations, and with which we can negotiate a friendly settlement and maintain friendly relations."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 30th July, 1928; col. 1835, Vol. 220.]

The right hon. Gentleman made it clear what was the attitude of his Government at that time. The then leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Member for Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd George), followed the Foreign Secretary's pronouncement by saying this:

> "I was very delighted to hear the declaration which my right hon. Friend made in regard to Manchuria. It is very difficult to say anything in this House which looks like a criticism of a friendly Power, but it is quite incomprehensible to me why a friendly Power like Japan has taken certain steps with regard to Shantung and Manchuria. They have refused, I understand, to recognise the flag in Manchuria. I hope that that does not mean that there is going to be a practical annexation of that vast territory by Japan."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 30th July, 1928; col. 1845, Vol. 220.]

I have taken the trouble to read those passages in order to make it clear that every single political party in this House, long before the present crisis arose, was committed to the proposition that Manchuria was part and parcel of China. Not only is that true, but I am indebted to a correspondent of the "Times" for making it clear that Japan itself is committed to it. The correspondent recalled a report from the French Minister in Tokio, to M. Delcassé, the Minister for Foreign Affairs in Paris, on 8th February, 1904, in relation to the interests which the then Tsarist Russia was supposed to conceive as being hers in Manchuria. Here is the relevant passage:

> "Japan desired that Russia should recognise Manchuria as an integral part of China. Provided that such a declaration was forthcoming Japan was prepared to allow Russia complete liberty of action in that Province."

So that not only are political parties in this House committed, but Japan herself by diplomatic documents and declarations has admitted that she regarded Manchuria as part of Chinese territory. We are to-day meeting a situation in which that position has been formally endorsed by international documents, and I find it hard to understand the change of attitude which has been disclosed in the Committee this afternoon by the hon. Members who interrupted my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition so frequently during his speech. The hon. and gallant Member for Wycombe (Sir A. Knox) seemed to indicate that that was his view, and I am sure that it is the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Epping (Mr. Churchill), because in a speech which he made in London on last Friday week he said that he desired to say a kindly word for Japan. He said:

> "I hope that we shall try in England to understand a little of the position of Japan, an ancient State with the highest State sense of national honour."

[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Well, where is the honour? Has not Japan committed herself to a long series of international agreements? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham recalled quite properly to the Committee the fact that Japan signed the Treaty of Versailles, containing the Covenant of the League of Nations, the Kellogg Pact, the Nine-Power Treaty, and a long series of similar commitments. To these agreements Japan attached her signature, presumably with the full intention of honouring them both in the spirit and in the letter. How can we regard a nation as being an honourable nation unless she carries out those commitments which she has promised to carry out? But I would make one other observation on this point. This House of Commons, and certainly those of us who study public documents as they are made available, have no right to express extraordinary surprise concerning the action taken by Japan in Manchuria in recent days. I do not know whether hon. Members have heard of the famous memorandum presented, so it is alleged, to the Japanese Emperor by General Tanaka. Whether that document is authentic or otherwise I of course cannot say.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: It has been contradicted.

Mr. JONES: Well, it is a document which has been referred to in periodicals of some substance and some authority, but if it has been repudiated I am not concerned to develop the point.

Sir J. SIMON: To my knowledge the authenticity of that document has in fact been challenged by the Japanese Government. I say no more than that.

Mr. JONES: I merely refer to it because it was said to have been presented in the year 1927 and the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham as Foreign Secretary to which I have already referred was delivered some 12 months later. Whether the document was authentic or not I would like hon. Members to observe its proposals and to note how extraordinarily close to the proposals in that alleged document have been the developments in Manchuria and that part of the world. Whoever conceived the document, whether it was General Tanaka or not, this is quite certain—that the author of that document anticipated with extraordinary clarity, the development of events in Manchuria and Mongolia. It is therefore, shall we say, a striking coincidence that fact has been so closely associated with alleged fiction.

We come to-night to discuss our own attitude in regard to this business, and I am bound to say again that one is entirely in accord with the deserved tributes of admiration which have been paid to Lord Lytton and his fellow members of the Commission for a document which, whatever may happen as a consequence of it, will undoubtedly remain one of the great documents of history. The "Times" newspaper referred to it as a document worthy of the closest study, and the League's Draft Report issued unanimously by the Committee of Nineteen is based largely, indeed almost entirely, on considerations arising from the Lytton Report. I think it was quite right to describe that Report as it has been described as a temperate, just and well-considered document. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who I am sorry has been obliged to leave the Committee—I do not make any complain at all upon that score—seemed to invite the Commitee to take the view that he had taken a consistent attitude throughout in regard to this problem. I do not know what the right hon. and learned Gentleman has been doing in private, but I do know what he has been doing in public, and I recall to the Committee the simple fact that when the Foreign Secretary spoke at Geneva on the Lytton Report the greater part of his speech was devoted, not to an examination of Japan's activities, but to an examination of Chinese demerits. So satisfactory was the speech of the Foreign Secretary to the Japanese delegate at Geneva that that gentleman said that the British Foreign Secretary had stated the Japanese case more completely in three-quarters of an hour than he had been able to do in eight days.

The MINISTER of LABOUR (Sir Henry Betterton): When was that?

Mr. JONES: On the receipt of the report. After the right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke at Geneva the Japanese delegate declared that the British Foreign Secretary had stated more succinctly the case of Japan in three-quarters of an hour than he had been able to do in eight days. I do not know if that is what is called facing both ways. I do not know if that is what is called giving a fair and just presentation of the contents of the Lytton report. The Lytton report is a balanced document and I very much question if the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech at Geneva was a balanced summary of what is contained in the report. Indeed, it was very open to the observation that it was largely a pro-Japanese summary of it. I do not doubt that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is quite right in pointing to certain difficulties which have confronted Japanese statesmen in this matter. We are told that they have been very worried and harassed by brigandage which arose in Manchuria. But there are brigands all over the place.

Mr. WALLHEAD: There are some here in London.

Mr. JONES: Yes, there are some in London and some in Chicago and a few in Germany judging from every-day information. But are we to assume that the Chinese have had no provocation? Let it be recalled that when China declared herself associated with the other Powers on the Allied side in the late War, China was presented by Japan—her colleague in the War—with 21 points and called upon to sign. Is it surprising therefore that the Chinese people have entertained some measure of resentment. Granted that there has been provocation on one side, can we forget that there has been provocation on the other side as well? The Chinese people are as much entitled to the sympathy of the House of Commons as are the Japanese statesmen on their side. I dare say that the boycott embarked upon by the Chinese people was very aggravating to the Japanese, but are not we here embarking upon a rather respectable form of boycott when we issue posters calling upon people to buy British goods? That is just another way of saying, "Do not buy foreign goods."

Sir A. CHAMBERLAIN: Surely the hon. Gentleman does no good to the cause which he wishes to advocate by comparing an appeal to people to buy your own home-made produce, with an appeal to boycott the goods and the people of a particular nation.

Mr. JONES: I admit that there is a slight distinction but the distinction is not so grave as the right hon. Gentleman would suggest. It is certainly not so grave as to justify military operations on the part of Japan.

Sir A. CHAMBERLAIN: It is in effect the economic sanction of Article 16 of the Covenant.

Mr. JONES: I think that proposition is very much open to doubt. I know that the right hon. Gentleman is an authority on these matters, but I venture with great respect to challenge the soundness of that proposition. However, there it is. We are faced with this situation which could in my judgment have been largely avoided if Britain had exercised in these international councils her enormous influence, and had declared herself much more unequivocally than she has done in the last 18 months. The vacillation and temporising of which the Foreign Secretary has been guilty remind me of those words in Revelations:—

> "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot; I would thou wert cold or hot.
> So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot,"— and then follows the condemnation which is no doubt in the minds of hon. Members. I am bound to make it quite clear that, in my judgment, the right hon. Gentleman has been guilty of failing to rise to the level of his responsibility in this matter. If he had spoken and given a lead at Geneva with much more definiteness than in fact has been the case, I think we could have avoided a very large portion of the trouble with which we are now confronted. What, however, is to be done? I rejoice that the Government has declared the action that it proposes to take. I am, of course, an unrepentant pacifist, and I would have been very glad indeed to see armaments of all sorts withheld long ago, but I do not suppose that I can presume to accuse the present Government of being a pacifist Government. I am, therefore, glad to see that to-day it has decided, pending further agreement between ourselves and other nations with a view to international action, that an embargo shall be placed upon armaments made in this country for exportation to Japan and to China.

I wonder if I may remind the Committee of figures that are nearly staggering in their immensity. I understand that a well-known armament firm is and has been receiving increasing orders for the last two or three months. On the 6th December, 1932, 1,000,000 Mauser cartridges were ordered; on the 14th, another 1,000,000 Mauser cartridges were ordered; on the 21st, 20,000,000; on the 6th January, 20,000; and on the 10th January, 15,000,000. Clearly there has been a very considerable measure of activity in this direction long before this problem of an embargo arose in the way in which it has arisen. I understand that in a certain factory recently an amusing incident, something like this, took place. I gather that in one part of the factory they are preparing armaments for Japan and in another part armaments for China, and by an unfortunate chance the Japanese and Chinese representatives arrived at the same factory at the same time, and an unfortunate official pushed both of them into the same room. While they were there they began to discuss what they were being charged for their armaments, and very amicably they came to the conclusion that they would present a joint ultimatum to the firm to reduce the price. It would be better to get some figures as to the armaments that have already been ordered, but I wonder if we could get clear and precise information from the Government to-night as to the extent of time covered by the existing contracts. That is important, as my hon. Friend pointed out. It may very well be that Japan has got contracts over a very long period of time.

Sir A. CHAMBERLAIN: Has the hon. Gentleman any reason to suppose they are Japanese contracts?

Mr. JONES: I am making no sort of allegation at all; I am asking a fair question. It may very well be that Japan may have effected long-term contracts; on the other hand, it may very well be that China may have effected long-term contracts—I do not know—but we are informed, we have private information, that there are long-term contracts. Beyond that, there is this point, that a financially powerful nation like Japan may be able to effect agreements over a longer period than a comparatively weak nation like China, and therefore an embargo placed from to-night, without regard to the length of contracts, might clearly inure to the detriment of China and to the special advantage of Japan. I would, therefore, like to have some further information upon that point.

I, like my colleagues on this side and, I believe, in all parts of the House, would like to feel that this terrible crisis may not be unduly prolonged. It is our common desire, I am sure, that this matter should be speedily brought to an end, and I am sufficiently sound a believer in and faithful and loyal a supporter of the League of Nations to hope and anticipate that if the League rises to that task, the League may yet be able to effect some reconciling influence in regard to this difficulty, for, as my right hon. Friend quite properly warned the Committee and the country, no one can set a limit with assurance to this present war. Who knows but that possibly Russia might be embroiled, that other parts of the world might be embroiled, that an "incident" or an accident might bring nations far and near on to the present scene of difficulty? It is, therefore, not only in the interests of Japan and China, but in the interest of the whole world, that this area of warfare should be speedily circumscribed, and in so far as the Government takes the initiative—and we beg of it to keep the initiative going in this matter—in reconciling these warring nations, I am quite sure the Government can rely upon our whole-hearted support.

Mr. AMERY: I wish I knew where we really stand to-day. I listened with the greatest care to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and I gathered from it that while he considered that Japan has been subjected to grave provocation, yet she has very definitely broken the rules of the League of Nations and has been condemned by the report of the League; that, in fact, her action has been that of an aggressor according to the technical rules which govern the League of Nations. He was, therefore, consulting with the other nations, and more particularly with those nations which are manufacturers of armaments, with a view to seeing what action can be taken—presumably against Japan. Obviously, the League of Nations is not going to be invited to take action to prevent the injured party, the victim of aggression, defending itself. Therefore, the presumption must be that what the other nations are being asked to do with us is to apply some sort of measure of restriction upon munitions that will aim at preventing Japan carrying out her policy in Manchuria. He declared very definitely that in this matter you could only act internationally.

Why we should be a party to such action, I will not for the moment inquire, but at any rate, having laid down that principle, the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to say that we are going to act individually after all, and to act, not in accordance with any decision of the League of Nations, not in accordance with the policy which is presumably being put forward internationally, but on an entirely different and indeed contradictory policy, namely, that of refusing to supply munitions to both sides. So far as I understand the situation, in view of Japan's immense superiority in armament factories, that is a step aimed against China rather than against Japan. Indeed, the whole policy of refusing supplies of armaments to belligerents is one of very great doubt. It may mean that the party that has equipped itself most completely before aggression is to enjoy the full advantage of its aggressive preparations and that the party that has relied on the good faith of others is to be left helpless.

After all, where should we have been in the Great War if the United States of America had pursued towards us the policy which we are now apparently going to pursue towards China and Japan? It may well be that it may prove a wholly ineffective piece of action. Who can say that China is not going to draw munitions from Russia, or that it is impossible to send munitions to Bangkok for the needs of Siamese merchants? The thing is very likely to break down in practice. But apart from that, it seems to me entirely inconsistent action and to be justified, not on the merits of the case, but, quite frankly, on the ground of what my right hon. Friend called prudence, but, as I would say, cowardice. If we do consider Japan to be wrong in this matter, and if we do consider that action should be taken against her, then, if we take any single-handed action, it should, as far as lies in our power, be action directed against Japan.

But when it comes to that, I confess that I see no reason whatever why, either in act, or in word, or in sympathy, we should go individually, or internationally, against Japan in this matter. Japan has got a very powerful case based upon fundamental realities. Consider what Japan spent in blood and treasure to defend Manchuria against Russian annexation. Consider the extent to which her labours in Manchuria made that country much the most prosperous part of that loose congeries which is called China for the purpose of not paying a subscription to the League of Nations. Consider how that very prosperity has increased the flow of Chinese population into Manchuria. When you look at the fact that Japan needs markets and that it is imperative for her, in the world in which she lives, that there should be some sort of peace and order, then who is there among us to cast the first stone and to say that Japan ought not to have acted with the object of creating peace and order in Manchuria and defending herself against the continual aggression of vigorous Chinese nationalism? Our whole policy in India, our whole policy in Egypt, stand condemned if we condemn Japan. Even now it is worth while reminding the Committee that the operations actually taking place do not arise from Japan's invasion of Manchuria or Japan's invasion of Jehol, but from the decision of Chang-hsue-liang and of the Chinese authorities south of the Great Wall to send armies across the Wall to reconquer Jehol from Japanese control. At any rate, it seems to me that Japan has an arguable case based on those essentials which go far deeper than the verbiage of the Covenant of the League of Nations.

Mr. WALLHEAD: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why Japan did not put her case to the League of Nations?

Mr. AMERY: She put her case in her own way. I am not concerned with that, but with what is the right course of action for this country to take. When it comes to that, I am told that Japan must be wrong, that the Lytton Commission was unanimous, and that the League of Nations has unanimously decided, only Siam abstaining, that she is wrong. That is so, but both of these bodies started from the principles of the Covenant of the League of Nations—those principles which regard all States as absolutely equal, each with an absolutely inviolable unity without any regard to the circumstances, principles which are utterly unreal and not applicable to the circumstances of an ever-moving and changing world. With regard to this unanimity and the moral force that lies behind it, I noticed a very interesting point about the opening speeches. The opening speech was from the representative of Venezuela which has great responsibilities in this matter and is naturally only too glad that we should throw ourselves into the breach. One of the first speeches after that was from Lithuania. It was a long speech entirely devoted to drawing attention to the case of Vilna. Vilna was seized by the Poles some years ago, and it was a far more flagrant case of violation of the principles of the League of Nations than anything that Japan has done, and it was a case in which the League of Nations took good care not to interfere.

I do not believe that you can settle these great problems on the principles upon which the Covenant of the League is based. Had those principles been applied in the past the Turkish Empire would still have to be maintained intact. India, whatever the chaos might be, as long as there was some decrepit representative of the Mogul surviving there owing his subscription to Geneva, would remain intact. The work of regeneration that has been done in Egypt or in Morocco would have been ruled out. My right hon. Friend the Member for Darwen (Sir H. Samuel) said, "These things belong to a wicked past and the world has now entered upon a new era." But the realities of the world have not changed; they have not been changed by the Covenant of the League of Nations, and they will continue long after the Covenant has disappeared. The realities of the world depend upon the necessities of government, of order and of development, and wherever nations internally or externally are incapable of fulfilling those functions, they will go down against other nations whose need for peace and for development demands that there shall be order. You may have a bloody war with hundreds of thousands of troops on both sides between the different provinces of China, but because China is technically a single member of the League of Nations no one concerns themselves with that problem, nobody asks who is right and wrong. Arms are supplied equally to both sides. But because in this Manchurian question—Manchuria, after all, for many years was a practically independent State—the Japanese, who have long established rights in that country, take more vigorous action, it at once becomes a matter for formal condemnation by the League. I do not know that that matters except that you do not preserve peace by ignoring realities.

The worship of unrealities to which this country, above all countries, has been giving itself at Geneva since the War is not going to conduce to the peace of the world. Look at this particular issue. I believe that had it not been for the League of Nations, Japan and China might long ago have come to some reasonable accommodation in Manchuria, and Japan would have been contented to ask for a good deal less than she is going to ask and going to get to-day. I venture to say that if China is plunged into a disastrous war with Japan, it is largely due to her misplaced reliance upon the League of Nations. The League of Nations has offered a chair for China to sit upon and has then pulled it away. That is a situation which we have encouraged by our worship of unrealities at Geneva. There are a good many other unrealities in this connection. Here we are in a situation which, at any rate, approaches serious war. Is Japan likely to disarm in the near future? Is her willingness to disarm, even when she has dealt with China, going to be increased by the kind of attitude that the European nations and the United States have shown to her over this business? On the contrary, she is likely to retain her armaments more effectively than ever. She is not going to do without the air force on which she is relying to-day to such a great extent.

Yet, side by side with these realities, we go playing about at Geneva with a proposal for the abolition of all air forces and the internationalisation and civil control of aviation—a proposal which, I think, is as dishonest as it is silly. It is silly because it cannot possibly be carried out. Japan alone will prevent it. It is dishonest because I do not believe that the great majority of the Cabinet would have encouraged such a proposal being put forward unless they felt pretty certain that it would be rejected. The whole plea I wish to make this afternoon is for honesty in foreign politics, for facing the realities of the situation in the world, for recognising the traditions, the interests, the spirit of other nations, and not to be led from one false step to another by the inexorable logic of nonsense in accordance with a hastily concocted legalistic framework which does not correspond with the facts of the world. I have felt very loth to intervene in order to express a point of view that I know is not very often expressed in this House. I am afraid that there is a good deal of conscious or unconscious hypocrisy when we talk about the League of Nations, about disarmament and about peace. I have endured it for a good long time. At any rate, I have freed my soul this afternoon.

Mr. MABANE: I have listened with considerable interest to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery). Some of the things which he said about the Far East are certainly true. I agree with a good many of them, but he has drawn false conclusions from some good facts. May I refer to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition? As I listened to him I was reminded of those many sentimental people who endeavour to persuade us to adopt a policy that would lead us to war and then pass resolutions affirming that they would take no part in such a war if it arose. That is an approach to this problem with which I cannot agree. My approach is different. It is what I hope may be called a practical approach, and it is conditioned by the belief that on no account whatever should we be led into war and that, so far as it lies within our power, no other people shall be engaged in war either. My approach may be called a personal approach. I am not yet at an age when I can sit comfortably in an armchair and decree wars for other people to fight. I hope that I and other people who took part in the last War will never reach that mentality. If I see the Government or the Foreign Secretary engaged in a policy which is likely to embroil us in war, then, willy-nilly, the matter becomes personal for me, and I think of the day when I must again don my Sam Brown. I hope that I am not a coward, but I do not glory in war, and five years of war in one life is enough for me. My guiding principle therefore is that on no account should we be engaged in this dispute.

Judged by the standard I see considerable merit in the policy of the Government. It has been subjected to fierce condemnation. The Foreign Secretary has been condemned in no measured terms. It is not for me to judge his merits. It is for me, however, to consider the alternative to the policy which has been pursued. Throughout, the difficulties of the League of Nations have been immeasurably increased by reason of the fact that the United States are not members of the League. I believe that if the United States had been members, this trouble might very well have been settled within three weeks. I have been at some pains to follow the negotiations, and it has seemed to me that on many occasions the League of Nations has been prevented from pursuing a course of swift and decisive action because, having made a certain resolve, the United States have had to be consulted. A period has elapsed, possibly three weeks, and that period has allowed Japan to drive a wedge between the League and the United States. At the end of the period, the situation has altered and Japan has perhaps drawn another red-herring across the trail and the preliminary resolution becomes of no avail in the new circumstances.

There is, again, such a thing as responsibility. The Committee must agree that in these deliberations at Geneva no nation has had to take part with such a sense of responsibility as this country. San Salvador may be very bold in its attitude towards Japan, but there will not be a burden on San Salvador in any menaces in which it may indulge. There are those who say that we ought to have been the boldest in advocating a policy which was hostile, menacing and threatening to Japan. Those people who hold that at an early stage we should have presented Japan with something like an ultimatum, and that we should have endeavoured to secure the assent of the League to the enforcement of the sanctions in Article 16, are quite wrong. I am sometimes distressed and annoyed because pacifists condemn me for dissenting from their view. I return the charge and I find a very simple dilemma to present to people who take that view. It is this. Would they be prepared, both as regards themselves and their friends, to go out to the Far East and fight a war to maintain a decision of the League of Nations taken on these lines at a very early stage of the proceedings? If they would not, their demands at Geneva dissipate into the thin air of the Swiss mountains.

Sometimes I am told, too, that decisive threatening action at an early stage would have compelled the withdrawal of Japan from Manchuria—that this young empire of the East would have crumpled up and departed from the main land of Manchuria. I do not think that anyone with any knowledge of Japan could possibly have assumed that that is true.

Three years ago I spent a little time in China and Japan endeavouring to study this particular problem. I think that the present trouble was then quite easy to foresee. I found Japan quite a different country from that which my imagination had drawn for me. I found the Japanese bold, fearless, vigorous and convinced of their own destiny. I found that, in the midst of all the modernity, the spirit of old Japan remained—the spirit of the Samurai. I found emperor worship, and the wonderful loyalty which it engenders to be a strong influence in Japanese life. In the instructions given to the Japanese teachers by the Japanese Board of Education there was a definite direction that they should teach the children that the Emperor was of divine origin, not as a matter of legend, but as a matter of belief, and that they were to remember at all times that the Japanese Constitution was peerless throughout the world. While I was there the chief delegate returned from the Naval Conference in London and was presented with a ceremonial dagger in order to commit hara-kiri as the only thing left for him after consenting to the restriction of the Japanese Navy. On the train in which I was travelling in Japan a distinguished Japanese naval officer, as a protest against the findings of the London Naval Conference, committed hara-kiri, somewhat untidily, in his sleeping berth. I am in no doubt that an early application of the sanctions in Article 16 of the Covenant of the League would have involved us at once in a war in the East.

It is not for me to elaborate the difficulties and dangers of such a war. My intense desire to avoid it is sufficient to convince me that the policy of the Government has been a great deal wiser than many people will allow. It would be a reversal of reason if we were to engage in a war to please the pacifists. But what I have said must not be taken to mean that I condone the action of Japan in Manchuria. I regard the intrusion of Japan into Manchuria as blatant Imperialism, at a time when Imperialism should be dead. I regard it as part of a determined policy to establish a vast Empire of the East, stretching from Java to Japan, of which Japan shall be the head. The immediate motive is one of commercial gain. Anyone who knows the present state of Japan knows that her financial condition is at present, and has been for some time, appalling. Japan is virtually bankrupt. The exigencies of finance have combined with martial ardour to start this campaign of conquest. There, in Manchuria, are the very resources which Japan requires. There is the iron and there is the coal. In Jehol there are vast undeveloped mineral resources. There is nickel. They are the things which Japan needs in order to make herself self-sufficing. The bait is tempting, and the urge to take the bait is overwhelming, especially as in Manchuria and in Jehol there is negligible opposition.

I protest against the notion that China is a nation or even a State. China was, within certain limits, a unit under the old Empress, but since her day it has been quite false to regard China as anything approaching a national unit. I believe that one of the major causes of the present trouble is the sentimental desire of many people to regard any familiar name on the map as a State. It is the principle of self-determination reduced to absurdity. But for the desire to regard the League of Nations as complete, China would never have been admitted to membership. I do not think China fulfils the qualification of a member State. There is there no Government capable of maintaining order throughout the length and breadth of the land, though I think I am correct in saying that is a necessary qualification for membership of the League. Perhaps it would have been better for the League to take China under its wing and develop it in accordance with the wishes and desires of the League.

There is no government in China. The sphere of influence of the Nanking Government is extremely limited. The Leader of the Opposition told us that the Ambassadors of the Nanking Government were accepted. They are accepted, because there are no others, and partly also as the result of that general sentimental feeling about China to which I referred a moment ago. Not so long ago we were talking about civil war in China. There was no civil war in China; there were merely a few bandit chiefs roaming about the country and carrying on until either they got their throats cut or acquired sufficient wealth to go to America to settle down. Before I went to China I wondered how their soldiers were paid. They were paid, I found, by the quite simple method of looting. I think it is true to say that in recent years civil war has been the most profitable form of industrial enterprise in China.

Equally I believe that there is not at the present time and there will not be any war in the Far East between the Chinese and the Japanese. It is not true to call it a war at all. There is nothing in the sense in which we in the West understand armies to prevent the occupation of Jehol by the Japanese. The only war which threatens in the Far East, so far as I can see, is a war that might be the result of the attitude taken up by certain Western Powers. Whether the Japanese can keep the annexed Provinces is a different matter; whether they can convert the primitive agricultural Manchurian to the modern and mechanical is another problem. But I think we ought to face the reality that at the present moment there is only one thing that could compel the Japanese to get out of Manchuria immediately, and that would be the armed intervention of Western Powers. Are we prepared to face that situation? Personally, I most definitely am not.

But though Japan may not be forced to come out of Manchuria immediately, there is possibly a chance that Japan may be forced to come out of Manchuria by a quite different method and perhaps as a result of exercising a little more patience—and here I differ very violently from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook—and that is by the intervention or by the action of the League of Nations, by the application ultimately of the provisions of Article 16, by the application of the economic sanctions. For my part I regard the discussion on the embargo on arms and a general economic boycott as one and the same thing. That is why I desired the Leader of the Opposition to define what he meant by "armaments." In my view there is no one thing which can be sent from one country to another which to-day cannot properly be regarded as material for war in one form or another. Therefore, if we are discussing an embargo on armaments we are really discussing a complete economic boycott. The day may come when that will be the course of action to adopt, but the difficulties are not commonly comprehended. Before there can be an economic boycott there must be legislation. We cannot wave a magic wand, say "Abracadabra," and imagine that the economic boycott is forthwith established. Shall we adopt that legislation? I say most certainly that if the occasion arises, and if the League of Nations is with us, the answer ought to be, "Yes," for in my view the League has reached the point in its history when it must be logical or die.

The Japanese stand condemned by the League. At the end of the world War we set out to devise means whereby the world could be made safe for democracy, as the phrase then ran. The means devised were the economic boycott. Now, or in the near future, will be the chance to discover whether Article 16 works or not. If it works, then I think the world can look forward with some assurance to a period of peace; if it does not work, so far as I can see the world must despair. I would make but one condition, and that is that if we do consider the application of economic sanctions it is imperative that the United States of America should be with us. It would be impossible for us to attempt to apply sanctions without the adherence of the United States; but with the United States and all the other Member States of the League in concert we could set out to apply economic sanctions with some hope.

So far I have supported the policy of the Government in this matter, because I have seen the care which has been taken and the logic of the case. I believe that notwithstanding many criticisms directed against the Government and against the Foreign Secretary the country has realised the difficulties of the Government. It has now formed the conclusion that the time has come when the Government, having pursued its policy with care and caution, must depart from that policy of caution and embark on a new policy of boldness and resolve.

Colonel WEDGWOOD: One of the difficulties of all speakers in this Debate is that at the end of their speeches the policy which they wish to have carried out remains as wrapt in mystery as it was when they began. I liked the speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Mabane), but what does he want the Foreign Secretary to do? Perhaps I may be forgiven for speaking in this Debate, because I have a great many friends in China and Japan, and know both of those countries and Manchuria well. I would begin by saying that when I left Manchuria I had firmly fixed in my mind two facts which are as firmly fixed in the minds of all inhabitants of that country. The first is fear of the Japanese, because they are, perhaps, the best fighters in the world, and the second is the certainty that whoever rules in Manchuria the Chinese will go on multiplying and, like the China which, century after century, has absorbed her conquerors, will absorb the Japanese. A change of government makes no difference to a nation which has existed for 4,000 years, and has remained, almost pathetically, exactly as it was 4,000 years ago. The people of China and of Japan are delightful people. I had the privilege of knowing Sun Yat Sen, and I suppose I am one of the few persons in this country who believed in his doctrines. I had Japanese friends in my boyhood, I know the country and I love the people.

The Chinese have been treated for more than 20 years to something every bit as terrible as the 30 Years' War proved itself in Europe. A succession of war lords, sheer bandits, have tyrannised over the peasantry, robbed them, murdered them, and then killed each other. The Government of China is not only no real Government but it is a terror to every Chinaman. As for the Government of Japan, it has a certain resemblance to the present Government of Germany. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery) was right. The Government of Japan is a good, sound Conservative Government, with a thick stick always in its hand, and power behind it. If I were a Chinaman, I do not think that I should want to be governed by the Japanese, who have been pretty brutal in Korea and to anybody with Liberal opinions, which they label Socialist, in their own country. I do not think that they will be ideal governors of China, but I am not prepared to go to war with them. I do not think that any of my hon. Friends on these benches are prepared to do so. The British Government, either through the League of Nations or in some other way, should try to moderate the form of government imposed upon these helpless Chinese.

The real fact has not been faced by anybody. We are bothering about Jehol; surely the Committee must realise that it may be Peking to-morrow. There will be no Chinese in Jehol by the end of the week. The Japanese army is a machine which may go on. I have long since thought that the best fate that could happen to the Chinese people would be that they should surrender their autonomy to the League of Nations, to us, or to America, so that they should have somebody to enforce government upon them, and thereby deprive the Japanese of the perpetual excuses for going on and on, as we did in India. The only hope for the Chinese people is in the assistance that people who really wish them well, and have no desire to get anything out of their country, can give them. Goodness knows, we do not want to add to our Empire. Events have proved it over and over again. I would not mind assuming a responsibility, sometime when they ask for it in their own way, for protecting that magnificent people from an alien terror and from centuries of struggle against their new lords, and to give them the chance of establishing a civilized government which would maintain power and could maintain the doctrines of Sun Yat Sen.

Major HILLS: The speech that we have just heard from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Colonel Wedgwood) was in excellent contrast to some that preceded it. I should have thought that anyone who spoke in this Debate would do so with a sense of responsibility. We are faced with war between two nations, towards each of which we have the friendliest feelings of very long standing, each of which is in possession of an ancient and a high civilisation and is certain to play a great part in the world's future; yet so many speeches in this Debate have regarded this conflict as a football match where you cheer one side or the other. The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Morgan Jones) cheered on the Chinese and abused the Japanese. If he had wanted to prove that the Japanese were in the wrong and had broken treaties, he wasted his time. After the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, there is no dispute. The world has made up its mind, and this country has made up its mind.

Mr. MORGAN JONES: There is a dispute. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery) contraverted the whole position.

Major HILLS: I am coming to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery) in a minute. If the hon. Member for Caerphilly tried to show that the Japanese received no provocation and that this was an ordinary case of one country invading the other wrongfully, he has against him the facts of the case, and the Lytton Report. I am always afraid of the pacifists—they are so bellicose. The enthusiasm for fight which exists in all of us will leak out, even in the pacifist. Whereas other people fight only under great provocation and in what they think are reasonable causes, the pacifist always seems to fight in the wrong cause and to use his force in the wrong place. Any talk of enforcing sanctions against the Japanese would involve this country in war. I welcome the speech of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and, above all, his last sentence, in which he said that under no conditions shall we be involved in war. So much for the hon. Member for Caerphilly.

I come now to my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook. I approach him very humbly as one of those conscious or unconscious hypocrites who believe in the League of Nations. I listened to him with very great respect. He used the word "realities" very often, and he pleaded for realities. Are treaties no realities? There is the Kellogg Pact and above the Nine-Power Pact. Are they not realities? They were signed by Japan. I should have thought that they were substantial realities. I should like to know what my right hon. Friend's realities are. He says that when Japan acts she pursues real politics.

Mr. AMERY: I said that we should not intervene in any country's affairs against its wishes.

Major HILLS: I am within the recollection of the House. My right hon. Friend's argument was "Leave Japan alone to do what she wants." Is not that the case? He suggested that force is the only thing that counts. Then he went on, rather strangely, to plead for honest foreign politics. Honest foreign politics which would start breaking every treaty that has ever been made. Japan has not broken her word once, but three times, and that has been found as a fact by 42 countries. I prefer to err with 42 countries supporting what my right hon. Friend calls "organised nonsense" rather than to be right with my right hon. Friend, even plus Siam. So much for that.

The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyne said, quite rightly, that we left our constructive proposals to the end of our speeches. I support the Government. I support them entirely. I support them in imposing an embargo now, and I support them in not confining the embargo to Japan. I support them in the attitude—if I understood the Foreign Secretary aright—that for us it may not be possible to discriminate between the aggressor and the Power that is the victim of aggression. Mr. Stimson has said in quite unambiguous words that the old idea of neutrality is gone. He said:

> "There is a general feeling amongst writers upon international law that the rule of impartiality in supplying arms, if it ever was generally accepted, is subject to criticism. There never was a right in the belligerent to buy arms."

He said in a previous part of that statement that if any comprehensive group of important States like the League of Nations mutually arrived at a verdict of embargo, the United States would accept it. We shall have to decide very shortly whether we are to go on refusing arms to both sides. At present, the Foreign Secretary is entirely right. He must consider that there is some remnant of the old law of neutrality left and that any other course might be construed as a breach of neutrality. I do not, however, think that it is the right thing for a country to do. I regard it as almost certain that the United States intend to support the embargo, and, from what Mr. Stimson has said, I believe that they intend to support also the supply of arms to the innocent Power and the refusal of arms to the aggressor. That can only be done internationally. It has already gone a long way, for the United States Senate has given the President the same power that we have under the Order in Council of 1931, to place an embargo by withholding licence if the export of arms would promote or encourage the employment of force, and after securing the support of such other Governments as he may deem necessary. That has not yet passed the House of Representatives, but I believe that it will pass, and so we are already a long way towards a general embargo. I believe we shall get the embargo, because the feeling is so strong. If you get the fact of 42 to one, even although that one is Siam plus my right hon. Friend, it does pretty clearly show that the feeling of the world is moving.

I believe that we shall see the embargo, and then we shall have to consider very carefully whether we should not take it further—supply arms to the innocent party and refuse them to the aggressor. I do not express any opinion on that. It is a matter which the Government have to consider very carefully. I listened with almost entire agreement to the speech of my right hon. Friend opposite—an agreement I often feel in spite of the fact that we sit on opposite sides of the House. If all this trouble had occurred 100 or 200 years ago, Great Britain would have gone in and run China to the immense advantage of the Chinese, and China would have been stronger and more of an entity. What we have to do is to try and get some body of opinion in China, with the necessary force behind it, to bring the country into unity, and give some chance for its success.

It may, perhaps, turn out that foreign aggression will do what internal quarrels have not done. It may be the case that the fact that China is attacked, and her unity threatened, may cause the Chinese to come together. My right hon. Friend shakes his head. He knows China, and I do not. Short of some general decision, like giving a mandate for China either to this country or the United States—a condition which seems to me practically impossible at the moment—I do not see any real hope for China. I do most earnestly think that the Government have acted entirely rightly in this matter, and I believe that they have got the future in thought as well as the present. We cannot settle the future; the future is in the hands of fate. I cannot believe that a great country like China will break up into small parts and be in perpetual chaos. People who know China well tell me that there is one feeling predominant in all China—North, South, East and West—and that is the sense of the unity of China. I believe that in the end that feeling will prevail.

Mr. NUNN: I hope it may not be out of place for a modest back bencher to express agreement with the statement of the Foreign Secretary, as far as it goes. I feel that the resolve of the Government to keep out of entanglements in this matter of warfare in the Far East, and its resolve, at the present moment, not to allow arms to be exported from the country to either party are entirely right. I am not quite so happy when I look forward to the possibility of there being discrimination later on as to which of the contesting parties shall be allowed to receive arms. My feeling on that point is due to the fact that I do not think, whatever has happened in Geneva, whatever opinions have been expressed in this House this afternoon, that anybody really knows the true state of affairs in China and Manchukuo.

This is an extremely difficult question. It is true that the League of Nations has considered it, but, first of all, the League of Nations is hardly constituted as a court. It has not that truly judicial atmosphere. Its members may, perhaps, be filled with a burning and ardent desire to further the cause of world peace, but, at the same time, they are representatives of nations, representatives of certain national interests and national attitudes of mind. I do not think that you get a really judicial atmosphere at Geneva such as you would get in a court trying a great criminal or civil case. The judgment of the League of Nations, which we are bound to accept because we are tied to the League of Nations, is not necessarily absolutely right. It is based upon the Lytton report, and, although based on the Lytton report, it definitely places the blame for what has happened upon Japan. Now the Lytton report is pretty definite in drawing attention to the fact that there are many shortcomings on the part of China. If I may draw attention to it, there is one statement in the report which mentions the provocative attitude of the Chinese leaders both in Manchuria and in China in pursuing an increasingly nationalistic policy directed against the interests and rights acquired by Russia and Japan. It draws attention to that provocative attitude, and I think that provocative attitude did exist.

It is not unknown surely to Members of this House that for many years China has deliberately interfered with rights acquired quite properly and legally by Japan in Manchuria. Year by year she has built up her railways in direct antagonism to the railways which, after all, developed Manchuria and encouraged the immense Chinese immigration into Manchuria. The Chinese went to the length of building a rival port to Dairen with the deliberate intention of taking the traffic from the Japanese railways. I am no advocate of Japan. Hon. Members opposed to me made up their minds months ago that Japan was wrong. They smile, of course, now, because they think I am another Tory advocate of Japan. I am merely trying to face the facts, and the facts are that Japan has a great deal to be said for her before we pass judgment. Do we know, for instance, that there was no other movement behind the foundation of Manchukuo than the appearance of the Japanese forces? It was suggested in the report that the independence movement had not been heard of until the influence of the Japanese troops was felt there. That is strictly not true.

We have to go back a little before we find out what was happening. We know of the big revolution of 1912 when Yuan Shih Kai was made first President. I am not referring to the interregnum of Sun Yat Sen. At that time the Imperial Family were not thrown off the throne. The President was appointed by Royal Edict. Yuan Shih Kai was a type of politician Members of this House might hardly accept as possible. We are so accustomed to Members who are so single-minded that we can hardly realise that in China there may have been a politician who was not single-minded, and who might even have been playing a double game. It appears to me that Yuan Shih Kai was a man bred in the old Imperialism. Undoubtedly, when he took office he did so in order to avoid what, to him, was a worse thing happening, and so that he might carry out his own idea of later on putting back the Imperial Family. I think there is little doubt about that. He died with his scheme unfulfilled, and I would draw attention to the fact that before he died he had actually made a movement towards establishing himself on the Royal throne, obviously with the intention of once again making the Chinese accustomed to a Royal occupant of the highest executive seat in the country.

When Yuan Shih Kai first became President there was a very solemn agreement —it is well we should think of a few agreements made by China—which was made by the Government of China with the young Emperor now known as Pu Yi. It stipulated that he should be given the right to maintain his residence in the Imperial Palace of Peking and have an annual subsidy. That agreement was honoured for a certain time. The independence movement might have been—it certainly was—known in 1919, and I think our Foreign Office may contain something about it. It was known that there was a definite monarchist movement. It was directed towards re-establishing the Imperial Throne. That is quite well known in spite of the fact that the Lytton Report says that the movement started only when Japanese troops went into Manchuria. In 1924 something happened. In that year General Feng Yu-sieng brought about a coup d'etat in Peking to establish a new Government, and since that time there never has been a Parliament in China. The so-called Christian general turned it out, and there never has been one since.

Those who echo the Lytton Report say the people of Manchuria were not consulted; the people of China were not consulted about what was happening in China. That new Government was set up, and one of the first things was that the agreement with the Emperor was torn up and his life was in danger. Before anything serious could happen Chang Tso-lin drove out Feng Yu-sieng from Peking. It is quite well known, beyond any question of doubt, that Chang Tso-lin had then repented of his republicanism, so much so that it is true an intermediary was asked to go to various foreign legations and get the agreement with the little Emperor reinstated. He actually approached the British, Dutch, Chinese and Japanese authorities. Before, however, anything could be done, Chang Tso-lin was driven out by Feng Yu-sieng, and once again the new Government was set up. The young Emperor was imprisoned. He escaped with the greatest difficulty to a hospital, from thence to the Japanese Legation, and from thence to Tientsin. From that time the solemn agreement with the young Emperor has not been kept. It is all very well to talk about agreements on the part of Japan, but what about agreements on the part of China?

After that, the idea of establishing the young Emperor on the throne of China in Peking was given up, and the ideas of the monarchists turned towards the ancient home of the Emperor's race, to Manchuria. It is said that Manchuria is an integral part of China, but it would be much more true to say that since the 1640's—I think 1644 is the actual year—China has been an integral part of Manchuria, and it was not to be wondered at that, when the monarchists began to gather their strength together, they looked towards Manchuria as the place where they should re-establish their Royal family in the midst of its own home surroundings. It seems to me extraordinary that, in a House which probably has more regard for liberty than any other Parliament in the world, and has certainly done more in helping to further the cause of liberty, some consideration should not be given to these people, who may, for all that we know, have been desiring to set up their own free Government in Manchuria.

I see that some hon. Members smile, but may I inform them of what happened at the investiture of the present Chief Executive of Manchuria? The ordinary investiture ceremony took place in the light of day. It was a more or less Europeanised ceremony. But, after it was over, seven leading members of the Manchukuo community and one leading Chinese general went into a private room and performed the old ceremony of the Kow-tow—the generation-old ceremony which has not been performed in China itself since the revolution of 1911. That is a very significant fact. Ceremonies do not play much part in Western life, but they play a very large part indeed in Oriental life, if I may be allowed to speak from my own experience. Another significant fact is that the title of the Chief Executive of Manchukuo means simply "One who holds the Government." It does not contain any word meaning "President." It is not the same term, for instance, as is used in connection with the President of China. It is entirely a provisional title, and it does seem to indicate that, when that Government was set up, it was set up with the intention within a few months, possibly a year, of establishing Mr. Pu Yi once again as Emperor on the throne of his old home.

I imagine that, had there been nothing more than the setting up of Manchukuo with the aid of the Japanese—certainly it could not have been done without their aid, and undoubtedly they took the opportunity of re-establishing something like law and order in that territory—the League of Nations would have had an easy task; but there has been this invasion of Jehol. Some hon. Members have spoken this afternoon as if Jehol was a province of China, but I would remind them that it is north of the Great Wall of China, and it is more an integral part of Manchuria than of China. The fact that General Chang Hsueh Liang is anxious to retain it is easily explained, because he draws the pay for his army from the opium revenue of Jehol, which is something like 2,000,000 taels a month. One can understand, therefore, his anxiety not to be driven out.

As I have said, I think it is extremely likely that, had there been no invasion of Jehol, the League of Nations would have had an easy task, and we should not be faced to-day with the very difficult question of whether or not we should encourage those who say that there should be discrimination with regard to the matter of the arms embargo. For myself, I think that there ought not to be any such discrimination. I am entirely in favour of an embargo, but I think that, if there is to be an embargo, it is not for us, on the evidence that we have before us at present, to say that that embargo shall be against one country only. We are taking a very grave decision. I think that the embargo should remain against both countries until we are absolutely certain, on more evidence than has been placed before us, that Japan has had no justification whatsoever for what she has done.

I should not like it to be thought that I am in any way antagonistic to China, or that I am standing here purely as an advocate of Japan. Anyone who knows anything about the Chinese, who has worked with them and has had close contact with them, knows what a wonderful people they are—wonderful in character, with all their drawbacks, and most wonderful of all in energy and industry. Anyone who knows them desires that they should have a history which, if different from their great past history, shall at least be as great. Although in what I have said I may seem rather to have sided with Japan, that is because I believe that the only hope for China lies in some realisation of the realities of this case, in getting this war stopped, and in getting Japan and China for once together on friendly terms. In my opinion, the only way in which that can be done is by the League of Nations delegating to three Powers, America, France and this country—who, after all, are the only Powers that have any great interests in or have had any great contact with China—the business of settling this dispute. To my mind it is a thousand pities that ever this matter came into the light of publicity. It is a thousand pities that ever it was discussed at Geneva. If the League of Nations had at the very start delegated the work to these three Powers, we might have been here to-day, not facing what may be a terrible disaster in the Far East, but congratulating ourselves that once again China had been set on the road towards that prosperity to which she is entitled.

Mr. COCKS: The hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Nunn) has given us a very interesting disquisition on modern Chinese history. I might, perhaps, be able to supplement it in certain particulars, and to put rather the other side of the picture which he has painted in such a fascinating way. I do not propose to do so, because I think that the whole question of the grievances of China against Japan, or of Japan against China, which occurred before September, 1931, is really irrelevant to the purpose of this Debate, since all those things have now been adjudicated upon. They have been judged by the Lytton Commission, and the Report of the Lytton Commission has been accepted by the League of Nations and by the British representative on the League. It seems to me, therefore, that to go behind the Lytton Commission and to discuss the grievances which one country has against another and which have been investigated by the Commission, would merely be to confuse counsel in this Committee. For example, the hon. Member for Whitehaven referred to one grievance which he said the Japanese had against the Chinese. He said that the Chinese in Manchuria had started a port in rivalry with their railway line. But the point is that Japan never at any time brought that grievance before the League of Nations, as she was entitled to do.

Mr. NUNN: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but may I point out, in order to balance that fact, that China never brought before the League of Nations the fact that the Russians had swallowed up Eastern Turkestan, and that for the last four or five years Mongolia has been entirely under Russian influence?

Mr. COCKS: That seems to me to have nothing to do with the question. If China had a grievance regarding Turkestan, she has neither submitted it nor acted upon it. The point is that, in the particular case of Manchuria, Japan said that she had certain grievances against China, but, instead of bringing them before the League of Nations during the last few years, and asking that the League should adjudicate, she has waited until the moment suited her and then has taken the law into her own hands, as the Foreign Secretary said. Surely, that is the short answer to the hon. Member's argument. In the discussions which took place at the League in the autumn before last, on the question of the interpretation of the different Treaties affecting the position in Manchuria, Japan refused definitely to allow those Treaties to be examined by the League, although China offered more than once to put all the Treaties forward for examination by the League, and said that she would accept the interpretation placed upon them by the Court at The Hague. Whatever grievances Japan might have had—and I do not deny that she may have had grievances—she has put herself out of court by not taking advantage of the international organisation of which she was a member, and not merely a member, but an original member, and a member of the Council. She has ignored the League of Nations all through, and she has only herself to blame, therefore, now that the verdict of the League has gone against her in regard to her actions in the past two years. As I have said, to go behind the report of the Lytton Commission, which has now been accepted by the League, is to darken and confuse counsel.

I want to address myself to three points which I think are of the utmost gravity, and which are relevant to this Debate. The first is the position of the present situation in the Far East so far as it affects the security of the British Empire. I hope that the right hon. and gallant Member for Ripon (Major Hills) will not accuse me of being a bellicose pacifist if I say that I think it is our duty, as a British House of Commons, to consider the situation from that point of view as well as from others. The second point that I want to mention is as to the way in which this position affects the general situation in Asia; and, thirdly, I want to say something about how this situation affects the sanctity of international obligations, as bound up with the maintenance of justice, of security and of peace throughout the world.

[Mr. Cocks.]

Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery), and to some extent the hon. Member who has just spoken, who have come to the House to find excuses for Japan, have forgotten that both the United States and ourselves are suffering from a very great grievance in the fact that Japan has broken the Washington Treaty, sometimes called the Nine Power Treaty, of 1922. That Treaty was drawn up expressly to prevent such a situation occurring as has occurred now. It was a Treaty of self-denial. By it the Powers who signed it—and the principal Powers affected are, of course, Japan, ourselves and America—agreed that they would not take advantage of the condition of China, which they admitted at that time was not a country remarkable for ordered Government and was going through great difficulties. On the contrary, they would respect its Sovereignty, its integrity and its independence. It was a solemn Agreement signed by these three Powers and six others. On condition that Japan signed that Treaty, America and England agreed to hand over to Japan naval and military supremacy in the Far East, which it did not at that time possess.

Because we trusted the Japanese word to keep the Treaty, it was agreed that we would not fortify any position East of Singapore and that the United States would not fortify any position West of Honolulu. Because we trusted the Japanese word we have left Hongkong undefended and America has left the Phillipines undefended and also the Island of Guam, where she was going to build a naval station in the Pacific. Because we trusted the word of Japan that she would only use her forces in accordance with international obligations—the Nine Power Treaty, the Covenant of the League of Nations and the Pact of Paris —we have left our long coastline of Australia absolutely unprotected and we have handed over absolute naval and military supremacy to Japan, but only on condition that she would not use that supremacy except when allowed to by the obligations that she had signed. That was the obligation that Japan gave and that was what she got in return from America and from Britain, and she has taken advantage of that for 10 years to build up her military power, to accumulate oil and munitions and to prepare for the conflict which the militarist party were determined to undertake. She has taken advantage of the terms of that Treaty. She obtained her naval supremacy by these means and, when the hour arrived, she struck. She broke her word. Her international obligations have been torn apart, the boasted honour of the Samurai is lying in the dust. When that Treaty was signed, the American delegation reported upon it to the President. This is what their report said:

> "It terminated the Anglo-Japanese alliance and substituted friendly conference in place of war . . . from any controversies that might arise in the region of the Pacific . . . limitation and reduction would not have been possible without the new relations established. . . . The new relations established could not . . . inspire confidence . . . without a specific understanding as to the relations of the Powers to China."

Now that the Treaty has been broken, we know from America that it is certain that the whole question of the naval position and of military fortifications in the Pacific will have to be reopened instead of being closed as they were 10 years ago. That is a very serious prospect for all lovers of peace and of international order.

What is the effect of the present position in the Far East going to have upon the whole of the Continent and the people of Asia? If Japan is able to flout the League of Nations and the whole world, and, having done that, is to proceed to the military conquest of Manchuria and Jehol, what is the effect of that going to be upon the millions of people throughout Asia? They will see an Asiatic Power taking the lead in China and perhaps formulating, as we hear from Tokio some are contemplating, a Monroe doctrine for the Far East. If Japan obtains Jehol, she will be in a position to dominate the whole of Northern China. If she seizes Jehol, she will hold the mountains overlooking the Northern Chinese plain and Peking and Tientsin, in fact the whole of that Northern Province, will be within her grasp.

When we are considering these points with the gravity that the position deserves and in fact insists upon, we must consider what are the views and what is the policy of the Japanese Imperialists and militarists who are behind it. In doing that I should like to associate myself with the Leader of the Opposition when he said that we who think in this direction have no enmity at all to the Japanese people. In fact, we Western nations owe them a debt for accepting the blessings of Western civilisation in the form of guns and armour and battleships and so on in place of the artistic and beautiful life that they lived in past ages. Only 18 months ago General Honjo, the General in command of the Japanese forces in Manchuria, said, according to a report which appeared in a journal circulating in China, that the plan of the Japanese expansionists, with which he was in agreement, was to occupy not only Manchuria but Mongolia—and they are moving in that direction at present—to dominate China, to become the supreme Power on the Pacific and then, with all the mineral wealth that she would have at her command—because Japan is deficient in minerals—she would be able to be the dominant Power in Asia, she would be able to carry out her great ambition of seizing the Philippines, the Dutch East Indies, Australia and Singapore, driving America back beyond Hawaii and England beyond Singapore.

In saying that, he is only repeating in other words the words of the well-known Tanaka memorial. I was reading the other day a book called "Manchuria, the Cockpit of Asia." The author gives extracts from this memorial. In June, 1927, a conference was held in Tokio attended by civil and military officials connected with Manchuria and Mongolia. It has been suggested that it was called to see how the situation created by the Nine Power Conference could be circumvented. The outcome was a memorial presented to the Emperor by Baron Tanaka, who was then Prime Minister of Japan. It said that the restrictions imposed by the Nine Power Treaty reduced Japanese special rights in Manchuria to such an extent that there was no freedom for the nation. It goes on to say:

> "To safeguard ourselves . . . Japan cannot remove the difficulties in Eastern Asia unless she adopts a policy of blood and iron. In carrying this out, we have to face the United States, which has been turned against us by China's policy. . . . In the future, if we wish to control China, the primary move is to crush the United States. . . . But to conquer China we must first take Manchuria and Mongolia. If we conquer China the rest of the Asiatic countries and those of the South Seas will fear us and surrender. . . . The way to gain actual rights in Manchuria and Mongolia is to use this region as a base and, under the pretence of trade and commerce, penetrate to the rest of China. Armed with the rights already held, we shall seize the resources all over the country. With the latter at our disposal we shall proceed to conquer India, Asia Minor, Central Asia, and even Europe."

There is no doubt that this Memorial, which has been in print for some years without being contradicted until quite recently at the League of Nations, when the Chinese Delegate brought it up before one of the meetings, and the Japanese representative professed to scoff at it, represents the views of a large body of Imperialists and militarists in Japan. That, therefore, is a factor which we ought to consider, because it means, if Japan succeeds in her endeavour, if she is not checked by the League or by the world, if she proceeds to dominate China in that way as a result of flouting the League of Nations, she will become the greatest menace that our Empire has ever known, because it will be a menace directed at the very weakest point in our long chain of communications, the Pacific, the point furthest away from the home country, directed against our possession of British Columbia, Australia, New Zealand and Oceania. Imagine the effect upon the millions, in India and other Asiatic countries of such action succeeding! I say that with the utmost gravity. These are things that we ought to ponder over and over again.

The third point that I want to mention is the effect of the present position upon the whole structure of international peace and security. The Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is at Geneva, and the Foreign Secretary paid a very well-deserved compliment to his work. But he is over there working for disarmament. Recently there he was meeting the French suggestion, which was, that she could not disarm unless she obtained security. It was only behind the shield and rampart of full security that France would agree to disarm. The Under-Secretary of State, in the name of the British Government, said that the British Government was not prepared to extend the obligations she had already taken upon herself, and he went on to say that we already have a certain amount of security; that we have undertaken certain obligations which will give a certain amount of security which he thought would enable the nations to disarm. He mentioned the Locarno Treaty, the Pact of Paris and the Covenant of the League of Nations, and he said we had signed all those and surely they would give such security as would enable some measure of disarmament to take place.

What will France now be able to reply? She may very well say "We understand your interpretation of the Covenant of the League of Nations and the Pact of Paris is that 'We will consider the question for many months and will finally inflict upon the power which is the aggressor the moral condemnaton of the world,' but as for the Power which is disarmed or weak we will refuse to give her any means to defend herself." That is the effect of the statement we have heard to-night. It would be the effect if it were the final statement the Foreign Secretary was to make on this subject. I hope that it is not. That would enable France to reply "Your basis of security is nothing. If that is all the League of Nations or the Pact of Paris means, we are going to continue the policy of defending ourselves, and building up armaments. We find international sanctions are useless to prevent an invasion and so shall go on and on in the way we have done in the past building up our Army, Navy and Air Force and refusing to reduce our forces by a single ship or aeroplane or submarine." That is what France will say—and I think will say with justice—if the last word of the League of Nations is what we have heard to-night. It is a curious thing when one talks about the Pact of Paris to remember that the Prime Minister of Japan came over here two years ago—not the present Prime Minister but the Prime Minister at that time Mr. Hamaguchi—and that when he signed the Naval Treaty said:

> "It was clear that any breach of the Kellogg Pact must rally all against the aggressor, and whether other Powers offered active help or not, it was hardly conceivable that they would allow the pledge-breaker to interfere with their trade or enjoy the other privileges of a lawful belligerent."

He went back to Japan and was assassinated by the Japanese militarists, as so many statesmen have been assassinated in Japan in the last few years. We know that the present Government in Japan has been carried into power because more moderate statesmen have been murdered in the most brutal way. It is no good closing our eyes to that fact. We have heard this evening about Mr. Stimson and what he was prepared to do about an embargo on arms. This is the point in the statement of Mr. Stimson which I commend to the Committee. He said:

> "Much of the old conception that neutrality is a possibility has gone in the modern world if large nations are involved in war."

It was a statement which was carefully thought out by him because he made, as the Foreign Secretary knows, a very important statement to the same effect a year ago, that absolute neutrality in the modern world is impossible. It is all very well for the Foreign Secretary to say here that no consideration whatever will allow this country to be dragged into the present war. How does he know? How does he know that war may not develop? It is impossible for nations nowadays to go back into a state of splendid isolation. If you take up that attitude your work of building up a system of pooled security has disappeared and you must go back to the old alliances and balances of power of the old days which, sooner or later, will end in war. I am not at all satisfied with the declaration that we must simply put an embargo upon arms to China and Japan. Japan has been declared the aggressor and is well supplied with ammunition and guns. China we know does not manufacture her own ammunition, and therefore to put an embargo on arms sent both to China and to Japan is in fact to help Japan, the aggressor and the nation condemned by the League. I do not forget the difficulties of one country acting alone placing an embargo only upon the arms sent to one of the two countries. I realise that Japan has the command of the seas in the East which we formerly had, which has been given to her by the Nine-Power Treaty which she has broken, and owing to that fact she is in a position to intercept ships filled with arms. That might lead to conflict and to war. I understand that difficulty.

Sir J. SIMON: Is that what you recommend?

Mr. COCKS: I have said that I understand that difficulty.

Sir J. SIMON: And I now ask you, Is that what you recommend?

Mr. COCKS: I was going to go on——

Sir J. SIMON: I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman, but he said that he was not satisfied with the idea of the decision by this country that we should stop arms to both sides, and I gathered that his view was that we ought to send arms to one side and not to the other. If he thinks so, does he realise what the consequences will mean? I respectfully ask him, Is that what he recommends?

Mr. COCKS: The right hon. Gentleman always puts his points so courteously that I have not the slightest objection to the intervention. I was going to go on. I said that I understand the difficulties in the way, and I was going to say "but." We ought, as it has been suggested, to communicate with the Chinese Government and point out the position to them. I do not see why in any case there should be an embargo on any arms sent to her otherwise than by sea. For example, fleets of aeroplanes could go out there and not touch the sea. Aeroplanes could be sent to China which would be very useful in helping her to defend herself against this unjust attack, and they could go in various ways to China without going near the sea. The Secretary for Mines shakes his head. I know that he knows a great deal about things under the earth but I did not know that he is an authority in the clouds. I think that that could be done. Anyhow, a distinction of some sort should be made. I realise how grave is a situation like this, and yet I feel that in making the declaration which the Foreign Secretary has made and leaving it there we are not doing sufficient to defend the nation which has been attacked against the nation which has been condemned. Therefore, we should use every effort to obtain some arrangement between the nations, members of the League and the United States to place certain embargoes on goods going to Japan or bringing pressure in various ways which would put her at a disadvantage.

It is not enough just to keep the ring. For example, on the question of finance all loans should be forbidden to Japan, and she should be given no power to raise money in other countries, that is if agreement can be arrived at between all the countries concerned, including the United States. Judging from the letters of Mr. Stimson, America is quite willing cordially to co-operate with the League in certain measures of that sort. There is a question of not sending to her cotton, nitrates and various things used in warlike material. By that I do not mean a blockade of her shores but the prevention of these materials leaving the ports of the nations agreeing for Japan. I think that we ought also to repeat again the declaration already made, that no conquests made by Japan as a result of proceeding with an illegal war will ever be recognised by the League or by America. Let us reflect for a moment upon the obligations into which we have entered. Article XVI says:

> "Should any member of the League resort to war in disregard of its covenants under Article 12 . . . all other members of the League . . . hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State. . . ."

It may seem very drastic. It may not be wise to put it into operation all at once. But we must not ignore that obligation. It is a serious international obligation and if we ignore it we shall put ourselves in the same position of a lawbreaker as Japan. We must see to it that the obligations of the Article are carried out in the spirit if not in the exact letter of the law. If these international obligations are not carried out—I agree with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Sir A. Chamberlain)—I see nothing before the country and the world but disaster.

7.57 p.m.

Mr. R. LAW: I should not have ventured to detain the Committee had it not been for a remark dropped by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Colonel Wedgwood) in the course of his speech in reference to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery), who I am sorry is not in his place, as I should like to say something about his speech. He said that it was an example of good sound Conservatism. I could not have slept peacefully in my bed to-night if I had not got up and said that so far as I am concerned it seemed to me to be an example of extremely bad, unsound and dangerous Conservatism. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Major Hills) pointed out, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook made a great deal of play in the course of his speech with what he called realities. I have always noticed that when people talk a great deal about realities they do, in fact, give vent to a number of highly controversial statements and enunciations on the theories which they hold. Such it seemed to me was the case in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook. But there was, in particular, one fallacy which he expressed, and that was in his attitude towards this Debate. He seemed to regard the Debate, as has already been said, as a kind of football match in which it was necessary for every Member who spoke to cheer violently one side or the other, and he chose to cheer the Japanese.

But that is not the consideration which principally weighs with Members to-night. We all must have views about the rights or the wrongs of the quarrel in the Far East. I think that most of us feel that the Japanese have put themselves into a very awkward moral position, but, on the other hand, they have been very seriously provoked. What concerns us to-night is really something far more fundamental than that. It is nothing less than this. In the last 20 years there has been gradually growing up in the world a new idea of international relationships, a new idea of the kind of law which should govern the relations of the various civilised States of the world; what the right hon. Member for Darwen (Sir H. Samuel) described as a new world order and a new conception of neutrality. That new world order, which had been gradually growing up ever since 1914, has been and is being threatened by what is happening in the Far East to-day, and the question that we must first ask ourselves is this: Is the policy which the Government are pursuing likely to help in maintaining that new idea which has been growing up, or is it likely to result in weakening it? It is true that the Government have not taken up arms to maintain the new world order and that they have so far managed to avoid any course which is likely to end up in our having to take up arms on behalf of that world order.

The hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Cocks) pointed out that it was impossible to guarantee that we should not be involved in very serious trouble in the Far East. That is true, and the only thing that we have a right to demand of the Government is that they should take the course which is least likely to embroil us in trouble in the Far East, and on that point we must admit that they have taken the safest course. In listening to the statement of the Foreign Secretary, it seemed to me that the Government have done more than just play for safety. At this moment the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is at Geneva trying to see what can be done in order to give some kind of reality and force to the decision come to by the League. Throughout the whole trouble the Government and the Foreign Secretary have done everything they could to back up the League. From the point of view as to whether the Government are doing all that is possible to support the new world order, of which the League of Nations, the Kellogg Pact and the Nine Power Treaty are the outward signs, I believe that they are doing everything that they can.

There is one further consideration which must be in our minds, and that is a sentimental consideration, the consideration that war is in itself horrible and dangerous, dangerous not only to the physical bodies of those who participate in it but terribly dangerous to the whole structure of our civilisation. From that consideration there arises a secondary one, that since war has become of such great danger to us, it is indecent in any civilisel country to do anything to encourage wars and, even worse, to make profit out of wars. The statement which the Foreign Secretary made this evening has reassured a great many of us on that point. Whatever power we may have to encourage international action to settle the trouble in the Far East, we can be assured that our own hands are in this particular matter clean. I am sure that the statement made by the Foreign Secretary will be received not only by the Committee but by the country and the world with a feeling of the most profound relief, and I believe that by his statement he has set an example to the world which will be very rapidly followed.

3.4 p.m.

Mr. MANDER: I do not propose to attempt to retry the case that was decided at the Grand Assize at Geneva, with unanimity, only last Friday. Some hon. Members, two hon. Members, I think, have tried to go over the matter again and to suggest that the wrong decision was arrived at. It is a strange world, and it may be that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery) and the hon. Member behind me are right, and that the 42 members of the League of Nations were wrong, but I am inclined to think that on the whole the decision arrived at was the right one, that it is a final and just decision, and that it will stand for all time. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook made a violent attack upon the whole foreign policy of the Government. I want warmly to congratulate the Government on the part they have played in persuading the members of the Assembly of the League to arrive at that historic, dramatic decision a few days ago, a decision which is bound to be a precedent for all time and will have a very great effect for good, whatever happens in this particular dispute, through all the decades and centuries to come.

I congratulate the Government all the more because I did feel and I still feel that they, in common with the other great Powers, showed on the Council of the League at the beginning of this dispute, before there was any question of the Lytton Commission, lamentable weakness, feebleness and unwillingness to face up to the situation. If they had then shown the same firmness of decision that they have shown to-day, this terrible story might never have been told during the last few months. However, the situation fortunately is a satisfactory one at the moment from the point of view of the League. It is significant and very interesting that it was the representative of Belgium who took the chair when the decision was arrived at last Friday when the League, for the first time, expressed its opinion as to what it thought of the action of another member in endeavouring to tear up an important treaty as a mere scrap of paper.

The complaint that one has is not against Japan as such, it is not that we fail to recognise the grievances and rights of Japan, but entirely and solely that she has gone the wrong way about trying to get them put in order. If she would only consent to accept the guidance of the League and act in a spirit of co-operation, she would have no better friends in the world than the people of this country and the other members of the League. I am very glad to note what has been said by the Foreign Secretary to-day, that we do not regard the unanimous decision of the Assembly as being the end of the matter. The Japanese, of course, would be delighted if we would take that view, content ourselves with the Resolution, and take no further action. It would suit them entirely, because they would be able to do exactly what they want to do.

The Government feel, quite rightly, that there is a great deal more that can and should be done and they have taken certain measures already. It is necessary for us to take all the steps in the way of economic and moral pressure that we can possibly bring to bear upon Japan during the next few weeks and months, and I am glad to hear that the Government are making an international effort at Geneva, where the Under-Secretary is playing an admirable part, in trying to arrange for simultaneous action on the part of all the nations of the world, I hope not only in regard to armaments but financial support and other methods to which I should like to refer. It will be realised how enormous are the difficulties and the great obstacles that will have to be faced in dealing with a new situation of this kind. There are armament-mongers in this and other countries. I might give one little passing example of the sort of influence that is brought to bear, by recalling the fact, which was disclosed in this House some months ago, that an English armaments firm, Messrs. Vickers, advertised in a German military paper the sale of tanks—armaments which are forbidden to Germany under the Treaty of Versailles. That is an example of the efforts that will be made in opposition to the embargo on the export of arms by armament firms all over the world, who will see a threat to their interests in a development of this kind.

I am sure that the decision announced by the Government in regard to the prohibition and importation of arms must obviously apply not only to the Far East but to the two disputes that are going on in South America, and I would ask the representative of the Government who may reply if he will be good enough to state specifically whether the export of arms will be prohibited equally to Bolivia, Uruguay, Peru and Colombia. We may not have arrived at the stage of a decision by the Assembly on that point, but some indication might be given as to whether we are not equally committed to taking similar action in any other part of the world where a similar situation may arise. Reference has been made to the widespread nature of munitions of war, and I hope the Government, in putting forward their proposals for international consideration, will include such articles as oil, cotton, nitrates and others which are essential to the manufacture of munitions by Japan.

The Foreign Secretary made a historic announcement this afternoon when he said that the Government had decided not to allow the export of arms to either party. I would say, first of all, before venturing to criticise, that that is in itself a very fine gesture. It was just 100 years ago that we in this country made another great gesture when, regardless of what other countries were doing, we decided that slavery should cease to exist anywhere inside the British Empire. The Foreign Secretary is familiar with the whole of that story, and it is not unfitting that it should be he who to-day should announce another great gesture by the Government of this country. If the decision that has been announced by the Government is to be regarded purely as a temporary emergency decision, there is a great deal to be said for it and we can support it, but if it were to be for a moment considered as a permanent settlement of this question of the export of arms, it would be grossly unfair, it would be intolerably unjust to China, and would be taking the side of the aggressor against the State that had been attacked, for the obvious reason that Japan is in a good position to manufacture armaments and China is not. I hope, and I take it as certain, that the intention of the Government is to regard it as an emergency measure and that they will use all their efforts during the next few days or weeks to come to bring about some general international settlement that will give fair play to the State that has been attacked and not to penalise her, as she would be seriously penalised by permanent action on these lines.

There has been some discussion about the attitude of the pacifists. I do not take up the attitude of the pacifists and say that under no circumstances should force be used. We live in an unruly world and just as we have to employ the police inside the State, so we want something in the nature of a force of international police, an armed force at the present time, to control the people of the world. The only justification, to my mind, for the use of force in the future—I do not suggest it in this case—is the maintenance of the authority of the League of Nations. I can imagine a war for the maintenance of the Covenant of the League against an aggressor to be a perfectly justifiable and proper war, but I do not think that military action of any kind could be used with effect, or should be used, in the particular dispute we are considering at the moment. There are other weapons which are far more effective and far less dangerous. In confining our attention so much to the question of the export of arms we may lose sight of the fact that the military issue may be decided in two or three weeks. Certainly it is not going to take very long, and by the time an embargo on the export of arms could be carried into effect here, or elsewhere, the military issue will be decided. We have to think of the sort of economic pressure we can bring to bear throughout the months, and it may be years to come, and so drive it home to the Japanese Government and people that they must really play the game and that they can only get their wishes carried out effectively, their reasonable wishes, by going the world's way, and not along their own path of naked brutal selfishness.

In this connection, let me call attention to the various things we may do, to the obligations under which we already rest in this matter. Reference has been made to Article XVI, and it is so important that I ask permission of the Committee to read it once more. Article XVI is not, of course, in operation because technically there has been no declaration of war, but at any rate in spirit it is in operation. It says:

> "Should any member of the League resort to war in disregard of its covenants under Articles XII, XIII, or XV, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the League, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the League or not."

This may be considered very far-reaching and undesirable, but it is the law of the world, to which we have put our signature and we cannot depart from it. The Foreign Secretary stated some time ago that the Government adhered to all their obligations under the Covenant, and a few days ago I put to him this question:

> "whether the Government adhere to Annex F of the Locarno Treaty defining our interpretation of the obligations of Article 16 of the Covenant as meaning that each State member of the League is bound to co-operate loyally and effectively in support of the Covenant, and in resistance to any act of aggression to an extent which is compatible with its military situation and takes its geographical position into account?"

And the Foreign Secretary in reply said:

> "Yes, Sir, they do."—[Official Report, 15th February, 1933; col. 979, Vol. 274.]

That makes it perfectly clear that the Government binds itself in honour to carry out the obligations to which we have set our hands. The question now is: What is the most effective way to do these things? Fortunately, the situation is very much easier than it has been on previous occasions because we have the sympathy and practical co-operation of the United States, which is of infinite value and supreme importance, and available now more readily perhaps than would be the case at any time in the future. At the Assembly of the League of Nations in 1921 they gave careful and detailed consideration to the question as to how Article XVI could be put into operation when the necessity arose, and they passed recommendations and resolutions on the subject. On the 4th October, 1921, they decided that a number of steps may be taken. Some of them have been referred to to-day. Lord Lytton, whose services in connection with this matter one cannot praise too highly, has recently expressed the view that there are three things which might be done at the right moment—two of them have already been referred to—the question of the export of arms, the withholding of financial assistance, and, thirdly, the withdrawal of Ambassadors, which has not yet been referred to in this Debate.

It might be thought that a measure of that kind would not be very effective, but those who know the Japanese nation best, and who realise what a proud and sensitive nation they are, take the view that the spectacle of all the Ambassadors and Ministers simultaneously leaving Tokio for their own country would create a profound impression in Japan, and would do more than anything else to make the Japanese people, from whom I believe the truth is now being withheld, realise what is thought of them by the rest of the world and how morally isolated they are from the good will and sympathy of the nations. I hope that international consideration will be given, together with these other matters, to the possibility at the right moment of a dramatic measure of this kind, to play its part along with the other proposals which have been made.

In regard to the question of imports and exports many hon. Members regard exports from foreign countries as being undesirable things and, therefore, there should not be much difficulty in persuading the House that in certain circumstances exports from a defaulting country into this country are undesirable. It certainly may be possible as an economic Sanction to consider the question of refusing access to British or other world markets to goods coming from a country that has been found in default by the unanimous decision of the League of Nations.

These are simple, practical questions, although, obviously, in carrying them out there are enormous difficulties; but they are simple propositions and have been considered by the most authoritative body in the past, the League of Nations, and have been pronounced as being possible and practicable. They are alternatives to military action and are obviously infinitely preferable to anything of that kind. I have no doubt that the Government will give them the most serious consideration.

Let me deal with one more aspect of the matter. It may be that the world will find the task too great. I am wondering whether it is not possible for the International Trade Union movement to consider the practicability, in certain circumstances, if they have the power through their organisations to lay down and carry out a policy which would make the handling of munitions for a defaulting State impossible, and prevent goods being carried to any destination of that kind. It is a matter that I have no doubt will be considered, and while there are difficulties there too, it certainly is not outside the bounds of possibility and may possibly fit into the picture in some way.

I was reading yesterday in a Sunday newspaper an article that seemed to me strangely to misjudge and misrepresent the position before us to-day. The question was asked in that article, " What has Jehol to do with Southwark or Chao Yong to do with Salford ? " I venture to say that it has everything to do with the people of this country. If naked force is to be allowed to triumph in the world once more, then the new planned order of peace that has been erected with such infinite pain and trouble since the War, will lie scattered in the dust, and there will be no hope for the Disarmament Conference, no hope for the World Economic Conference, no hope for a return to prosperity in this country, and no hope for the 3,000,000 of unemployed who are now scattered about our towns and cities. This question affects most vitally every household in the land, whether as citizens or as workpeople or as potential soldiers, and I trust that the Government will act with all their courage and determination, knowing that they will be backed by the overwhelming support of public opinion.

Brigadier-General NATION: I dare say it will be wondered why one who has spent the greater part of his life in the service of arms should put his name to the Motion on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for West Leeds (Mr. V. Adams). I will quote the words of a very distinguished Field-Marshal who died last week, who saw war in every phase and in many countries, and who on a public platform said more than once that war was " a mug's game." I agree entirely with that sentiment. I must say that until quite recently the declarations in this House regarding the situation in China had rather filled me with anxiety. I was afraid that there was to be too much delay before any action could be taken by our Government. The Government were elected with an enormous majority to carry out two main objects in which this country is particularly interested. One was the reduction of unemployment, and the other was to maintain the peace of the world by disarmament or other means. I shall say nothing about unemployment to-night, but with regard to disarmament I must say that during the time the Government have been in power there has been little or no sign of anything taking place except with regard to our own force. No other nation has disarmed, whilst we are reduced to the point of danger.

We who sit on the back benches here have supported the Government loyally throughout the time we have been in Parliament. Recently we have been getting a little anxious because so little progress has been made on the two subjects to which I have referred. We are hoping that something more practical, something more concrete, will emerge before very long. I am glad to say that the speech to-day of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has completely restored my confidence. If the Debate had ended with that speech I am sure the effect in this country and throughout the world would have been greater than it can be after the raising of the more or less confused issues that have been brought forward by other speakers.

I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery) took up the attitude he adopted to-day. Although he and I are in the same party it is an attitude to which I cannot subscribe. I cannot conceive that either this House or the people at large would countenance our supporting one side or the other in this Far East conflict. Our position should be that we have nothing to do with this war, that we will not support either side morally or with arms. While our own forces are cut to the bone we could not in any circumstances provide arms for other nations to fight with. I am completely satisfied with what the Government have done, and if I may do so I would humbly wish to congratulate them on the very fine statement made by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to-day.

Sir GEORGE GILLETT: I think the Government will not have very much of which to complain in the Debate that has taken place. Unlike the last speaker, I am rather glad that we had the speech of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery), although personally I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman. I believe, however, that he has voiced the views of a certain number of men and women whom one meets in daily life and who go about saying, as the right hon. Gentleman practically said, that the days of the League of Nations are more or less numbered. I entirely disagree with the views which the right hon. Gentleman expressed. He seemed rather proud of them as the views of a man who was really looking at the difficulties. He talked in a rather patronising way of the pacifists and, I gathered, the faddists at Geneva and in Downing Street, who believe that the world can be remodelled on anything different from the old lines to which we have become accustomed. I do not look upon the right hon. Gentleman as a realist; I look upon him simply as a pessimist. That is really the view that he expresses. Someone said to me the other day, "Dog has always eaten dog. We have always had war, and we will always have war." That was virtually the sentiment expressed by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. I think that the real issue was disclosed to this House some months ago in the speech made by the Leader of the House, when he gave us that great address on the danger of aerial warfare. There, it seems to me, is the point of view of the man who has realised the dangers that beset us if war does not come to and end.

Why I look upon this Debate and the events taking place in the Far East as so important is that in one sense this is one of the first great problems that have faced the League of Nations. Those who have taken any interest in the League cannot have been blind to the fact that sooner or later the League would come to just such an emergency as this, with a country that was badly governed and split up as we have heard China is split up to-day; and, on the other hand, another country with an increasing population, a country desirous of expansion and a country dominated by a very efficient war machine. We have wondered how the League of Nations would face a problem of that kind. Because there have been delays and difficulties many people have said that the League of Nations is no use. But if a system of warfare has been going for thousands of years, and if we are attempting, by means of the League, to begin to mould another system in which war will be replaced untimately by law, then, merely because within barely 20 years the new system is still imperfect, are we to say that the whole thing is a failure and that the attempt might as well be abandoned?

Hundreds of years ago when this country was dominated by nobles who, with their armed retainers, waged war upon one another, a man who was I suppose something of a pacifist, wrote a letter, or an article, or put upon paper in some form his belief that the day would come in this country when there would be order and law. I suppose that he was looked upon as an impracticable dreamer who thought of something which could never possibly come into being. Doubtless people like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook told that man that his idea was impossible. Yet 600 or 700 years have passed and what that man thought of has long been recognised as the law and the government of this country. It seems to me that it is through a series of difficulties that we shall have to evolve the idea of law working through the government of the League of Nations.

In one sense, many of the problems which we are facing to-day we are facing for the first time and it is very remarkable that we should find 41 nations of the world declaring in favour of one united opinion on this question. It is very fortunate indeed that we have this great united world opinion expressed at a time when the first great test has come and I think we may congratulate those who have had the conduct and control of matters at Geneva. We have heard criticisms of them and they have seemed at times to act slowly but at any rate the conclusion of their work has been to gather this virtually unanimous opinion representing nearly all the nations of the world in favour of one definite view. How we are to impose that opinion on the nations who are waging war is one of the difficulties to be faced. I welcome the statement of the Foreign Secretary in regard to the arms embargo. Some of us may think that it would be better if it were directed solely against the country which has had the verdict given against it but we ought not too hastily to jump to such a conclusion.

We have to think out what is the best course to pursue and the assurance that the Government are taking action with the other nations on the lines indicated is one that we may all welcome. There may be other ways in which the opinion of the world can be brought to bear on the Japanese people. There is perhaps much truth in what Japan may say that the pages of our own history are covered with acts similar to those which she is doing in Manchuria to-day. No one who is familiar with the history of the development of our Empire can deny that there is a good deal of truth in it but even if that be so, we hope that the world is moving forward however slowly and that it has moved a stage forward in these matters. We welcome what has taken place at Geneva and the part which our own Government has played in connection with this problem.

8.40 p.m.

Mr. LEWIS: The great War has produced many evil things. It has produced very few good things. Probably many in this Committee would agree that of those very few good things, the League of Nations is one of the best. It may be that the idea of a League of Nations is premature. It may be that the world as a whole, like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery), thinks that the time is not yet ripe to substitute the force of argument for the argument of force. Perhaps mankind has yet to pass through other phases before the conception of a council of the nations, of a world state, can be translated into reality. But this I think is clearly true, that if the world cannot evolve a League of Nations or some substitute for it that will work, then the civilisation which has been built up through so many centuries, with such great labour, will be as utterly destroyed as were the civilisations that preceded Greece and Rome. No people more than our own, for the last 300 years, worked to spread the civilisation of Western Europe over the world. No people other than our own have greater responsibilities to-day for government in different parts of the world. Therefore, it seems to me that we, above all peoples, should be interested in trying to make work the new and to some extent imperfect machinery of the League of Nations.

It is very reasonable that we should give up a day of the time of the House of Commons to the discussion of this Sino-Japanese dispute, because in many parts of the world to-day it is regarded as a test for the League of Nations—something which will show whether the League is a reality or a sham. Without going into the controversial details of the dispute between China and Japan, and admitting that there are many things to be said for and against either country, two things stand out clearly from the Lytton Report. One is that so far as naval and military operations are concerned, Japan is the aggressor. The other is that the so-called independent State of Manchukuo is a sham. I do not think that either of those two facts has been seriously controverted in the Debate. For those reasons most of us awaited with anxiety and great interest the statement of the Foreign Secretary. We cannot complain that he was not clear and definite. We are to understand that from to-day, with the exception of certain current contracts, there is to be an embargo on the export of arms and ammunition from this country to Japan or to China.

I suppose that to any peaceable individual there is something extremely distasteful, to say the least of it, in the idea of supplying to other people the means to kill and maim each other. Therefore, I suppose that the pronouncement by the Foreign Secretary of our policy in this matter will meet with a very wide measure of approval in the country, but I cannot help wondering whether in fact that decision is not premature, and that for two reasons. In the first place, it seems to me that it very much weakens our position at Geneva. After all, we were in the position that we could go forward to other great nations, themselves able to do a large and profitable trade in armaments of war, and say to them: "We are willing to give up this trade in this dispute. We have our great number of unemployed, we have our financial troubles, but none the less we will forgo this possibility of trade, and we ask you o do the same.” We are not now in that osition. We can only go to them and ay: “We have forgone this trade, and we invite you to do the same.” That seems to me to be somewhat the position of which we read in the fable, of the fox which lost its tail in a trap, and then went round and suggested to all the other foxes how much more comfortable they would be if they did away with that encumbrance, the tail.

That seems to me to be the one disadvantage, and the other is this: I do not think it has been seriously argued in this Debate by anyone but that the immediate effect of this embargo will be to the disadvantage, not of Japan, the aggressor, but of China. Quite apart from any question of contracts which may be in existence, as the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Sir A. Chamberlain) pointed out with great force, in matters of this kind the aggressor always takes the trouble to be well prepared. Surely no one doubts that at this moment, if left entirely to their own resources, the Japanese are in an infinitely stronger position to produce all the munitions of war that they require than are their opponents, the Chinese. Therefore, it seems to me that on those two grounds, on the ground that it weakens our position vis-à-vis other great nations at Geneva which are able, like ourselves, to do a big trade in munitions, and, secondly, that in fact at the moment it hurts not so much Japan as China, the decision which the Foreign Secretary has announced to-day is premature. The only alternative is international action, and that, we understand from the Foreign Secretary, is not discarded, but is being pursued. It is suggested to us, as is, of course, only too true, that action of that kind must be very slow and very difficult, but I think time will show that in a matter of this kind, however slow and however difficult it may be, it is the only satisfactory method.

There was one passage between the Foreign Secretary and the right hon. Member for Bow and Bromley (Mr. Lansbury) which I did not quite understand, and I do not know whether I heard the Foreign Secretary wrongly, but the right hon. Gentleman who leads the Labour party asked if he could give the House a clear statement as to what proposals were being put forward, on behalf of our Government, at Geneva in this dispute at the moment. As I understood the Foreign Secretary, he replied that, partly because of the distance between here and Geneva, he was not in a position to say. I do not know if I do him an injustice, but I hope that someone speaking for the Government later in the Debate will be able to tell us quite clearly what are the main lines of policy which are at this moment being pursued by our Government in this dispute at Geneva, because surely it is ridiculous to suppose that the Foreign Secretary sits on this Bench here and leaves his Under-Secretary at Geneva to do whatever he likes, regardless of the directions which he has had from the right hon. Gentleman. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman and other responsible Ministers must know, in a matter of this vital importance, what are the main suggestions which we are putting forward to the other Powers with regard to this dispute.

I hope that those suggestions will take something of the form of progressive embargo upon exports to Japan on the part of the various nations which are members of the League, with an invitation to America and to the Soviet to join in; and I hope that if any such proposals are put forward and seriously considered, the position will not be spoiled by making such an embargo apply to both parties. The Foreign Secretary suggested, among other reasons, the serious difficulty that, for example, if we refuse to supply arms to Japan and are willing to supply them to China, Japan might seize a ship going to China with arms. Surely he does not suggest that the only way to get arms to China is to send them by sea. It is true that that is by far the most convenient way to send such things as heavy guns or other heavy munitions, but there is no difficulty whatever in getting smaller arms or munitions into China over land frontiers in many places. The French have such frontiers in Indo-China, the Russians in the North, Siam has frontiers, and we ourselves have such a frontier in Western China. There is nothing impracticable in sending small munitions up the Irrawaddy and over the frontier into China at Bhamo. If the will is there, we can get a great many munitions of war into China without Japan having any chance at all of interfering.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK: How many days will it take to get them there?

Mr. LEWIS: A considerable time, I agree, but it is practicable; it could be done, particularly if the struggle is prolonged. Therefore, I think that, in an embargo of this kind, the position should be left free to the other nations of the world to supply China if they wish. I very much object to the idea that the two countries in this dispute should be lumped together and that any embargo that is applied should be applied to both. It seems to me that we are in the position of saying to China, "We sympathise with you and think the other fellow is in the wrong, but we are not prepared to come and fight for you, and we are not prepared to help you to fight the other man." I agree most thoroughly with the Foreign Secretary when he says that the fact of condemnation by the League is in itself of first-class importance. It produces a certain moral isolation for Japan, but I venture to say that it will prove a great deal more effective if steps are taken to turn that moral isolation into an increasing degree of physical isolation.

Mr. WALLHEAD: I wish to say a word or two in comment on the many statements that have been made with regard to the provocation that Japan has received in the dispute between herself and China. I interposed a remark to the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery) as to why Japan had not put her case before the League. It has been stated, and I got it in reply, that Japan has put her case before the League, but as far as I know Japan has put no case before the League, and she never proposed to put her case before the League. The statements which she made were of a rhetorical kind and were made in the League Assembly. I should have thought that putting her case before the League would mean that she was prepared to go to the League and give full information, papers, documents, and so on, in order that the League might come to a right conclusion. I am driven to the conclusion that Japan did not want to put her case to the League and that she preferred to play the game which she has played.

Japan has never needed to look very far for reasons for acts of aggression. The history of Japan is like the history o all imperialistic states; wheneve aggression has been intended reasons have not been far to seek for it. I suppose that it would be difficult to find a more peaceful race than the Koreans and yet Japan found the same reason for her aggression in Korea that she had found in Manchuria. It was the necessity for protecting Japanese nationals although I have never been able to understand what protection they needed in Korea. Japan went in with just the same policy that she has pursued in this quarrel with China over Manchuria. Towns were razed to the ground, the old Queen, no doubt a very provocative old lady, was dragged from her palace and beheaded in her own courtyard—all in the defence of some mythical Japanese nationals. Japan found the same causes for her acts of aggression in the Far Eastern Republic in the post-war period. There she agreed with America and ourselves to send a police force of 7,000 or 8,000 men, and after America and ourselves had withdrawn from the Far Eastern Republic, Japan was still there and maintained there an army of 70,000 to 80,000 men, carrying on acts of brutal aggression in all the towns and parts that she occupied. There was murder, bloodshed and rapine wherever they were in possession. The same thing is going on at the present moment.

It has been hinted that Japan may turn round and say: "You have done the same." That is true. All Imperialist nations have taken the same course. We are in the position of the poacher turned gamekeeper. I do not know how we are to bring this thing to an end. I do not think that Japan will be willing to retreat from the position which she has taken up. The only thing that will bring her to her senses is a form of keen economic boycott. The same effects will not be obtained by stopping the supply of munitions. One has only to consider the strength of Japan in air and naval power to see the overwhelming advantage that she has over China in spite of the so-called embargo which is supposed to come into operation now. If the position suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Morgan Jones) is anything to go by, if the contracts that now exist are to be carried out and if they are Japanese contracts, it is obvious that we shall go on arming Japan for a very long time to come. But there are no contracts to supply her with money as far as I know and an economic boycott will do more to bring her to her senses than a boycott of arms can possibly do. Her problem would then become an economic one.

The Foreign Secretary might explain to Japan that we have had some experience of Imperialism; very few nations have had more; and he might explain that, while acts of aggression are fairly easy to commit, particularly when they are committed against weaker nations, they are damnably difficult to get out of. The after effects remain for a long time. The right hon. Gentleman might explain that while we have been Imperialistic in the last 150 years, our Imperialism, although it may have brought some advantage from a commercial point of view, has brought us many difficulties from a political point of view. We have had some difficulties in Ireland. We have a few in India, and they are likely to continue; and if Japan is looking for trouble, Imperialism is the proper way to provide herself with some. We can give her some splendid examples of the troubles that accrue when a nation becomes too greedy. We have 3,000,000 men unemployed after all our Imperialism, after all our expansion, and after winning the War. Japan may win in this case, and we and other people may supply her with munitions, but she may say: "The debts are so huge we cannot pay them; other people have found that out." Our debts were for munitions, and Japan's debts will be for munitions. We cannot pay ours very well, and she will probably find more difficulty in paying them we have as she is in a desparate position. If we can bring an economic boycott, it would lead up to a kind of social revolution on the part of the Japanese people against their militarists, and that would be the best way of bringing the war between China and Japan to a satisfactory conclusion. If the Foreign Secretary would explain these points to Japan and tell them that this is a dangerous policy, that no good can really come out of it, and that nothing but trouble can accrue, she might learn a little sense.

The Government are "sitting pretty" at the present moment, and that is as good a position as they can take up, and the Foreign Secretary says definitely that we are not going into war. I hope that he is correct, but I have my doubts. We can easily drift into war, and I can easily visualise a position in the Far East that would bring repercussions in Central Europe. Everybody who has watched Japanese developments must realise that one of the things that she wants is the maritime province of the Far Eastern Republic. She wants that stretch of sea from Vladivostok to Kikolaievsk and the Island of Sakhalin. If she attempts to get them there may be war with Russia. She wants the whole of the inlets to the main land and the railroad. I think that some kind of encouragement has been given to Japanese ambitions; there have been some hopes in Europe that something might take place there that would bring Japan on to Russia's far flung flank. I believe that there is some reason for that hope. If such a position should develop, I would not be too sure that we should be able to keep out of it, because there might be repercussions in Central Europe that would bring us into a war, and that war would very likely be the end of European civilisation.

It is difficult nowadays to localise war. It was possible at one time to confine it in a small area, but it is not so possible now. Economic interests are so widely spread that capitalist nations find themselves affected at every point, north, south, east and west, and economic interests can only be protected during a state of war by military means. That is the assumption and those are the difficulties that will lead us on from one danger to another. I hope the danger may be averted. I hope the aspirations of the Foreign Secretary may be maintained. I do not want to see this country in war, and I am quite convinced that the safest way to keep us out is to bring this controversy, this horrible business, to a conclusion at the earliest possible moment. It should be our policy to isolate the aggressor as much as possible and make it impossible for this war to be continued.

9.7 p.m.

Mr. VYVYAN ADAMS: So many references have been made to the speech of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery) that I hesitate to mention it again. The House has well noted it and will long remember it. It was, indeed, a remarkable speech. At the beginning he exhibited anxiety for the cause of China, and then said, practically in the same breath, "How dare you condemn Japan; she has an arguable case?" It may be an arguable case, but how has Japan chosen to argue? With force, and with force alone. The right hon. Gentleman concluded his speech by frequent references to reality. What exactly does he mean by reality? He reminded me of a sermon I once heard by a distinguished bishop, arguing the same theme of the status quo, in which he ended by saying: "Brethren,"—he was a very democratic bishop—"as long as human nature is human nature, human nature will be human nature still." It is this kind of theory, advanced by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, that human nature, and therefore human behaviour, can never change, which is the obstacle to progress all the time. It may be that human nature does not change, but if human behaviour does not change then, indeed, we are doomed. He attacked the policy of His Majesty's Government, quite irrelevantly, I thought, in this Debate, on the subject of the internationalisation of civil aviation, and yet he claimed the whole time to be a realist. Later in this Debate a true realist was sitting on the Treasury Bench, namely, the Lord President of the Council. I would have recommended the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, were he here, to re-read carefully the words of the Lord President of the Council. Let him take to heart those words, which cannot be refuted. "Whatever the man in the street may be told to the contrary, the bomber is always bound to get through." That is the true realism, not the kind of pseudo-realism advanced by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook.

Earlier to-day we had an exhortation from the right hon. Member for Bow and Bromley (Mr. Lansbury) to young men. Perhaps I have been incited by that exhortation. Twice in February of last year, and in March, I put questions on the Paper urging the President of the Board of Trade to withhold licences for the continued exportation of arms and munitions to the Far East. I am going to speak to-day in tones of the most humble congratulation to my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on the extremely noble, fine and definitive action he has at last taken, but I have always held the view, heterodox as it may have been at times, that this traffic has been both inexpedient and wrong—inexpedient because it has made it much more easy to wage war and, as the Foreign Secretary has said constantly on the Floor of this House, the best interests of Great Britain are the interests of peace. Again, as the House is well aware, one gets the evil contingency that men enlisted in Yorkshire may very well be despatched by bullets made in Sheffield. I suggest that this traffic in arms is utterly wrong. Of course it is immoral for our armament factories to flourish upon the bloody disputes of foreigners. I apologise if these notions appear somewhat Victorian and Puritanical to the Committee. The other day I heard it suggested that it was a matter for congratulation that a clothing factory had secured a large order for Japanese uniforms. I cannot believe it is a matter of congratulation, particularly as those uniforms will be worn in a war which is now admittedly an aggressive war against the Chinese, and if I were confronted with the crude and grim alternative of deciding which is the greater evil, the unemployment of our own people or the killing of Orientals, I fear I should unhesitatingly say the greater evil is the killing of Orientals.

To-night we have seen impersonated by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary the spectacle of Great Britain rising at long last to her full height and the full consciousness of her prestige. I am glad that we have taken this unilateral action, because I believe it will result very soon in multilateral action. Surely it is cause for congratulation that we have decided that Great Britain shall not make a single penny piece of profit out of the persistent warfare in the Far East. It is a new departure entirely in foreign policy. I think we shall quickly be followed by other great Powers. America has already declared that she is willing to take the same course, and I believe France will quickly follow us. So long as we allow the notion to get abroad that the "other fellow" in the international sphere is not to be trusted, so long will international behaviour take the lowest possible form. I do not believe that the other great Powers will persist in a policy of moral isolation in this matter.

Last Friday the League of Nations in he eyes of all fair-minded men ceased eebly to temporise. It ceased to be idiculous. The Lytton report is, in the yes of fair-minded men, a document uniassed by political prejudice, and if the nanimous verdict of the Assembly of the eague of Nations will not satisfy the ight hon. Member for Sparkbrook, what n earth will satisfy him? I think the Committee are entitled to know from the oreign Secretary exactly what course nay have to be pursued if the sanctions nder Article 16 are invoked. For my art, I think that situation will not arise, ut we ought to consider the continency. I suppose there were three ourses open to His Majesty's Governnent. In the first place, there is the ossibility of using military force. I oubt very much whether in any circumtances in the present dispute that would e a moral line to take, because I hold he view that it is as hypocritical to seek repel force by force as for the State to ry to correct one murder by committing nother.

Hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Wallhead) ave suggested the economic blockade. hat, also, is a possibility which I would ke to put in a very remote position ndeed. It is one of the cruellest devices. n enforcing an economic blockade upon apan you would probably inflict upon apanese women and children, perfectly nnocent most of them, ineffable hardhip. When I read of my right hon. riend the Leader of the Opposition dvocating upon a platform in the ountry a few days ago this extreme anction, I wanted to adapt the words Shylock and to say to him:

> "Hath not a Jap eyes? Hath not a Jap nds, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, ssions? Fed with the same food, hurt ith the same weapons, subject to the same seases, healed by the same means, warmed nd cooled by the same winter and summer, a Christian is? If you prick us, do we ot bleed? If you tickle us, do we not ugh? If you poison us, do we not die?"

y an economic blockade you would not e poisoning the Japanese soldiers or ilors or the Japanese military party. is axiomatic that the first people to ffer would be the Japanese women and hildren. Do not let it be supposed that am in any sense pro-Japanese, nor deed am I pro-Chinese. If I may adopt the words of Lord Lytton, I am merely pro-League in this Debate.

How very important it has been, and how vital, and a matter again for congratulation of my right hon. Friend that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has not taken the easy course of inertia. We have, to some extent, taken the third sanction and the third possibility, of not exporting arms to the Far East. It is the least violent sanction, and by taking this course we shall not be making the mistake of seeking to penalise a nation as you would punish an individual. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery) delivered a speech which, I should have imagined, was almost impossible at this stage. He said in effect, "Hands off Japan; they are doing the kind of things that our predecessors had done on scores of occasions in our own history." To that school of thought I would say that you cannot extenuate the crimes of other people by condemning yourselves. Is not it a fact that the nations of the world who were signatories to the Covenant of the League of Nations have said that they will not revert to the methods of yesterday? I suggest to this Committee that laisser faire is a pre-war sophistry and a pre-League argument. It cannot be pursued any longer.

I suppose that the irresponsible portion of the Press will gather together again and will republish the antiquated arguments, in order to try to destroy the very fine policy initiated to-day by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I would very respectfully warn him that there are those irresponsible sections of the Press, which will do their best to show there is no immediate profit in pounds, shillings and pence to be gained by the policy that he has initiated. Let us get down to the true realities of the situation, not those submitted to the Committee by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook. You cannot localise any of these disputes now. The world has contracted too much. Let the Committee reflect for a moment upon what happened in 1914, in the conflict which is closest to our memory. A criminal lunatic at Sarajevo pulled the trigger of his revolver, and in six weeks the whole of Europe was in a conflagration which it took 51 months to extinguish.

In a very real sense, the mechanical inventiveness of man has caused us to be our brother's keeper. The Covenant of the League of Nations, to which we are absolutely bound, has seen to that. I would like hon. Members who may have a lingering regret in regard to the course that has been taken to-day to look ahead for 10 years and to ask themselves: "Shall we not feel at that future time some gratification that Great Britain, in the Sino-Japanese dispute of 1933, put integrity above private gain?" Suppose we had taken the advice that is constantly being pressed upon us by the irresponsible sections of the Press and had calmly proceeded to trade with both sides. It might have been that our industries which are now suffering from partial collapse would have experienced a temporary recovery. The looms might have hummed and the blast furnaces might have glared. For a brief time, they might have enjoyed a period of tremendous activity, but then would have come the day of reckoning. We might well have come to be in the same position as is the United States of America. Although Japan might militarily have won an unqualified victory as we did in the last War, the House does not need to be reminded that war profits no one, not even the quartermaster or the proud paymaster.

Captain McEWEN: I cannot say that I altogether agree with the entirely pacifist outlook of my hon. Friend the Member for West Leeds (Mr. V. Adams), whose able speech we have just heard with great interest, nor can I agree with the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Wallhead) in his suggestion that the Foreign Secretary should approach the Japanese Government and explain to them in a friendly sort of way that if they would only work gradually towards the social revolution, all would be well for them. I would join with my hon. Friend the Member for West Leeds in congratulating the Government very heartily upon their successful handling of what has been, and still is, a very delicate and ticklish problem, and upon the decision, made known to us this afternoon by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs himself, to withhold export licences for arms, pending the consideration by other Powers of international action in this direction.

While being nothing of a pacifis myself, I have often felt acutely th difficulty of reconciling the avowe pursuit of peace with the action o supplying the very means of destroyin that peace to those who happen to be a the particular moment at each other' throats. The Secretary of State fo Foreign Affairs has taken not only logical step but also a very wise one which is a somewhat rare combination I am convinced that a vast body o opinion in this country will heartil approve of the decision that has bee made. All the greater was the effect o the right hon. Gentleman's speech coming immediately after the bellicos words of the Leader of the Opposition whose attitude was that we should lon ago have put into effect Article 16 of th Covenant which lays down that a economic boycott should automaticall be applied to an aggressor State. H emphasised the fact that the militar party in Tokio were very much in th ascendant, without apparently connecting the significance of those two facts The fact of the matter is that nothin but consummate diplomacy, not necessarily confined to the Foreign Office, has so far, prevented any such action bein taken. Had Article 16 been put int effect there is no doubt at all that i would have been the signal for war.

As the British Empire happens to b the most important State facing th Japanese Empire in the Far East, i would have been against our Far Easter possessions that the war would have bee in the first place directed. It is no goo saying that the framers of the Covenan ought to have foreseen this contingency I would say that this contingency ha been foreseen by many for a lon time. I would go further and say tha it is well known that the conditions o Article 16 are not practicable, and that in fact, they are unworkable and ough to be revised—it is merely a case now o who will bell the cat. We have hear to-day a lot of talk about realities. Her is a reality, and one towards which ever country, signatory of the Covenant o the League of Nations, is not unnaturall unwilling to turn its eyes. I cannot hel feeling that it is a matter of considerabl congratulation for us all that the righ hon. Gentleman and his friends on th Labour benches, have not been in charg nd directing foreign affairs during the ast 18 months for then, undoubtedly, ome at least of these horrors to which e referred with such force in his speech, ould be with us to-day.

Mr. PICKERING: Although we have een impatient regarding the action of he Government at Geneva, they have at ast achieved something; they have at ast come to us with a unanimous committee of 19, and the whole League nanimous. Although a great deal of he Debate has ranged round this question of the embargo, I, personally, do ot think it is a matter of such great moment as many people represent it to e. I do not think that, whether we ut on an embargo on arms going to apan, or Japan and China, will matter ery much because, so far as military perations are concerned, the issue is ot in very grave doubt. I do think, owever, that it is well for this country hat we are showing we are not out to make any profit from the export of arms. regard it as a very fine gesture which may impress Japan very much. Apart rom that, I do not think we are doing particularly good service to the cause f China by this embargo, but it may e that it may not make any particular ifference to the issue.

What most of us who are pro-League r internationally-minded are concerned bout is a means of converting the apanese people, or Government, to an cceptance of the situation as Europe nd the rest of the world have seen it. do not believe we shall do so as long as he present military clique is in power n Japan. When I speak in protest gainst the military clique, it is a good eal more difficult for me to do so than or other Members. I know a good many f the people concerned, and some of hem know me. I do not like to say nything against the country which gave me so much hospitality. I do feel that he great difficulty we are up against is he present powerful position of militarism in Japan. A short time ago the ight hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Colonel Wedgwood) was speaking about he badness of the Japanese Government. During the time I was in Japan the ystem of government was developing remarkably and then, just when practically for the first time there had been a Government elected on really political principles and in a very constitutional way, within a very short time that Government fell and we found the military clique in power. This is a point which has not been enough emphasised in this Debate. It fell because of the chaotic condition of China.

Despite the Nine-Power Treaty, despite the League of Nations, and even the Lytton Report, China does not exist as a sovereign State. That has been a factor of tremendous importance. We all wish to see China a sovereign State in the strictest sense of the word, and so would Japan, especially Japanese constitutional statesmen. When I arrived in Japan a few years ago, a friend who was in the Government there, and who is one of the present Government, told me most sincerely that the foreign policy of Japan, so far as China was concerned, was to see China peaceful and united, because only then could Japan carry on in the way that all constitutionally-minded Japanese wished Japan to carry on. It is because of the chaotic condition of China that the constitution in Japan has been driven to the wall. By constitutional methods they could do nothing and the militarists have taken advantage of their opportunity. The militarists are in possession and draw great strength from two factors. In the first place, the Japanese are the most patriotic people in the world, and I wonder what would happen if that patriotism was driven too far or Japan was put to shame by the withdrawal of our representative. That patriotism must be taken into consideration, and, secondly, this chaos in China and Manchuria which must be brought to an end.

What is the best we can do? The Lytton Report has made its suggestion. I think a little should be added to that. In the first place, I think we cannot be quite sure that the Lytton Report is correct in dismissing so easily the reality of Manchukuo. I daresay Manchukuo could not exist as an independent State without Japan, but there is evidence that there is a good deal of popular feeling behind it. Let us grant for a moment that the Japanese may be right in insisting that Manchukuo is not a puppet, but a very young reality. Let us also grant that, even according to the Lytton Report, the old regime must not be restored, that Chang Hsueh-liang cannot be allowed to go back again—he almost ruined Manchuria. China cannot take control, because China is not a sovereign State. The Lytton Report practically admits that that is so, and does not suggest that the Nanking Government should take control. Admitting all these factors, let us see if we can grant that Japan may be absolutely sincere in stating that she has no territorial interests. If we admit all these factors—first, that Manchukuo may be a possibility, that there may be something in this so-called puppet State; secondly, that the old regime cannot be restored; and, thirdly, that the Nanking Government cannot take control of Manchuria and restore order there—and also admitting, as I think one must, that the suggestion made in the Lytton Report with regard to an international gendarmerie is a preposterous suggestion, then we have to try to come to some terms with Japan in this way.

In some newspapers I have seen it stated that the Japanese have suggested that there should be a waiting time, that we should give them a chance to prove their worth and the fact that Manchukuo is a reality. They cannot move their armies, and I think the League might at least try to get Japan to accept a permanent commission to study the situation in Manchuria. As things are at the present moment, Manchukuo is really prospering. It is much more orderly than before. Japan has brought law and order where previously there was chaos in Manchuria. Let Japan's sincerity be tested as to whether she is really working behind the scenes all the time, and whether she really means anything when she says that she has no territorial interests. I think that that attempt to solve this very difficult problem ought to be made. If Japan will not accede to our efforts, then, of course, other steps must be taken, but I think we ought at least to provide one more opportunity in order to restore to the comity of the League of Nations one who was very proud at one time to be an ally of the League.

Mr. THORP: I think the Committee ought to consider the position of the League of Nations in regard to the attitude which it is proposed that our Government should take. We are now told that the House of Commons propose that there should be an embargo upon the export of arms. I apprehend that that embargo will apply both to China and to Japan. In my view, it is a very small step from placing an embargo on the export of arms to taking sides in this present unfortunate dispute. I hear the Foreign Secretary say, "Which side?" The answer is, "Either side." We also know that the Japanese, in point of organisation and in point of readiness for war, are infinitely better equipped than the Chinese. Therefore, it follows that the Japanese are more ready to carry on this campaign than the Chinese, and the inevitable result of our saying that there shall be an embargo upon the export of arms is to give an advantage to the Japanese which otherwise they would not possess.

There is another point with regard to this matter which I think ought to be considered. We have heard time after time that, so far as the League of Nations is concerned, whatever the future attitude of the world may be, the present attitude of the world is that the League of Nations should exercise a moral and not a physical force. There are some of us who realise that at the present moment the ultimate sanction must inevitably be a physical one, and that the League of Nations will not be able by physical means to enforce its will upon Powers which disagree with its decisions. If the House of Commons appears to say, in effect, that it will place an embargo upon the export of arms, knowing all the time that that embargo will assist the Japanese and certainly will not assist the Chinese, it simply means that this country is being called upon to enforce the opinions of the League, although not in terms which will carry them into effect.

I suggest that this country, in a dispute of that kind, should carry out the military evolution of taking a pace to the rear with the left foot and a pace to the right with the right, and I think that that would meet the opinion of the country. If it be the fact that the League of Nations has only to express an opinion, and thereupon this country will say, "We will take no part, we will not export arms," the result will be that the country which is inevitably the weaker country will feel that this country is supporting the stronger and better organised country. I think that the House will be well advised to take up the attitude that, so far as we are concerned, we support the League, and we very much deprecate the unfortunate dispute that is pending in the East, but that we decline to adopt a policy which may be taken, and undoubtedly will be taken, as supporting the Japanese as against the Chinese. I suggest that the House should hesitate for a long time before it takes sides, as it will be considered to take sides, in the present unfortunate dispute.

Mr. DAVID MASON: I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Nelson and Colne (Mr. Thorp) that the announcement of the Foreign Secretary in regard to the placing of an embargo on munitions going to both belligerents is a most important pronouncement, and I also agree, after the condemnation of Japan which we have heard from the Leader of the Opposition, from the Foreign Secretary himself, and from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Sir A. Chamberlain), we have no question to debate as to who is the culprit; but I agree that nothing could be more calculated to help Japan than that pronouncement. The facts have been referred to by many speakers. Japan is well prepared. China is defending her country, and she, the innocent party, is to be penalised by the House of Commons and by the pronouncement of the Foreign Secretary in his own speech. Contracts have probably been entered into and have to run on. Members on all sides with almost one voice, except the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery), have decided that Japan is at fault, and yet we are apparently agreeing to the right hon. Gentleman's pronouncement and placing an embargo on munitions to either belligerent. It was not very easy to understand the right hon. Gentleman. He said the British Government were entering into relations with foreign Powers, while taking this stand themselves, to endeavour to persuade them to agree to our policy. Does that mean that the British Government are endeavouring to persuade all the other great Powers to agree to place an embargo upon munitions going to both belligerents or only munitions going to Japan? Eighteen months ago I put some questions to the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the Covenant. He told me I did not comprehend the Articles, and he would explain to my deficient intelligence what they were. We went to an adjoining Lobby, and he tried to explain their meaning to me.

Sir J. SIMON: Quite unsuccessfully.

Mr. MASON: Let me continue the narrative and the Committee can judge for themselves how successful or unsuccessful he was. I suggested to him that his answers in the House indicated that he, representing the British Government, did not intend to do anything, and his reply was that I was a bloody-minded pacifist. That was his conception of ordinary Members of the House trying to bring what influence they possessed upon the Government and of what are the obligations contained in the Covenant. So superficial a way of treating a matter of life and death is beneath contempt. Article XVI says:

> "Should any member of the League resort to war in disregard of this Covenant under Articles XII, XIII and XV—"

Article XII says that members of the League agree that, if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or judicial settlement or inquiry by the Council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award of the arbitrator or the judicial decision or the report by the Council. By Article XIII, members of the League agree that, if any dispute arises between them which they recognise to be suitable for arbitration or judicial settlement, and which cannot be settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole matter to arbitration or to judicial settlement. As Japan disregarded the two previous articles, she ipso facto may be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the League. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Mander) asked whether we were right in prohibiting all trade and intercourse between ourselves and the belligerents. It says here that members of the League undertake immediately to subject belligerents at fault to the severance of all trade or financial relations and to the prohibition of all intercourse between nationals of the Covenant-breaking belligerent and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the League or not.

[Mr. Mason.]

There we have our action defined by the Covenant and for the Secretary of State or his Under-Secretary at Geneva to go out of his way to proclaim to the world that in no circumstances will we carry out sanctions is a humiliating attitude for the Government to take up. We are not called upon to go to war. These Articles may provide for certain sanctions as a last resort, but there are economic sanctions and financial sanctions, and to state beforehand to a belligerent who is engaged in aggressive action that in no circumstance will you carry out sanctions of this extreme character is to my mind quite uncalled for. Can you blame Japan for her aggressive action? The hon. Member laughs. Does he deny it? Has not our action in the last 18 months conveyed to Japan that we intended to do nothing? Was that a serious policy? Were we called upon to do that? The right hon. Gentleman sneers at my lack of comprehension of diplomacy. I might retaliate that he has a very elementary knowledge of diplomacy. We pay little or no attention to the Covenant although we are members of the League. To tell the other Powers, as the Under-Secretary did at Geneva on Friday, that we do not intend to impose these sanctions is not only humiliating but stupid. It is calculated rather to promote war. I am a peace-loving man. I cannot, perhaps, lay claim to the high eulogy which came from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, but all my life I have been a man of peace. Sometimes I feel that you are more likely to get peace if you take a firm line. If you drift and shilly-shally, and indicate that you do not intend to do anything, can you wonder that Japan has become an aggressor? We have pursued a policy more likely to encourage Japan. We are in the position at the eleventh hour of saying that perhaps the Government may screw up the present House of Commons to go in for economic sanctions.

I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. Hon. Members have said that he is a belligerant and professes to be a pacifist. I submit that his remarks about what was the use of belonging to the League of Nations and signing the Covenant if you did not intend to give at least lip service of loyalty to the Covenant was misinterpreted by the representative of the Government when he said that it meant that the right hon. Gentleman intended that we should withdraw. If I understood him, it meant nothing of the sort. He was justified in saying that those very serious Covenants to which we had put our signature were treated so lightly because we thought they might be inconvenient and might not suit us and therefore we were not prepared to carry them out. I rejoice that my hon. Friends behind me and many distinguished Members of the Conservative party, including the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Sir A. Chamberlain) have taken a higher rather than a lower view of our responsibilities. I hope that the Government will yet be encouraged not to rule out what we may yet be able to do to try and bring this dreadful thing to an end.

Sir STAFFORD CRIPPS: It has been a very good thing that this matter should be debated so fully in the House to-night, not only perhaps for the House, but for the country and for the world as well. The Debate has been a very interesting one, and, I think, has been striking because of the almost unanimous support for the League of Nations and the action which it has already taken, and also because of the demand which the House has put forward for united action in the future. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sparkbrook (Mr. Amery) is almost as isolated as Japan.—[An HON. MEMBER: "Oh, no!"] He is almost the only militant Imperialist left, and deep calls to deep when he and Japan consider matters together. In view of the time which the Debate has taken we do not propose to divide the Committee to-night upon this Vote. We shall watch with interest and anxiety the development of the actions of the Government and the actions of the League.

There has been a great deal of discussion going back into the history of the disturbance and disquiet in Manchuria, but in view of the unanimous decision of the Assembly of the League of Nations it does not seem to us to be profitable to try, with a much smaller knowledge, to examine again the whole of the circumstances which led up to the troubles in Manchuria. We must, I think, accept those findings as being the best findings the world can produce. There is no better machinery available, and it is idle for us to try to thresh through it all again. But it is important to notice that the findings of the Assembly of the League of Nations are based upon a series of breaches of faith by Japan. No one who has read the documents can be in any doubt whatever about that. [AN HON. MEMBER: "They are wrong!"] The hon. Member may think that they are wrong, but I am not going back behind those findings. It seems to me even a greater authority than the authority of the findings of Lord Lytton's report. It is because of those continued breaches of faith that the League of Nations has come to the conclusion that Japan must be considered as an aggressor State. That declaration, as the right hon. Gentleman the Foreign Secretary truly said, is a declaration of very great moral effect. It is a splendid thing that all the nations who are gathered at Geneva should at long last have come to a definite and decisive decision upon this point and have had the courage to declare that decision in no doubtful terms. We certainly wish that the decision had been come to sooner. We think that that might have been done without any undue strain if more determination had been shown to deal rapidly and decisively with the matter.

Do not let us go back now into the regrets of what might have been. Rather let us be pleased at least that at last it has come to a solution. But the trouble is that with that decision having been come to, Japan snaps its fingers at it. The position which now arises is, what are we to do as a sequel to Japan's action upon the League of Nations unanimous report? We believe that it is vital that whatever action is taken should now be taken with extreme rapidity. We realise, of course, the difficulties in getting international agreement upon any matter, but it is, in our view, absolutely essential, if any action is to be effective, that it should be taken at once. The Foreign Secretary rather accused my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition of suggesting that the sanctions were foreshadowed in the Lytton Report, or that he had suggested that they were recommended by the Lytton Report. Of course, that was not the function of the Lytton Report. The function of the Lytton Report was to give the League a basis upon which they might come to a decision, and it was not until that decision had been come to that any question of sanctions could possibly arise. Now that Japan has refused to accept the proposals which are put forward by the League the position has changed. As Lord Lytton put it himself in an interview two or three days ago:

> "This is the action I would consider desirable following upon the League's condemnation of Japan's action. League members should stop the export of arms and money to Japan."

We do not suggest, and never have suggested, that any one single country should butt into the war in the Far East and make that war worse. Several hon. and right hon. Gentlemen have suggested that we are pacifists and that we are more bellicose than the militarists. That arises, I think, from a misunderstanding of what my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said. What he was pressing upon the Committee was the necessity for the League to butt in and exercise the powers which it had undertaken, and which the members had undertaken to exercise under the Covenant of the League. The first step, obviously, and the easiest step is an arms embargo, but no one can suppose that by means of an arms embargo alone anything except a moral effect will be brought to bear upon the Sino-Japanese position, because everybody knows that there are large arsenals in the Far East. Money, on the other hand, as Lord Lytton suggests, is probably the more important factor and might have a decisive effect far more rapidly than an embargo upon arms. If only arrangements could be made internationally that all credits should be refused to Japan, that would be a far more decisive and more important factor than the mere embargo upon arms. Nevertheless, the announcement of the Foreign Secretary as to our refusal to license further export of arms from this country to China and Japan is at least a gesture, a very fine gesture, in its way, although it is a great pity that it was not made a year ago, when we were pressing for it to be made.

Sir A. CHAMBERLAIN: Before the decision of the League?

Sir S. CRIPPS: Yes, before, and that is the exact point that I want to bring before the Committee. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will agree with me in this, that if we are going to put an embargo on both parties, that is a thing suitable to be done before you have decided upon the aggressor. The moment you have decided on the aggressor, and here I agree with the Foreign Secretary, then it is not suitable to put an embargo upon both parties, and we are liable now by taking this action, after the decision of the League of Nations, to lay ourselves open to a misunderstanding on the part of China that by not exporting arms to China we are actively assisting Japan. That is why we think that if action of this type was to be taken, that is, an embargo upon arms to both parties, that was suitable action to be taken before any decision had been arrived at as to which was the guilty party. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it is difficult to justify, after the aggressor has been determined by the League, putting an embargo on both sides. We appreciate that there are difficulties when one nation is acting alone—difficulties which the Foreign Secretary mentioned—and therefore, although we think that it would be fairer, after the aggressor has been determined, to take action against Japan alone, yet, in view of the difficulties, we certainly do not oppose the step which the Government are taking as regards this matter.

It will not have any very great effect as regards stopping the war in the Far East but, on the other hand, I think that it may have some effect upon world sentiment, because a lead is a great thing, especially when it is a fine moral lead. Nobody can say that we are going to make anything out of putting an embargo upon the export of arms. We hope, and I suppose the whole Committee hopes, that this gesture by the Government will be rapidly followed by an agreement throughout the world to extend the embargo on arms against Japan. If the Debate has done nothing else of any use I hope that it will make it clear that the embargo against Japan is desired by this Committee, and I am sure that the Committee is speaking on behalf of the vast mass of the people of this country and the vast mass of the people of the world.

When it comes to an agreement between the different nations, then I hope the Foreign Secretary will tell us that that agreement will be based upon an embargo against Japan alone. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Because Japan has been determined the aggressor. We hope that there will be no question of that embargo being exercised against China as well. It would clearly be inconsistent with the Covenant of the League to do that, if it were international action taken under the terms of the Covenant itself. We hope that the Government will go forward and try to extend the area of embargo as rapidly as possible, and we hope that the mere fact that one particular country will not come in, although perhaps the bulk of the countries will, will not stop international action being taken. If one waits until every single country has consented it might be that one will wait for ever. We believe that the great bulk of the countries will take this action and that the rest will be shamed into doing the same.

A very serious question has been raised by several of the speeches made this evening and, indeed, by the statement of the Foreign Secretary that we will not become involved in this war in any event. Nobody wants to become involved in this war. That is perfectly certain. Nobody with any experience of the last War would ever want to become involved in any war. But does that statement mean—the Committee must face up to it—the abrogation of Article XVI of the Covenant? So long as that Article stands, the implications of our duty and of the duty of every signatory are enormous. Are we merely going to put ourselves into the position of performing what we would call the centuries old ceremony of kow-towing to the bullies of the world, or are we going to say that the theory of sanctions is a real theory and is, indeed, a theory and a practice that was invented for the purpose of assisting in keeping peace, and are we really going to apply it? Probably the Foreign Secretary will not want to answer that question to-night, but sooner or later this House will have to come to a determination as to whether they are to treat Article XVI as a mere scrap of paper.

We believe that it is a fallacy to say that if the sanctions were applied or had been applied earlier, we should eventually have had war. That clearly could not have been the thought of the people who framed the Covenant. It was framed for the purpose of avoiding war. We believe that even countries who may take up a bullying attitude can and must be brought to heel by the exercise of economic sanctions in the last resort, unless you are to say that a person who bluffs sufficiently high can always win the trick. That would indeed be a tragedy. If the Article is a reality then, as in everything else in life, we may have to take risks, and the risk may well be worth the possible price. It is a little unfortunate that any so definite a statement should be made as to our unwillingness to take any risk at all if we really are going to try to put our weight behind Article XVI of the Covenant.

Whatever sanctions the League of Nations decides to put on, we hope they will not neglect every opportunity of using their good offices to settle this dispute. We do not want them to concentrate entirely on the sanctions side, but that they will continue to use their good offices to arrive at some settlement. It must be obvious that sooner or later the question must be settled by agreement. The time will come when Japan and China will have to settle down together side by side, and everything that can be done at this moment to expedite the process of settlement is something which we should encourage. But there can be no settlement so long as Japan is in a position to make China obey her commands, so long as China is not able to settle as between two equal parties. The object of the sanctions is to improve the bargaining position of China so that she may get a fairer and better settlement with Japan; and also to stop some of the ghastly horrors of war. The right hon. and gallant Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Colonel Wedgwood) suggested that the League of Nations might offer its assistance to China in reorganising the government, and there may be a useful function to be fulfilled in giving China assistance, provided that the assistance is not merely a cloak for the mass exploitation of the Chinese by Western capitalists. There would have to be the most careful safeguards, and the safeguards would have to be rigidly enforced.

It is obvious, as the Lytton Report said, that we can never merely go back to the status quo in Manchuria; some means must be devised, and a part of such means is the stabilisation of the Chinese Government. The ultimate solution is one of extreme difficulty, but Lord Lytton, in the magnificent contribution to the world's international problems which he made in the report he wrote, has at least contributed a great deal towards a possible solution. Once China can be released from the fear and pressure of Japanese conquest, there does not seem to be any reason why a settlement should not be arrived at. If this nation and the other nations of the world in this crisis are prepared to stand behind the League of Nations, to honour their signatures, then the Japanese Government will not face the music. The pressure of world public opinion is a very potent force. Its effect is not always immediate, but it is almost impossible for one single isolated country to stand up against the rest of the world when the rest of the world has decided that it is going to act in order to stop aggression which it considers unfair and unjust.

Sir NAIRNE STEWART SANDEMAN: The hon. and learned Member for Bristol, East (Sir S. Cripps) has given me a good text. What are we to do? It is a difficult question to answer. So far as I can see we are going to do nothing but pass pious resolutions. We are not going to do this, and we are not going to do that. At the present moment China is ruled by bandits, and there is nothing that the ordinary Chinamen would like more than to have some sort of settlement by which they would know where they were getting. But we in this country, with our giving the lead to all the world, say that we are going to do nothing whatever to get a settlement in China, that we are not to give munitions to Japan. I frankly am pro-Japanese, entirely pro-Japanese, because I believe that the Japanese will settle the question in Manchuria and settle it very quickly, and the less time that is spent in settling the row in Manchuria the sooner we shall get on to doing trade in China. Frankly I wish we were in closer touch with Japan and were prepared to say that we were going into the Yangtse Valley. I know that that is not possible at the moment, but if we could do that I am certain that it would mean at once peace in China, and the poor

[Sir N. Stewart Sandeman.]

Chinese people would know that the next day's livelihood was safe and we could make goods and export them to China.

I listened to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, and I thought it was perfectly wonderful as usual. But he forgot all about the question in which we are all very much interested, and that is the question of Manchuria. I notice that he did not touch upon it at all. The whole House is aware or ought to be aware that Russia jumped in there and annexed all the outer parts, but there was no word then about Russian aggression or the League of Nations, or what we were going to do to prevent Japan fighting against her. Why not? What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. Personally I am very glad indeed that Japan has come in without fear and has said what she is going to do. The Japanese at least have a policy. It is to settle one part of the world and they are going to settle Manchuria. Of that I feel perfectly convinced. [AN HON. MEMBER: "And set up a National Government."] No, they will not set up a National Government. They will set up a beneficient autocracy, which is possibly the best form of rule that you can get, as long as the autocrats are in touch with the people and know what the people really want. [Interruption.] The people know what they want, and what they want is real Conservative Government. They have always wanted it and always will want it.

I listened to the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Nunn), and he gave us the history of the matter. He has been in China and knows it very well. He came home. Even the hon. Member for Bridgeton (Mr. Maxton) will one day come home and his home will be with the Conservative party.

Mr. McGOVERN: He left it last year.

Sir N. STEWART SANDEMAN: What you imbibe in your infancy is bound to come out when your teeth are coming out, and in a few years I believe that the hon. Member for Bridgeton will be a thorough Conservative. The hon. Member for Whitehaven told us the exact position. He knows the country. I must say that he did not draw the picture against Japan. The Lytton Report may have leaned to the side of China to a certain extent. I read the report carefully. I thought it was rather biased, but it did give us the feeling that Japan was not getting quite a fair deal.

Then the matter came up before the League of Nations. We are all getting rather tired of the League of Nations. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Well, a great many of us are. I am certain that my hon. Friends above the Gangway on this side are not tired of it but I can tell them that a great many of the people of the country are. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] The Leader of the Opposition is always very nice to me and lets me have my say, and eventually I generally prove to be right. I am certain that the court of the League of Nations was not the sort of judicial court to which the hon. Member for Whitehaven referred. They were bound to be swayed one way or the other by interests and by the feeling. "What is going to pay us best?" We know that that sort of thing goes on and a great many of us do not really trust the League of Nations for what I would call big decisions. The fact that they pronounced in favour of China has no effect upon me whatever.

If I had dared to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition during his speech I would have liked to ask him what explanation he had to offer of what happened in the case of Russia and Mongolia and why he did not make the awful outcry in that case that he has made because Japan has gone into Manchuria to protect her interests there. There are the railways, the treaties—everything that was promised to Japan. China went back upon that. It was not Japan's fault and Japan has had the pluck to assert her rights. As far as cotton goods are concerned, I hate Japan, but I do admire her pluck. She has not been afraid to come out and say, "I am going to do so and so and I do not care what you say to me." Right is might, and very often might is right, and the Japanese are going to carry out there what they have started, and the sooner the thing is finished the better. I do not see why we should not give Japan munitions to help her to finish it, because the sooner it is through the better for China and for everybody in that country.

Sir J. SIMON: I do not think the Committee will desire me to reply at length on what has been a varied and interesting Debate, but there are one or two observations which it would be proper to make at what may be the end of our discussion this evening. At the same time I should like to express to the Committee my own thanks and the thanks of the Government for the generally sympathetic way in which the decision they have reached—a difficult decision in a very difficult matter—has been received by the Committee. One observation naturally occurs to the mind of an older Member of the House in reviewing a Debate of this sort which deals with a distant part of the world where many of us have never been. We never have a Debate of this kind in the House of Commons in which it does not turn out that speeches will be contributed it may be from some unlikely quarters, based upon first-hand knowledge of the peoples and places concerned.

One of the very best features of the British House of Commons—striking today as it always is on such occasions—is that when the House of Commons sees that a speaker is talking of that which he knows, he is at once recognised as a man entitled to a double meed of attention. In the course of this Debate—I am not offering any preference as to opinions; I am merely noting the fact—we have had speeches from hon. Members like my hon. Friend the hon. Member for West Leicester (Mr. Pickering), like my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Mabane), like my hon. Friend the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Nunn), all the more valuable because one felt that they were speaking from actual contact with these very difficult and complicated Oriental conditions, and I must add the altogether delightful, because so picturesque and so characteristic, speech of my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Colonel Wedgwood). He began by telling us that every speech he had listened to, admirable as it might be, gave no clear indication of what the speaker himself would do if he had occupied a position of responsibility, and I am bound to say that that characteristic was very fully shared by his own.

Then there comes a speech of a slightly different character, for I am not aware that the speaker has any intimate personal knowledge of the region, the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. D. Mason), who revealed to the Committee more or less accurately—so far as I recall less rather than more—the contents or alleged contents of a private conversation between myself and himself, as he described it 18 months ago, in the Lobby, in the course of which, if his memory is better than mine, I said that opinions such as his were only entertained by bloody-minded pacifists. I can only point out that if this really occurred 18 months ago, at that time I was not Foreign Secretary, and I suspect that he really had that conversation with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Dominions.

Mr. D. MASON: If the right hon. Gentleman will allow me, I admit the advantage he has scored about the time, but as he referred in rather scathing terms to a private conversation, the Committee may think we met casually. He must remember, I am sure, that publicly before hon. Members, he asked me to come out with him into the Lobby. It is because of that fact that I referred to the conversation.

Sir J. SIMON: Now that the hon. Member has reminded me of the precise circumstances, and especially as it was not as much as 18 months ago, I remember it well. I believed it to be within my powers—and I am rather proud of my powers of exposition—to explain the contents of three Articles of the Covenant of the League to any reasonable man in the Lobby outside. I can only say that, after great patience, in the case of the hon. Gentleman I entirely failed. I recognise, if I may be allowed to say so, very sincerely and most respectfully the consideration and, I think, the public spirit which inspired the very moderate and careful statement that has just been made by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Bristol (Sir S. Cripps). It really would not be desirable that statements should be made at this time of day necessarily, without careful preparation and consideration, on the subject of sanctions. It really would not; it is much too grave a matter. While, of course, it is within the right of any Member of the Committee to raise, as he should with due discretion, this important subject, as far as I am concerned, and as far as the Government are concerned, that is a matter on which we really cannot undertake to make any assertion without the most mature consideration as to time and circumstances. It does not, of course, follow that people who speak most loudly and frequently about the reserve of sanctions are necessarily promoting most effectively the efficiency of the League.

> "He who, in quest of quiet, 'silence' hoots,
> Is apt to make the hubbub he imputes."

I do not desire that there shall be any hubbub on such a subject. The decision of the Government announced to-day is, as has been admitted on all hands, a very significant step, a very definite step, and a very grave step, one which we could not possibly have reached single-handed speaking for our own country without consultation with others if it involved differential treatment. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite that different considerations apply when you are considering what may be the possible interactions. You are bound to await the results of inquiries and consultations, and I think that it would be very imprudent, and I do not think in the end at all useful if one tried to anticipate or define too precisely the result.

I have shown the House and the country, and, I think I may claim, shown the world that this Government and this country really do desire to see what they can do effectively for the purpose of promoting the position of the League and the peace of the world. We do that in the most friendly spirit towards both Japan and China, and we do not think that we are doing it to the prejudice of either; that is to say, if we stop the export of arms to both countries, we are not favouring one more than another. There were many minute facts to consider before that could be asserted with confidence. That is not the purpose nor intention of what we are doing. Our purpose is quite simple and definite. We ranged before our minds what are the possible alternatives. You may say, "I will do nothing," or you may say, "I will wait until I ascertain that there will be universal agreement through all the nations of the world." We have decided that there is perhaps a better course to take than that. It is not possible—and I do not think that this proposition has been challenged in the whole of this Debate—for a single nation, situated as we are in the Far East, on our own motion by ourselves, and without reference to others, to take discriminatory action. We were faced with the simple alternative—simple to state, easy to realise, but not so very easy to exercise judgment upon.

I hope and believe that the view of the Committee to-night and the view of the country to-morrow will be that, faced with the alternative as between doing nothing and doing the one thing that we could do, we have chosen rightly, for we desire to see that that which can be done shall be done effectively in the hope that we may find international agreement as to what can be done in the future. I have again to tender to the Committee my thanks for their treatment—which is always kind—of me personally, and of the policy of the Government. It is consistent with the view that has been taken in this matter from the beginning, and I hope that the announcement that has been made from this Box to-night will clear away a great many misunderstandings. After all, in all these matters of foreign policy, really and truly, sensible and decent people of all parties want to do the same thing. When there is a difference between us it is not because one of us is trying to do what is evil and another is a pillar of light; it is because, possibly, additional information, further warning, complications not suspected by others are the things which may make the conduct of foreign policy seem slow. I would sooner be slow than expose my country to some risks which one has calmly to face. I believe our decision to-night is one which is going to be supported by the judgment of the country, because, though it may have taken some time to reach it, the decision itself is right.

Question, "That Item Class II, Vote I, (Foreign Office) be reduced by £100," put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported upon Thursday; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

The remaining Orders were read, and postponed.

Great Western Railway Bill.

Bills committed.

Durham Corporation Bill,

Read a Second time, and committed.

St. Helens Corporation Bill (by Order),

Second Reading deferred till Thursday, th March.

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

SCOTLAND.

Housing.

1. Mr. McGOVERN asked the Secretary of State for Scotland the number of houses built by the Glasgow Corporation in the Shettleston Parliamentary area during each year since 1st January, 1919; the number being constructed at present; and how many of these are of slum clearance, intermediate and ordinary types?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for SCOTLAND (Mr. Skelton): I am sending the hon. Member a statement which gives the information asked for.

2. Mr. McGOVERN asked the Secretary of State for Scotland the areas that have built houses and the number under the 1930 Slum Clearance Act and the amount of rent charged for two, three, and four apartments in each area?

Mr. SKELTON: I am sending the hon. Member a statement which gives the information asked for.

National Health Insurance Panel Committee.

4. Mr. McGOVERN asked the Secretary of State for Scotland the reason for allowing doctors who have no panel practice to serve on the National Health Insurance Committee of the borough of Glasgow; and are they required to pay subscriptions similar to the panel doctors?

Mr. SKELTON: The arrangements for the appointment of Panel Committees in Scotland are laid down in regulations, of which I am sending the hon. Member a copy. These regulations provide that only medical practitioners who are under agreement to treat insured persons shall be entitled to take part in the election of members of Panel Committees, that all the members shall be duly qualified medical practitioners, and that not less than two-thirds of the members shall be practitioners under agreement to treat insured persons. I have no reason to think that the provision whereby these committees may include a certain proportion of non-panel practitioners is other than a desirable one. The arrangement under which the administration expenses of the Panel Committee for the Burgh of Glasgow are defrayed by means of a system of voluntary subscriptions by practitioners is a private one made, I understand, by the practitioners themselves.

Mr. McGOVERN: Can the hon. Gentleman tell me whether it is a breach of the rules to allow medical men who have no panel practice to serve, or is it in conformity with the rules?

Mr. SKELTON: It is in conformity with the rules, with the qualification that the hon. Member will see in my answer.

Test Work, Montrose.

7. Mr. BUCHANAN asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is yet in the position to make any statement regarding the position of the County Council of Angus and test work at Montrose?

Mr. SKELTON: I am informed that at a recent meeting the Montrose Joint Committee, who administer public assistance in the area, decided to recommend that the arrangement in operation at Montrose for setting able-bodied applicants for relief to work should be discontinued. The Department of Health for Scotland have asked the county clerk to arrange that the recommendation will be submitted to the Public Assistance Committee and the county council for consideration at the earliest opportunity. I understand that pending a decision by the county council the test work scheme has been suspended.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that reply.

LAND SETTLEMENT, AYRSHIRE.

8. Lieut.-Colonel MOORE asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he can make any statement with regard to the experimental scheme of his Department for placing unemployed men on the land in Ayrshire?

The SECRETARY of STATE for SCOTLAND (Sir Godfrey Collins): The Department of Agriculture for Scotland had arranged with proprietors to make land for plots available at Galston, but the applicants for these plots declined to take them when the Department were ready to give entry. At Auchinleck, where, also, a number of men applied for plots, the Department have been unable to obtain suitable land. Inquiries are proceeding in other districts.

AGRICULTURE.

OATS AND OATMEAL (IMPORTS).

3. Mr. JAMES STUART asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has completed his investigation into the question of imported oats, oatmeal and oatmeal products; and, if so, whether he is in a position to make a statement as to the action he proposes to recommend in order to assist the home grower?

Sir G. COLLINS: The question of imported oats, oatmeal and other oat products is still under my consideration, and as it affects the United Kingdom as a whole, I am in consultation with the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries as to the steps, if any, that can be taken to assist the home grower.

Mr. STUART: Is my right hon. Friend aware that last week oats were being sold in the North of Scotland at a lower price than has ruled for over a century, and does he realise the urgency of the matter? Will my right hon. Friend consider the advisability of prohibiting the importation of foreign oats?

Sir G. COLLINS: I realise the serious position in the North of Scotland, and I cannot at present say anything except that I appreciate the gravity of the situation.

Mr. BOOTHBY: When will my right hon. Friend be in a position to make an announcement on the question?

Sir G. COLLINS: I would rather not commit myself as to time.

Mr. R. W. SMITH: Does the word "shortly" with regard to oats mean the same as it did with regard to credits schemes for farmers, which have taken months?

Sir G. COLLINS: As my hon. Friend knows, that matter is not under the jurisdiction of my office.

24. Mr. BARCLAY-HARVEY asked the President of the Board of Trade if, having in view the low price obtainable for oats grown in this country at the present time, he will take the opportunity of the discussions which are taking place with the Argentine Government to secure a reduction of the quantity of oats imported from that country?

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. Runciman): I cannot undertake to discuss details of the negotiations while they are in progress, but I can assure my hon. Friend that no relevant considerations are being overlooked.

Mr. BARCLAY-HARVEY: Is it the right hon. Gentleman's opinion that the question of oats is a relevant consideration.

26. Mr. R. W. SMITH asked the President of the Board of Trade if, in view of the serious position of the oat producers of this country, he will take steps to prohibit or limit the importation of foreign oats or oat products?

28. Mr. BOOTHBY asked the President of the Board of Trade whether in view of the fact that the average wholesale price of oats in Germany during 1932 was nearly double the wholesale price of oats consigned from Germany and marketed in this country, he will take immediate steps to prohibit or control the importation of oats into this country?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I have no power to prohibit or control the importation of oats into this country. As regards the question of my hon. Friend, the Member for Aberdeen, East (Mr. Boothby), he was informed in answer to a question on 22nd February, that the oats imported in 1932, shown as consigned from Germany, were not of German origin.

Mr. SMITH: As the right hon. Gentleman has no power to prohibit foreign oats, will he take steps to obtain such power from this House?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: My colleague the Minister for Agriculture is more concerned in this than the Board of Trade.

Mr. BOOTHBY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what difference it makes to the Scottish farmer whether oats sold at this price in this market were of German origin or not? They broke the market, and why should it make any difference whether they were of German origin or not?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I was asked whether oats were consigned from Germany or not, and I have given the answer.

27. Mr. BOOTHBY asked the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the fact that the German Government assists the export of oat products and sowing oats to this country, he will take immediate steps to prohibit or control their importation?

29. Mr. BARCLAY-HARVEY asked the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the fact that certain exported German oat products obtain the benefit of Government assistance, he will take steps to prohibit their import into this country?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: As has been explained in reply to previous questions on this subject, under the German export bond system the exporter of oat products is given a certificate which entitles him to import an equivalent quantity of oats duty free. The certificate has no value unless imports take place, and the German Government take the view that no subsidy on export is, therefore, involved. In any case I have no power to prohibit or control imports of the commodities in question.

Mr. BOOTHBY: I beg to give notice that, owing to the very unsatisfactory nature of the replies of the right hon. Gentleman, I will raise this matter on the adjournment at the earliest opportunity.

BANKRUPTCIES.

35. Mr. CONANT asked the President of the Board of Trade the number of bankruptcies during each of the last five years among farmers occupying 50 acres or more, and those occupying less than 50 acres?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I regret that the information desired is not available.

MEAT QUOTAS.

44. Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Agriculture if he will make available for Members the proposals that he has submitted to the Governments of all meat exporting countries for the regulation of all meat supplies required by this country?

The MINISTER of AGRICULTURE (Major Elliot): I assume that my hon. Friend has in mind the programme for the voluntary regulation of imports which is being undertaken in order to steady the meat market, and I would refer him to the reply which was given on the 9th February last to my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester (Mr. Lewis) to which I have at present nothing to add. I am sending my hon. Friend, for his information, a copy of the notice issued to the Press on 25th January, which was referred to in that reply.

COAL INDUSTRY.

PIT-HEAD BATHS.

9. Mr. PARKINSON asked the Secretary for Mines the number of mines in England and Wales that have pit-head baths; and what further action is being taken to increase the facilities for washing and cleaning at the pit heads?

The SECRETARY for MINES (Mr. Ernest Brown): 98 mines in England and Wales (besides 28 in Scotland) have pit-head baths in use, and bath installations are in course of erection under the Mining Industry Act, 1926, at 35 other mines in England and Wales and 10 in Scotland. These numbers exclude baths for mine officials only. According to present plans, from 30 to 35 additional mines will be provided with baths annually under the Mining Industry Act, 1926.

OVERTIME.

10. Mr. TINKER asked the Secretary for Mines if he will have an inquiry made into the overtime worked at coal mines, in view of the increase of this practice during recent years through the greater use of machinery, coal cutters and conveyors, and of the fact that employment for more men would be provided by the regulation of this practice?

Mr. E. BROWN: I am not quite clear what form of inquiry the hon. Member has in mind. All cases of overtime found by the Inspectors of Mines, or brought to their notice, are investigated, and if the overtime is found to be worked improperly the necessary steps are taken. If the hon. Member will give me particulars of any such cases I will see that they are inquired into.

Mr. TINKER: Is the Minister aware that last week he gave an answer to a question showing that in four mines in Nottinghamshire the average overtime worked was 3 per cent., and, if that is the average over the whole of the country, there are 24,000 more men who could be employed if the overtime was eliminated? It is on those lines that I want the hon. Gentleman to inquire.

Mr. E. BROWN: Averages are most misleading things to take. The overtime which is legitimate is emergency overtime. That is the only overtime that is permissible under the law, and if it were barred, so far from increasing employment, it might conceivably interfere with the regular employment of men on ordinary shifts.

Mr. TINKER: I have asked the Minister to make inquiries to see what ground there is for my assertions.

Mr. E. BROWN: If the hon. Member has any particular cases to bring to my notice, I shall be glad to have them looked into. He will understand that there was a great deal of talk about this matter three years ago in Yorkshire, and there was an inquiry, and the result did not support the assertions that were made before the inquiry.

Mr. MAXTON: In the event of my bringing a specific case from Scotland, will the Minister prevent the men who report that case from being victimised by their employers?

Mr. E. BROWN: The hon. Member knows that if cases are found where overtime is being worked illegally—the conditions are laid down in rules made under the Act of 1908—then the inspectors of my Department take instant action.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: An answer from the Minister's Department on Tuesday showed that at one colliery in Nottinghamshire 1,400 hours overtime were worked in one month. Will he make inquiries into that?

Mr. E. BROWN: Certainly.

Mr. C. BROWN: Is the Minister aware that under the regulations men are down a colliery from seven in the morning to eight and nine o'clock at night regularly, and does he not think that there is need for review in such cases?

Mr. E. BROWN: If that is so, I am surprised that the hon. Member has not called my attention to it.

15. Mr. BATEY asked the Secretary for Mines the number of hours overtime worked in or about the coal mines of the county of Durham for the month of January or the latest available month?

Mr. E. BROWN: I am afraid that records of the kind the hon. Member desires are not kept, as the time and expense involved would be out of all proportion to the usefulness of the information. If the hon. Member has any information as to alleged illegal working of overtime, and will give me particulars, I will have inquiries made?

Mr. BATEY: Is it not the case that last week a representative of the Minister stated the number of hours of overtime worked in particular cases?

Mr. E. BROWN: An answer of that kind can always be given in the case of a particular pit, but the hon. Member in this question is asking, not in respect of a particular pit, but in respect of the whole county area, and my answer is accurate. The records are not such as would enable me to give him an answer in the form which he desires.

Mr. BATEY: But would it not be possible for the Minister to inquire into this matter?

Mr. E. BROWN: I have already done the utmost I can. I have offered to look into any case or cases which hon. Members care to bring up.

HOURS CONVENTION.

11. Mr. MARTIN asked the Secretary for Mines whether, as a result of the recent meeting at Geneva, he can make a statement of Government policy with regard to the Convention for the Limitation of Miners' Hours?

Mr. E. BROWN: The policy of His Majesty's Government in regard to this Convention has not undergone any change since it was announced in this House on 23rd February last year by my predecessor in office, in answer to a question by the hon. Member for Chester-le-Street (Mr. Lawson). I am sending my hon. Friend a copy of this answer. At the recent further meeting at Geneva of the representatives of the seven Governments principally concerned, I restated our policy in the same terms. In the course of the discussion which took place, I explained that upon examination of the details of the Convention we had found that it is quite impracticable, under the conditions obtaining in this country, to give effect to the provisions dealing with the hours of continuous shift workers, and with week-end work, as they stand and that the former of these difficulties, at least, would presumably arise in other countries also. I made it clear that Great Britain, while being favourably disposed to the Convention, and supporting the principle of simultaneous ratification, could only ratify it in a form which would enable its provisions to be observed in this country both in the letter and in the spirit. The meeting took note of the two points of practical difficulty, upon which they were unable to state an opinion; and considered that a further possible unofficial meeting of Government representatives could not usefully be contemplated until the International Labour Office had collected information as regards the manner in which the two questions have in practice been settled in the countries concerned.

Mr. MARTIN: Can the hon. Gentleman say whether Great Britain is the only country which at the present time finds difficulty in ratifying the Convention? Has he seen in the German "Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung" a statement of the German attitude?

Mr. BROWN: No, we are not the only country. I have seen a report of the German declaration made at Geneva, as printed in the German newspaper, and it is in the following terms:

> "It would be a source of satisfaction to the German Government if, by the simultaneous ratification of the Convention concerning the limitation of hours of work in coal mines, the gaps between the prime costs of the most important coal dealers could be narrowed even partly, and for its own part the Government would be prepared to collaborate to this end. But it can set no hopes on such a course of action so long as its results are liable at any time to be called into question by disturbances in the domain of currency and of international movements of capital and goods. It, therefore, considers that the question of ratification cannot profitably be discussed until these disturbances have been removed."

Mr. MARTIN rose——

Mr. SPEAKER: This is developing into a Debate.

WAGES.

12. Mr. GORDON MACDONALD asked the Secretary for Mines whether, in view of the refusal of the Mining Association to consider along with the Miners' Federation of Great Britain any question of the wages position as it will arise at the end of the present arrangement between the Government and the Association in July of this year, he will state what action the Government intend to take in this matter?

Mr. E. BROWN: I am not prepared to assume, as the hon. Member apparently does, that wages difficulties will arise in the mining industry next July. Wages are regulated by district wage agreements, and I know of no case in which it is proposed to seek an alteration of the existing agreement in July. In these circumstances I do not understand in what direction and for what reason the hon. Member suggests that the Government should take action.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is it the intention of the Government to assist the Miners' Federation to bring about national negotiation with the Mining Association on wages?

Mr. BROWN: The hon. Member knows that that has been the policy of the Government from the beginning. He also knows that meetings have taken place on a national basis on other questions, and he will further realise that, apart from compulsory arbitration, it is not so easy to rebuild these things as it is to break them down.

Mr. MACDONALD: May we take it that the Government disapprove of the action of the coalowners in refusing to negotiate on wages nationally?

Mr. BROWN: The answer to that question is that it is the Government policy to assist in every way a national agreement on the wages question in the mining industry.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Is the hon. Gentleman not aware that a letter was received in his Department on 9th February from the Miners' Federation intimating that the coalowners had point-blank refused to negotiate with the Federation on wages?

Mr. BROWN: I have already answered that question. I have pointed out that, apart from compulsory arbitration, it is difficult to see what other useful steps we can take.

Mr. WILLIAMS: On a point of Order. A colleague of the Minister misled the House—I am certain quite innocently—on this day week, when he gave a reply indicating that no information was available with regard to the negotiations on wages having broken down. We are merely asking whether it is not the case that such information was at the Minister's disposal on that date.

HON. MEMBERS: Where is the point of Order?

Mr. SPEAKER: It does not seem to me that any point of Order arises.

LOW-TEMPERATURE CARBONISATION.

14. Mr. JOHN WALLACE asked the Secretary for Mines whether he is aware of the proposals recently propounded for the development of low-temperature carbonisation in Scotland on a large scale with a central refinery at Rosyth or Port Edgar for treating the oils obtained; and whether he is taking steps to assist the scheme being carried out in the near future, and to ascertain the accuracy of the statistical data which have been published in this connection?

Mr. E. BROWN: The proposals to which my hon. Friend refers are, I believe, those which were outlined in a Debate in another place on 7th December last. While the commercial development of low temperature carbonisation is undoubtedly making some progress in this country I do not regard the particular scheme referred to as one which it would be practicable to carry out in the near future. I have had the data which has been published examined but there is not sufficient material available to me at present to enable me to say that it would be possible in practice to secure the results claimed.

Mr. WALLACE: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Duke of Montrose is reported to have said that with a capital of £8,000,000, for a low-temperature carbonisation scheme of this nature there would be an annual return of £2,000,000; and further is he aware that a return on capital of this nature is what poor Members of Parliament have been seeking anxiously for a long time?

Mr. BROWN: I cannot take any responsibility for the calculations made or for the statements made.

Mr. WALLACE: Can the hon. Gentleman give us some idea as to when his inquiries into the statistical data will be complete?

Mr. BROWN: The statistical information given in connection with this particular statement of the scheme is not sufficient to enable me to give an answer to my hon. Friend as to the value of the scheme propounded.

QUOTAS AND OUTPUT.

13. Mr. DAVID GRENFELL (for Mr. GEORGE HALL) asked the Secretary for Mines the tonnage allocations and the actual output of coal for each district in this country, under the provisions of Part I of the Coal Mines Act, 1930; and the figures for each quarter for the years 1931 and 1932, respectively?

Mr. E. BROWN: As the answer includes a large number of figures, I am sending the hon. Member the information he requires. At the same time copies have been placed in the Library for the information of any other hon. Members who may be interested.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

IMPERIAL PREFERENCE (COTTON GOODS).

17. Mr. RANKIN asked the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs whether any special efforts and, if so, of what nature, are now being made to secure increased preference for cotton goods within the Empire?

The SECRETARY of STATE for DOMINION AFFAIRS (Mr. J. H. Thomas): I can assure the hon. Member that no chance of providing increased opportunities for the sale of cotton goods within the Empire will be neglected.

Mr. MAXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman doing anything to encourage the sale of steel sleepers in various parts of the Empire?

Mr. THOMAS: Yes, and the hon. Member will be pleased to know that the Great Western Railway and the London Midland and Scottish Railway have doubled——

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. George Hall.

CANADA (IMPORT DUTIES).

18. Mr. MABANE asked the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs whether special import duties to compensate for exchange depreciation are levied by Canada now on imports from France or were so levied at any time since 1918?

Mr. J. H. THOMAS: French currency is not depreciated in relation to the Canadian dollar and no question therefore arises of dumping duty to compensate for depreciation. I understand that no such duty has in fact been imposed at any time since 1918 on account of exchange fluctuation.

19. Mr. MABANE asked the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs if he will inquire from the Dominion Government whether the removal of the special duties to compensate for exchange depreciation levied by Canada on imports from this country is to be conditioned by the financial exigencies of Canada or by the fact that the exchange value of the pound sterling is no longer in fact depreciated?

Mr. THOMAS: The undertaking of His Majesty's Government in Canada as to the reduction and ultimate abolition of exchange dumping duty is set out in the second part of Article 17 of the agreement made with Canada at the Ottawa Conference; and there would not therefore appear to be any ground for the suggested inquiry.

Mr. MABANE: Do I understand that, although the pound sterling has achieved a new parity, and is stable at that parity, yet it will continue to be treated as depreciated currency and differently from other currencies that have altered their gold content but are similarly stable?

Mr. THOMAS: It is very interesting to know that the pound is now stable.

Mr. MABANE: May I ask for an answer to my question?

EXPORTS (CANADA).

21. Mr. HICKS asked the President of the Board of Trade if he will give the figures of increased exports to Canada since the grant of preferences arising out of the Ottawa Agreements?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: The modifications of duties provided for in the United Kingdom-Canada Trade Agreement came into force in Canada on the 13th October last. The declared value of the domestic exports of merchandise registered as consigned from the United Kingdom to Canada during the three months ended 31st December, 1932, amounted to £4,398,000, as compared with £4,124,000 during the previous quarter, and £4,285,000 during the corresponding quarter of 1931.

Mr. HICKS: Does the right hon. Gentleman regard the increase in these figures as anything appreciable or satisfactory?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: Yes, Sir, it is going in the right direction.

Mr. HICKS: Does the right hon. Gentleman think that inside of 10 years these figures will have appreciably increased?

IMPORT DUTIES (EMPIRE CONTENT).

23. Colonel GOODMAN asked the President of the Board of Trade what are the percentages of Empire content now in operation in this country, and the main classes of imports which are affected?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: Under the regulations at present in force, goods manufactured in and consigned from a part of the Empire, with the exception of sugar, tobacco, optical glass and optical elements, must contain a minimum of 25 per cent. of Empire material and labour in order to qualify for Imperial preference. In the case of optical glass and optical elements, the required proportion is 75 per cent., while sugar and tobacco are subject to special provisions. Regulations recently made, which come into force on the 1st April next, will require an Empire content of 50 per cent. in respect of the main classes of manufactured goods, with the exception of textiles, chemicals, leather and paper.

Colonel GOODMAN: Is this the right hon. Gentleman's idea of an approach to uniformity of standard?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: It is as near as you can get thereto.

FOREIGN TRADE (NEGOTIATIONS).

25. Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the President of the Board of Trade whether any progress has been made or any settlement arrived at in the negotiations for trade treaties between this country and the Governments of Denmark, Sweden, Holland and the Argentine?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: Negotiations with Argentina, Denmark and Sweden are proceeding; no negotiations with Holland have been undertaken.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Can the right hon. Gentleman state when they are likely to reach an agreement, and will he also tell us what results have been achieved up to date?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I cannot name a definite date, but they are proceeding satisfactorily.

Sir ARTHUR MICHAEL SAMUEL: Has the right hon. Gentleman succeeded in obtaining a relaxation of the restrictions on exchange by the Argentine Government so that British exporters may receive payment for the goods they have sent to the Argentine?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: That is under discussion at the present moment.

34. Mr. REMER asked the President of the Board of Trade with which foreign countries negotiations are proceeding which prevent recent recommendations of the Import Duties Advisory Committee from being confirmed?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: It has been deemed advisable to defer a decision on certain recommendations of the Import Duties Advisory Committee in the present stage of the commercial negotiations and discussions with Denmark and Germany.

Mr. REMER: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer that part of my question which asks what countries these are?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I am afraid I cannot go into that question at the moment.

Mr. REMER: Will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration that pottery is one of the articles referred to in this recommendation as very large users of coal in this country, and that it would be very valuable for our coal industry?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: We will not allow pottery to slip out of mind.

DENMARK.

31. Mr. HANNON asked the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that an understanding has been arrived at with the Danish Government at the Anglo-Danish Exhibition, 1932, that applications for export licences would be accepted on the basis of an exchange of 18.50 kronen to the pound sterling; but that following on this arrangement licences are being issued on the basis of 19.20 kronen to the pound sterling; and if he will invite the Danish Government to implement the undertaking which they have given?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I am not aware that the Danish Government have given any such undertaking as is described in the first part of the question. The remainder of the question, therefore, does not arise.

Mr. HANNON: Oh, but surely the right hon. Gentleman has been made aware of the negotiations that took place at Copenhagen at the time of the Anglo-Danish Exhibition, and will he take into conideration in the negotiations now proceeding the undertaking given by the Danish Government to the British manufacturers?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: But there was not an undertaking of the nature described in this question.

Mr. HANNON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that at the Anglo-Danish Exhibition specific promises were made to British manufacturers in relation to Danish trade, and are these promises in point of fact now being implemented by the Danes?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: As far as we know, they are.

33. Mr. HANNON asked the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that British firms were assured at the Anglo-Danish Exhibition, 1932, at Copenhagen that they would receive licences for at least 45 per cent. of the volume of export to Denmark in 1931; and if this agreement has been carried out by the Danish Government?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: The Danish law provides that in general no importer shall have his imports of any particular class of goods restricted to less than 45 per cent. of the value of the same kind of goods imported by him in 1931, and so far as I am aware this provision is being observed by the Danish licensing authorities.

MACHINE TOOLS (IMPORT DUTY).

32. Mr. HANNON asked the President of the Board of Trade if he can give an assurance that the tariff of 25 per cent. on the import of machine tools into this country will be continued for a period of time sufficient to give British firms, prepared to produce foreign tools under royalty in this country and therefore employing increased British labour, the opportunity of expanding their production under the tariff?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: The present rate of duty on machine tools is 20 per cent. ad valorem. My hon. Friend can rest assured that the efforts being made by certain manufacturers to increase the output of machine tools in this country would be taken into account in the event of any proposals arising for a reduction in the duty.

Mr. HANNON: Does my right hon. Friend mean by that answer that manufacturers of machine tools in this country will be justified in putting additional capital into this experiment?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I do not see why they should not do so, with the present rate of duty, which is 20 per cent. ad valorem.

MILK CHOCOLATE.

36. Sir PATRICK FORD asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the importation of skimmed milk into this country on advantageous terms as compared with full cream condensed milk or milk powders is discouraging the manufacture of milk chocolate of a high nutritive value in favour of milk chocolate of a low nutritive value; and will he consider a marking order to distinguish the two kinds of milk chocolate or some other method of encouraging the manufacture and sale in this country of the more nutritive variety?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: There is no power under the Merchandise Marks Act to make an Order of the kind suggested. Questions of quality in relation to foodstuffs are more within the province of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Health.

Sir P. FORD: Are we to understand that the appropriate action is for the manufacturers concerned to apply to the Import Duties Advisory Commission?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I have no doubt that, if they apply to that commission, the commission will give attention to their representations.

SPAIN (IMPORT RESTRICTIONS).

22. Mr. GODFREY NICHOLSON (for Captain SOTHERON-ESTCOURT) asked the President of the Board of Trade the nature of the further restrictions to be imposed against the imports of British coal into Spain; and whether, in view of the fact that the trade balance between Great Britain and Spain is in favour of the latter country, he can make any statement on the subject?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I cannot at present add anything to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Secretary for Mines on the 23rd February to the hon. Member for

[Mr. Runciman.]
Aberdare (Mr. G. Hall) and the hon. Member for Consett (Mr. Dickie).

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are negotiations in progress?

BRITISH ARMY.

JERSEY.

37. Sir A. M. SAMUEL asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office the number of regular troops in Jersey; the number of staff officers in the island; and their pay and emoluments?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Mr. Duff Cooper): There are three officers and three other ranks of the Regular Forces in Jersey, of whom two of the officers are the Lieutenant-Governor and his staff captain. For information as to the rates of pay of these latter officers, I would refer my hon. Friend to Appendix 8 of the current Army Estimates.

Sir A. M. SAMUEL: Is the staff officer in Jersey provided, in addition to his pay, with a house?

Mr. COOPER: I cannot answer that question offhand.

PENSIONS.

38. Mr. ROBINSON asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he will consider altering the rules governing the award of pension to ex-service men who served in campaigns prior to 1914-18, so as to permit birth certificates instead of the date of birth given on attestation to be taken as evidence of present age?

Mr. COOPER: No, Sir. It is not proposed to alter the rule whereby the age given by a recruit on his first attestation is accepted as his correct age throughout his army career for various purposes, including the assessment of his pension. My hon. Friend will appreciate that it would not always be in the soldier's interest to make this alteration.

Mr. BURNETT: Will the hon. Gentleman arrange that men, on attestation, shall be made aware that any understatement of age will prejudice their claim to pension?

Mr. COOPER: I think it would naturally occur to anybody, if they were contemplating making a false statement, that it might have some deleterious effect on their later career.

TERRITORIAL REVIEW.

39. Brigadier-General NATION asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether it is intended that representative detachments from all over the country shall take part in the Territorial review which it is proposed to hold this summer, or whether it is to be confined to those stationed in the vicinity of London?

Mr. COOPER: It has not yet been decided whether it will be possible to hold a review, but, if it is held, it will be confined to troops in the vicinity of London.

Brigadier-General NATION: Can the hon. Gentleman state whether a Territorial officer will be given supreme command of that parade?

Mr. COOPER: It is too early to give a decision with regard to that question.

Brigadier-General NATION: In view of the fact that the Territorial Army is no less than 45,000 under strength at present, does not the hon. Gentleman think that, if a Territorial officer could be given an important command of this nature, even for one day, it would be a great stimulus?

Mr. COOPER: Yes.

Mr. MAXTON: If it should be decided by the Government to hold such a review, would the cost of that review be met out of the existing Estimates, or would there be a Supplementary Estimate?

Mr. COOPER: It would be met out of the existing Estimates.

40. Brigadier-General NATION asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether any proportion of the £900,000 that is to be included in this year's Estimates for Territorial training will be devoted towards the cost of the proposed Territorial review; and, if so, how much?

Mr. COOPER: No, Sir.

REMOUNTS.

42. Lieut.-Colonel MOORE asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office the number and value of remounts purchased or the Army during 1932 from the Irish Free State, Northern Ireland, Scotland, nd England and Wales; and whether, in iew of the recent abolition of the light-orse breeding subsidy, he proposes to make any increase in purchases from the wo latter sources during the current ear?

Mr. COOPER: I will, with my hon. nd gallant Friend's permission, circulate n the OFFICIAL REPORT the figures for which he asks in the first part of the uestion. As regards the second part, I would refer him to the reply which I gave n 11th July last to my Noble Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Selkirk (Earl f Dalkeith).

Lieut.-Colonel MOORE: Would the on. Gentleman say in anticipation of the ircularisation of the information that the orses purchased in England and Scotland are equal to the stamp of those reviously purchased in Ireland?

Mr. COOPER: Yes, Sir, I think they re.

Following are the figures:

Place.	Number of remounts purchased in 1932.	Amount paid.
		£
rish Free State ...	265	14,563
orthern Ireland..	456	25,006
cotland	24	1,570
ngland and Wales	690	45.814
Total ...	1,435	£86,953

IGHTING SERVICES (REJECTED RECRUITS).

41. Mr. LUNN asked the Financial ecretary to the War Office how many en who offered themselves for the Army uring 1931 and 1932 were rejected on edical or other grounds?

Mr. COOPER: The figures for the recruiting year 1930-31 were 82,682 men erved with notice papers and 46,818 reected. The corresponding figures for 931-32 were 70,418 and 41,667. The hon. Member will find these and other figures elating to recruiting in the General nnual Report on the British Army which ill be in the possession of Members in few days.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Does the hon. Gentleman attribute this large volume of rejections to a raising of the standard of military requirements or to a continuous deterioration in the physique of the men of this country?

Mr. COOPER: I do not think any such conclusion can be drawn from these figures. The standard goes up and down in different districts, in proportion to the number of recruits that are being obtained.

Viscountess ASTOR: Will the hon. Gentleman bear in mind that these rejections for ill-health would be very much fewer if the Government would go in for the policy of open-air nursery schools?

59. Mr. LUNN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty how many men who offered themselves for the Navy during 1931 and 1932 were rejected on medical and other grounds?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Lord Stanley): As the Admiralty requires only about one-fourteenth of the total number who offer themselves for the Royal Navy and Royal Marines, only the very best men are taken. In the financial year 1930-31, 43,453 men offered themselves. Of these, 38,028 were rejected by recruiters for miscellaneous causes, including obvious physical defects, and 2,451 on examination by medical officers. The comparable figures for 1931-32 are 47,054, 41,063 and 2,781.

60. Mr. LUNN asked the Under-Secretary of State for Air how many men who offered themselves for the Air Force during 1931 and 1932 were rejected on medical or other grounds?

Sir VICTOR WARRENDER (Lord of the Treasury): I have been asked to reply. The figures for men recruits for the calendar year 1931 were as follow: application forms completed 11,321: applications taken up 5,914, of which 3,768 were rejected. The corresponding figures for 1932 were 8,265, 2,042, and 1,255. It should be added that the requirements in 1932 were much below those of 1931.

Mr. LUNN: Does not the answer to this question show that we are heading towards a C.3 population?

Sir V. WARRENDER: No, Sir.

POLITICAL HONOURS SCRUTINY COMMITTEE.

45. Colonel GRETTON asked the Prime Minister who are the members of the Political Honours Scrutiny Committee appointed in accordance with the report of the Royal Commission on Honours; whether the committee is regularly consulted on all such honours; and when it last met?

The LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL (Mr. Baldwin): The Political Honours Scrutiny Committee appointed by the present Government in accordance with the report of the Royal Commission on Honours is constituted as follows:

The right hon. Viscount Buckmaster, G.C.V.O. (Chairman).
The right hon. Lord Macmillan.
The right hon. G. N. Barnes, C.H.

The committee is regularly consulted on all proposed honours on account of political services. It last met on the 7th December, 1932, in connection with the New Year list.

Viscountess ASTOR: Was the committee consulted about Miss Amy Johnson?

NATIONAL FINANCE.

NEWFOUNDLAND (ADVANCE).

51. Mr. LAMBERT asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the amount and the terms of the loan guaranteed by the British to the Newfoundland Government?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Chamberlain): His Majesty's Government has not guaranteed any loan to the Government of Newfoundland, but the United Kingdom share of the advance recently made to that Government by His Majesty's Governments in the United Kingdom and Canada is £166,570, being the sterling equivalent of 625,000 Canadian dollars. A Supplementary Estimate for this amount will shortly be presented to Parliament. The terms of the loan to replace this advance will be settled in the light of the report of the Royal Commission which is about to visit Newfoundland.

SPIRIT DUTIES.

47. Sir WILLIAM DAVISON asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the amount of the duty per proof gallon on spirits in the year 1920, and the revenue derived therefrom; and the duty per proof gallon in 1932, and the amount of the revenue raised in that year?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: As the answer involves a table of figures, I will, with my hon. Friend's permission, circulate it in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Sir W. DAVISON: Can my right hon. Friend say generally whether there has not been an enormous loss of revenue by reason of this continued high taxation; and does he recognise that this penal taxation is killing the goose that has laid so many golden eggs for the Treasury in the past?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: There has been a loss of revenue, but I should be sorry to enter into any exposition about it now.

Viscountess ASTOR: Does not the right hon. Gentleman think that those men who have given up beer and are drinking milk are doing good to the farmers?

Following is the answer:

Spirit Duties.

Rate per proof gallon.	Net amount of revenue received.
1920.	£
Prior to 20th April, 1920 ... ... 50s.	71,057,000*
On and after 20th April, 1920 ... 72s. 6d.
1932 ... 72s. 6d.	33,776,000 (approximate figures).

* The figures for 1920 represent the net receipts in Great Britain and the whole of Ireland, those for 1932 relate to Great Britain and Northern Ireland only.

BEER DUTY.

46. Sir W. DAVISON asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the total amount raised by Beer Duty to the nearest available date in the current financial year; and how this compares with the Estimates given to the House last year?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The approximate amount of revenue derived from the Beer Duty during the period from 1st April, 1932, to 31st January, 1933, was £64,554,000; the Budget Estimate for the financial year ending 31st March, 1933, was £80,000,000.

Sir W. DAVISON: Does my right hon. Friend not recognise that the friendly warnings which he received a year ago as to the likelihood of this taxation being seriously diminished if it were retained at its present penal amount were justified?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: My hon. Friend is comparing 10 months with 12, and it is perhaps too soon to draw a final conclusion.

BANKS (NATIONALISATION).

50. Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government will consider drawing up schemes for nationalising big banking concerns similar to that approved by a resolution passed by the landtag of Bavaria?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Will not the right hon. Gentleman consider this in relation to our present situation?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The circumstances of the resolution appear to be rather curious; I understand that it was carried by a combination between Nazis and Socialists and was opposed by the Communist party.

Mr. WILLIAMS: As it seems to have met with the general approval of all parties, does not the right hon. Gentleman think that he ought to consider it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: The report which I have seen about the resolution is that it is not to be considered as anything more than a demonstration.

BRITISH MUSEUM (ENTOMOLOGICAL DEPARTMENT).

52. Mr. G. NICHOLSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether he will consider the advisability of authorising the appointment of the five assistant keepers in the entomological department of the British Museum (Natural History) included in the Civil Estimates for the current year, in consideration of the valuable work performed by the department and the deterioration which shortage of staff is causing to the collections?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Hore-Belisha): The Estimates for the current year show the number of assistant keepers which it is intended at a future date to appoint in the British Museum (Natural History) but do not include money provision for the posts in question. The staff of the Museum has recently been strengthened by a net addition of two to the superior staff. A further increase is not considered warranted in present circumstances. I do not accept the view that the collections are deteriorating.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the hon. Gentleman consider the appointment of those assistant keepers who have been provided for in the Estimates in view of the opinion widely held among entomologists that the collection is suffering, and that the work of the Museum, which is of Colonial and Imperial value, is also suffering in consequence?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I have informed my hon. Friend that I do not consider that the collections are deteriorating, but, if they were, the deterioration would be more academic than vital.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the hon. Gentleman visit the Museum once more?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: Yes, Sir.

RATES (LICENSED PREMISES).

53. Sir NAIRNE STEWART SANDEMAN asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether he can give figures showing the decreased rateable value of licensed houses for the past year?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I regret that figures of the nature desired are not available.

Sir N. STEWART SANDEMAN: Will the hon. Gentleman tell me what the effect of Schedule A is?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: No, Sir.

Captain DOWER: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that four-fifths of the licensed houses in northern industrial parts are applying to have their rateable values decreased, and that they include many in the neighbourhood of Rotherham?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I do not know whether or not that is the fact, but the test would be whether they succeed in obtaining reductions.

AFFORESTATION.

55. Sir A. M. SAMUEL asked the hon. and gallant Member for Rye (Sir G. Courthope), as representing the Forestry Commissioners, whether any record is kept showing the percentage of trees planted by the Commission that have lived; and what has been thus far the over-all average cost per living tree defrayed out of public funds?

Colonel Sir GEORGE COURTHOPE (Forestry Commissioner): Records are kept and show that 77.5 of the trees planted by the Forestry Commission have lived. It is estimated that the over-all average cost per living tree has been $2\frac{1}{5}$d.

Mr. MAXTON: Will the hon. Gentleman tell us in what part of the country the death-rate is highest?

Sir G. COURTHOPE: I should want notice of that question.

ROYAL NAVY (SISAL CORDAGE).

58. Mr. WISE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty what progress has been made in the trials in His Majesty's fleet of cordage made from East African sisal in substitution for cordage made from foreign fibres; and whether a statement can now be made as to the adoption of sisal for the purpose?

Lord STANLEY: The trials in question have been concluded and the results are sufficiently promising to warrant the partial adoption of sisal for making ropes for His Majesty's Naval Service. The Admiralty have decided, therefore, that so long as supplies of East African sisal can be obtained at satisfactory prices, a substantial proportion of the service requirements for towing hawsers, heaving and hauling lines shall be made from this fibre in lieu of manila, also that sisal shall be used exclusively for a number of small ropes which have hitherto been made from manila. If sisal cordage continues to give satisfactory service, the question of its more general adoption will be considered.

Mr. WISE: May I ask the Noble Lord if the report which has been supplied to the Vegetable Fibres Committee of the Imperial Institute can also be supplied to representatives of the sisal industry in this country?

Lord STANLEY: The Admiralty report has been sent to the Advisory Committee on Vegetable Fibres of the Imperial Institute, which body has been working hand in hand with the Admiralty in investigating the possibilities of sisal. Copies of the report were circulated to members of the committee with the request that it should be regarded as strictly confidential until the question of publication has been considered at a meeting to be held to-morrow.

HOUSING (SLUM CLEARANCE).

61. Sir PERCY HURD asked the Minister of Health whether he is satisfied that rural housing authorities realise the applicability to certain rural areas of the subsidy under the Slum Clearance Act, 1930; and, if not, whether he will make a statement for their guidance?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of HEALTH (Mr. Shakespeare): The point is one that can be made when the general circular is issued after the present Bill is passed. My right hon. Friend will consider what further action in the direction suggested by my hon. Friend may be desirable.

Sir P. HURD: Can the hon. Gentleman say what the Government subsidy under the Slum Clearance Act of 1930 means in terms of rent?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: The subsidy is £2 10s. per person displaced, and, if five persons were displaced from a house, a subsidy of that kind plus the rate subsidy of £3 15s. would amount to a subsidised rent of about 5s. a week for 40 years, so it is very favourable.

POOR LAW.

CASUAL WARDS, CUMBERLAND.

62. Mr. CAPE asked the Minister of Health the number of persons that have passed through the casual wards in the County of Cumberland during the years 1930, 1931, and 1932; and what representations have been made by his Department that more casual wards should be opened in that county?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: A count of casuals is only made on Fridays. The highest number so counted in the three years mentioned was 92 in June, 1931. In 1929 the Ministry of Health suggested that two wards should be reopened and this was done.

EXPENDITURE.

63. Major OWEN asked the Minister of Health what proposals the Government has in contemplation for relieving the increasing burden imposed upon local authorities due to the additional demands for public assistance?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: My right hon. Friend is not in a position to add anything to the statement made by him in the course of the Debate on the Financial Resolution introduced for the purposes of the Local Government (General Exchequer Contribution) Bill.

Major OWEN: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in the case of Carnarvonshire the estimates for the coming current year have disclosed an increase of 8d. in the rate, and does he not think that something should be done by the Government to meet the enormous increases which are taking place throughout the country?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: These increases are being considered by the Government in connection with the whole survey of the question.

LOCAL LOANS, NORTH WALES.

64. Major OWEN asked the Minister of Health what was the total amount of loans outstanding due from local authorities in each of the six North Wales counties for the years ended 31st March, 1922, and 31st March, 1932, respectively, in respect of housing and of other loan expenditure?

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: I will send the hon. and gallant Member a statement giving the desired information so far as it is available.

CANADA (DEPORTATIONS).

16. Mr. MANDER (for Mr. GRAHAM WHITE) asked the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs the number of British citizens who were deported from Canada through becoming a charge on public funds during 1931 and 1932?

Lieut.-Colonel J. COLVILLE (Secretary, Overseas Trade Department): In the years ending March, 1931, and March, 1932, the last two years for which figures are available, the numbers of British deportees from Canada were 3,099 and 4,248 respectively. It is not possible to state how many of these British deportees were deported through becoming a charge on public funds, but of the total number of deportees of all nationalities in the same periods, 51 per cent. and 64 per cent. respectively, were deported for that reason.

Mr. MAXTON: Can the Minister say how many of them were taken out originally under the Empire Settlement Act?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: I am not able to answer that question without notice.

Viscountess ASTOR: Can the hon. and gallant Gentleman say how many have been deported as being dependent on public charity?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: I cannot answer that question without notice.

RACEHORSE "ROYAL RANSOM" (CUSTOMS DUTY).

54. Mr. BERNAYS (for Sir PERCY HARRIS) asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury on what date and at what port the racehorse Royal Ransom was received in England from the Irish Free State; and what was the amount of customs duty paid?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: The disclosure of particulars regarding the transactions of individual importers, which are obtained by the Customs for official purposes only, is open to obvious objections and would be contrary to well established practice. I see no reason to depart from the usual rule in this instance.

Mr. BERNAYS: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that this particular horse, within six months prior to its entry into this country, had changed hands for £5,000; and is he further aware of the serious allegations being made that pressure was brought upon the Customs officials to put a low and fictitious value upon the horse?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I am aware of a great many facts, but, as I have said, it is not our policy to disclose individual transactions. I can, however, assure my hon. Friend, if he is in any doubt about the matter, that the Customs have in the past and will in the future vigilantly protect the interests of the taxpayer.

Mr. BERNAYS: As these are serious allegations, will the hon. Gentleman make inquiries?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I have already made inquiries, and that is why I have been able to answer the question.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the sum paid in duty was only one-fifth of the value of the horse, which was sold afterwards within six months? It sold for £5,000 and duty was paid on less than one-fifth of £5,000. Is he aware that this was a direct method of evading the tax, and will he, in the public interest, see that some public statement is made on this subject?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I think I have told the House that I am aware of a good many facts, but I cannot necessarily relate them to this particular question. I do, however, assure the House that every care is taken to avoid any evasion of tax, and proper action is pursued in every case.

Mr. BUCHANAN: But does the Department take any steps where a horse is deliberately valued at a fictitiously low price, and afterwards passes at a much higher value, to recover duty on what is the obvious value of the horse?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: Certainly, wherever any wrong is done to the community appropriate action is always taken.

Mr. MAXTON: Is the hon. Gentleman satisfied in this case——

HON. MEMBERS: Rothschild!

Mr. de ROTHSCHILD: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction among racing people on this very point, and will he satisfy public opinion by stating definitely that the right value was put on this horse, that the right amount was paid, and that there was no bribery, as is alleged, of Customs officials?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I hope that if it be necessary to take any action public opinion will be fully satisfied.

SUNDAY ENTERTAINMENTS (CINEMAS).

56. Mr. LOGAN (for Mr. THORNE) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department the number of local authorities which have taken a referendum for the opening of cinemas on Sundays; the number in favour and the number against; the number of authorities which have voted in favour but which the Government have vetoed; and the reason for such veto?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir John Gilmour): I have no information of the number of polls under the Sunday Entertainments Act at which the majority voted against the Sunday opening of Cinemas; for the local authorities are not required to notify me when proposals in favour of such Sunday opening have been defeated. Polls at which the majority voted in favour of the Sunday opening of cinemas have been held in 14 areas; and in three further areas a decision in favour of Sunday opening was reached without a poll being required. The Government have no authority to veto an application for the extension of section 1 of the Sunday Entertainments Act to a new area; but one such application, in respect of the Urban District of Sidcup, was rejected by this House on the 14th February.

DONCASTER DRAINAGE AREA.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS (by Private Notice) asked the Minister of Agriculture if he has any information as to the condition in the Bentley and Lower Don area regarding floods and, if so, what steps have been taken to warn local residents of the impending danger?

Major ELLIOT: I have been in telephonic communication with the Clerk of the Doncaster Drainage Board, and am informed that, although the River Don rose yesterday, there is still a considerable margin, and there is no danger at present of any floods in the Bentley and Arksey area. I was assured that should any danger arise the Drainage Board would at once notify the local authorities interested and warn them of any impending danger.

Mr. WILLIAMS: In case the Don should rise to the danger point, may I sk whether the wireless can be used as a eans of warning the residents of the nger?

Major ELLIOT: I will keep any sugstion of that kind in mind.

LICENSED PREMISES (BEER GLASSES).

57. Mr. THORNE asked the Home ecretary if he is aware that it is mpossible to obtain draught-beer in a easured half-pint glass in certain censed premises at Streatham; and hether, as this is contrary to the Regutions, he will take any action in the atter?

Sir J. GILMOUR: My attention has ot been drawn to the particular circumances mentioned, but they do not ppear to afford any ground for action n my part. The law requires a licensee, he serves half-a-pint, or more, to serve in a measure marked according to the mperial standards, but no offence, I am dvised, is committed if he declines to erve half-a-pint.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LANSBURY: May I ask the Lord resident of the Council, in the event of the Motion on the Paper being carried, how far he intends to go to-night?

Mr. BALDWIN: We hope to get the first two Orders, but it is not our intention to ask the House to sit late.

Mr. LANSBURY: I would like to point out that the second Order is a very important and contentious one, and I think that we should not start it at a late hour.

Mr. BALDWIN: No. I expressed my hope. If the second Order should prove too contentious, we shall certainly not ask the House to sit late to discuss it.

Mr. MAXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman expect to get the first Order before Eleven o'clock?

Mr. BALDWIN: Oh, yes, I quite expect to.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Proceedings on Government Business be exempted, at this day's Sitting, from the provisions of the Standing Order (Sittings of the House)."—[Captain Margesson.]

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

SCOTLAND.

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE, GLASGOW.

Mr. McGOVERN asked the Secretary State for Scotland the reason for the crease of the National Health Insurance anel Committee of the borough of lasgow from 30 to 51, in view of the rovisions of the National Health In-urance Panel Committee Regulation?

Sir G. COLLINS: I am sending the n. Member a copy of amending Regula-ons made by the Department of Health r Scotland on 21st April last which, as will observe, provide that the panel mmittee for the burgh of Glasgow ould consist of 56 persons instead of the rmer number of 30. The increase was thorised to provide, among other ings, for the fuller representation of medical practitioners in the city, whose numbers have very considerably increased since the original regulations were made.

HOUSING, GLASGOW.

Mr. McGOVERN asked the Secretary of State for Scotland the cost of building three-, four-, and five-apartment houses at Sandyhills, Glasgow, during 1923-24 and the estimated cost of three- and four-apartment houses that are in course of construction at Amulree Street and Strathord Street, Sandyhills; and what is the local and national subsidy on each house built in 1923-24 and those under construction at present, the rate of interest on borrowed capital, and the length of period for repayment in each case, and the owners' present rate per £ of rent?

Sir G. COLLINS: I am informed that the all-in cost of the three-, four- and five-apartment houses built by the corporation of Glasgow at Sandyhills during 1923-24 was £501, £650, and £750 per house, respectively, and that the estimated all-in cost of the three- and four-apartment houses in course of construction at Amulree and Strathord Streets is £396 and £477, respectively. The annual local and State subsidies, payable over a period of 60 years, for the earlier scheme are estimated at £7 8s. and £33 per house, respectively, for the current year. The State subsidy, payable over a period of 40 years, for the later scheme is £9 per house annually, but the local subsidy is not yet ascertainable as the rents have not been fixed nor has the final cost been determined. The rate of interest on borrowed capital in the earlier scheme is £4 18s. 2d. per cent., and in the later scheme £4 15s. per cent. In the earlier scheme the periods for repayment of loans are 60 years for land and houses, 40 years for sewers, and 20 years for streets. In the later scheme the periods of repayment are 40 years for sewers plus the capitalised value of the national and local subsidies, 20 years for streets, and 60 years for the balance of the expenditure. Local rates on owners are at present 5s. 6d. per pound of rental.

BRITISH INDUSTRIES FAIR.

Mr. HEPWORTH asked the Secretary to the Overseas Trade Department if he can make any statement as to the volume of business transacted at this year's British Industries Fair?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: I am glad to be able to state that, so far as my information goes, the first week of the British Industries Fair in London and Birmingham has been successful. The attendance of overseas buyers has been satisfactory, visitors from no less than 65 countries having registered during the first four days of the fair. The change in the conditions of admission in London has caused the number of home buyers to drop somewhat as compared with last year, but it is believed that, so far from harm being done, a useful purpose is being served by helping to ensure that only bona fide trade buyers gain admission during trade hours. Orders and inquiries are understood to have been on a satisfactory scale at all sections.

GAS AND ELECTRICITY UNDERTAKINGS.

Mr. DAGGAR asked the President of the Board of Trade if he will issue a statement showing the profits of the companies' and local authorities' gas undertakings in Great Britain for the years 1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932; the price paid per ton for coal; and similar particulars with regard to the generation of electricity and the production of coke?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: The profits of statutory gas undertakings (companies and local authorities) as shown in the Board of Trade Return relating to all Authorised Gas Undertakings in Great Britain for 1929, 1930, and 1931 (Part II Finance and Prices) and similar particulars as regards authorised electricity undertakings (supplied by the Ministry of Transport) for 1929 and 1930, are given below. The corresponding information for later periods is not yet available. No similar information as to the coke oven industry is available. As regards the price paid per ton for coal by the undertakings referred to, figures are given below for 1929 and 1930, in respect of electricity undertakings. For the other industries no particulars are available.

OYAL ARTILLERY (PROMOTION).

Brigadier-General NATION asked the inancial Secretary to the War Office hether, in view of the slow rate of pro- otion prevailing in the Royal Artillery, s Department contemplates taking any eps to equalise, as nearly as possible, e rate of promotion in the different ms of the service?

Mr. COOPER: No new steps are der consideration, but when suitable portunities arise, selected captains and balterns of the Royal Artillery are considered for vacancies in cavalry regi- ents. I would also remind my hon. d gallant Friend that subalterns in the oyal Artillery are promoted on the com- etion of 13 years' service.

WAGES.

Mr. HAMMERSLEY asked the Minister of Labour if he can give an index figure to indicate the general wages level for the year 1932 on the assumption that the general level of wages in 1924 was 100?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The information in the possession of the Ministry of Labour, which relates mainly to industries or occupations in which rates of wages are regulated either by collective agreements between organised groups of employers and workpeople, or by arbitration awards, or by statutory orders, indicates that the average level of full time weekly rates of wages in 1932 was approximately 4 per cent. below the average level of 1924. The available statistics do not enable me to compare the average levels of actual earnings in these two years.

Mr. HAMMERSLEY asked the Minister of Labour if he can furnish any statistics to show the actual amounts of the annual income received in the form of wages and salaries in the years 1924 and 1932?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I regret that the available information is insufficient to enable me to estimate the actual amounts of wages and salaries paid in these two years.

NIGHT WORK (WOMEN).

Mr. MANDER asked the Minister of Labour whether he proposes, in accordance with the report of the International Labour Office dealing with the night work for women Convention recommending the adjournment of the examination of the question till the next session with a view to considering any information or suggestion which might be submitted in the interval, to submit any such information or suggestions; and what reply has been made to the request to receive a deputation in connection with this subject?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The point before the International Labour Organisation is what action, if any, it should take in consequence of the opinion of the Permanent Court of International Justice that the Convention applies to women who hold responsible positions of management in the industrial undertakings covered by the Convention. When the proposal of His Majesty's Government to revise the Convention was rejected by the International Labour Conference in 1931 a doubt existed as to the interpretation of the Convention on this point, and it is now considered to be necessary to revise the Convention in respect of such women. This course, therefore, will be suggested to the Governing Body. The question of receiving a deputation primarily affects my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, who is dealing with the matter.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

AGRICULTURAL WORKERS.

Sir A. KNOX asked the Minister of Agriculture the number of agricultural labourers unemployed in Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridgeshire, Lincolnshire, and Yorkshire, respectively?

Major ELLIOT: I regret that no statistics are available of the numbers of agricultural workers who are unemployed, but according to such information as the Ministry possesses the situation in each of the counties mentioned by my hon. and gallant Friend is broadly as follows:

Norfolk.—As compared with last year unemployment has increased slightly. Although the total number of workers affected is reported to be considerable they are understood to be mostly of the casual type.

Suffolk.—Unemployment is reported to be somewhat widespread and much more considerable than a year ago.

Essex.—Unemployment is reported as considerable and appears to be rather worse than last winter.

Cambridge and Isle of Ely.—Unemployment appears to be slight except perhaps among casual workers in Isle of Ely.

Lincolnshire (Holland). — Position thought to be better than in neighbouring counties, and there is perhaps less unemployment than a year ago.

Lincolnshire (Kesteven and Lindsey).—Unemployment is reported as considerable and worse than a year ago.

Yorkshire (East, West and North Ridings). — Unemployment considerable and worse than last winter.

ORCHESTRAL MUSICIANS.

Mr. SUMMERSBY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the increase of unemployment among orchestral musicians due to the use of echanical music in theatres and cinemas, e will consider imposing further taxation pon mechanical music instruments?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I have con- idered my hon. Friend's suggestion, but do not think that it would be prac- icable to impose such taxation upon echanical apparatus for the reproduc- on of music as would ensure its aban- onment in favour of the employment of rchestral musicians.

INCOME TAX (COMPANIES' RESERVES).

Mr. BRACKEN asked the Chancellor f the Exchequer if he will give the gures indicating the proportion of In- ome Tax payable by public and private ompanies as opposed to individuals, and s to the proportions in the first group pplicable to profits distributable as dividends and profits reinvested or applied to eserve; and if he will consider differen- ating between the tax payable by com- anies on profits distributed as dividends and profits reinvested or other- ise put to useful development schemes hich create employment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: It is not ossible to divide up the receipt of the ncome Tax in the manner desired by y hon. Friend. I might however refer im to an answer given on 9th February st year in reply to a question by the n. Member for Stockton-on-Tees (Mr. acmillan) in which it was estimated hat in a normal year the cost of re- eving the undistributed income of com- anies from the standard rate of 5s. would e in the neighbourhood of £60,000,000. am afraid that I cannot undertake in uestion and answer to discuss the merits the issue raised by my hon. Friend as the incidence of the Income Tax on e reserves of companies. It has been ebated in this House on numerous occa- ons, and I have no doubt that it will be gain. All that I can say at the moment that, apart altogether from financial onsiderations, the difficulties—both of rinciple and of administration—inherent a differential rate for reserves have therto been found insuperable.

HOPS (BREWING).

Sir A. KNOX asked the Financial ecretary to the Treasury the amount of ritish hops consumed in British brewer- s in 1914, 1930 and 1932, respectively?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: Information is only available as to the total quantity of hops used in brewing, and it is not possible to give the separate quantities of British hops used. The total quantities used in the years ending 30th September, 1914, 1930 and 1932, were respectively 559,424, 307,289 and 219,587 cwts.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK.

Mr. CAPE asked the Postmaster-General the number of depositors, and the amount deposited, in the Post Office Savings Bank during the years 1929, 1930, 1931 and 1932, and the amounts withdrawn during the same years, respectively?

Sir K. WOOD: The figures required are:

Year	Number of Depositors.	Deposits.	Withdrawals.
		£	£
1929	9,834,267	77,420,706	87,951,890
1930	9,847,472	76,120,515	77,694,381
1931	9,764,103	72,024,875	79,821,058
1932*	9,684,000	90,287,000	81,163,000

* The figures for 1932 are approximate only, proved figures not being available yet.

PARENT COAL CORPORATION.

Sir J. HASLAM asked the President of the Board of Trade the date upon which the papers were first available for the use of the Official Receiver to enable him to investigate the affairs of the Parent Coal Corporation and provide a report to be laid before the court?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: Most of the books and papers of the company were handed to the Official Receiver on 1st July, 1932, but the books were returned to the secretary to enable him to prepare the Statement of Affairs and were retained by him for that purpose until 30th September, 1932. Since that date great difficulty and delay have been experienced in obtaining further papers relating to the company's business, and one of the most important documents was made available to the Official Receiver only a few days ago. I understand that the Official Receiver's report has now been made.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

HOUSING (FINANCIAL PROVISIONS) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

The following Motion stood upon the Order Paper in the name of Mr. GREENWOOD:

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power so to modify Section one of the Bill as to ensure the continuance of the power of the Minister of Health to grant subsidies in respect of houses built in agricultural parishes."

3.51 p.m.

Mr. SPEAKER: It appears to me that this Instruction is unnecessary, as the Committee, if they thought fit to do so, could so modify Section 1 without any instruction from the House.

Bill considered in Committee.

[Sir DENNIS HERBERT in the Chair.]

CLAUSE 1.—(Discontinuance of certain subsidies under 13 & 14 Geo. 5. c. 24 and 14 & 15 Geo. 5. c. 35.)

3.52 p.m.

Mr. GREENWOOD: I beg to move, in page 1, line 11, after the word "house," to insert the words:

"(other than a house in an agricultural parish within the meaning of the Housing (Financial Provisions) Act, 1924)."

I cannot now argue the general question of the stoppage of the subsidy under the Act of 1924. The purpose of this Amendment is to make an exception in the case of houses in agricultural parishes. Members who were in the House in 1924 will remember that the Labour Government then made a distinction between urban houses and houses intended for agricultural workers or persons of like character. There was a good deal of discussion, in which several Members of the present Government took part, and we devised ultimately, out of committee discussions, a definition of an agricultural parish which would limit the special subsidy—the additional subsidy given under the Act of 1924—to those areas which were really agricultural areas. It is true that since the War, under the Housing Act of 1919, under the Act of 1923, and under the Act of 1924, a very large number of houses have been built in rural districts, but to-day the term "rural district council" does not in any way denote that the council's area is a rural area. There are, in many districts in this country, rural district councils whose areas are primarily urban, and the number of houses built under those Acts apart from the houses which qualified for a special subsidy under the Act of 1924 for rural workers, was comparatively small.

It is undoubtedly true that there is a special rural housing problem. It is a problem of two kinds. In the first place, there is the problem of the very old houses which are now overcrowded and ought to be replaced, and with it there is the question of the gradual shifting of the agricultural population. On the other hand, there is the larger question for which the Minister of Agriculture, and not the Minister of Health, is responsible—the revival of one of our most fundamental industries. If the housing problem in the countryside is to be dealt with adequately, our submission is that it will not be dealt with in this Measure, as under the terms of this Bill no houses will be built. If we take the number of houses which have been built in agricultural parishes—and that means that all the houses are intended for rural workers—if we take the number of houses built under the Act of 1924 in agricultural parishes up to the end of last year, we find that it was just over 26,000, namely, 26,208; and it is very interesting to observe that 24,500 of them were built by local authorities, and less than 1,700 of them were built by private enterprise. These 26,000 houses were a direct contribution to the problem of rural housing, but that contribution would not have been made had it not been for the special provisions in the Housing (Financial Provisions) Act of 1924. In effect, so far as we can ascertain the number of houses built specifically for agricultural and rural workers since 1924, out of every 23 or 24 only one has been built by private enterprise, and the rest have been built under the provisions of the Act.

It is admitted by hon. Members opposite, and by the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster-General, who took part in piloting the Bill of 1926, the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, that there is a rural housing problem, and provision was made six years ago for local authorities to recondition rural housing. It is true that since that time an increased number of houses or buildings have been reconditioned and made habitable for people in the countryside, but the number is very small. I, myself, never believed in that Bill as a solution of the rural housing problem. Indeed, I remember when the Bill was originally introduced I moved its rejection. During my term of office I did my best, as I think hon. Members who were then in the House will admit, to get the best out of the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, and the number of houses reconditioned during 1930 and 1931 was very considerably larger than during the earlier days of the operation of the Act. I am not going to deny that last year the number was larger than it was in 1931, but the number of houses reconditioned is, on the whole, relatively small. I mention the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, because it is an admission of the reality of a rural housing problem, an admission made by the party which is the predominant partner in the National Government at the present time.

My contention is, that the rural district councils, which are rural in character and not semi-industrial, are so impoverished, their rateable value is so small, that they have to be helped in a way that urban districts need not be. That provision was made in the Act of 1924. My second contention is, that, having regard to the traditionally low rents in the countryside—it is a vicious circle: low wages, low rents; low rents, therefore low wages—it is not, even with the reduced cost of building to-day, an economic proposition for private enterprise to build houses in the rural area to house the workers. Even if it be true, which I do not admit, in the case of the urban areas, the urban district councils and the municipal boroughs and county boroughs, that they can do without special assistance from the State, that does not apply to the rural area, first, because private enterprise will not build there at the rents which can be charged to the agricultural workers; secondly, because the rural district councils could not, because of the restricted resources at their disposal, in any circumstances build without a subsidy, and could not, indeed, except in favoured areas, even with the very substantial subsidy which was given under the Act of 1924.

I could hope that the Government would give way on this point. We have to admit ourselves beaten temporarily on the major point as regards the abolition of the 1924 subsidy, but there is a powerful case, it seems to me, and one which ought to be accepted by hon. Members opposite, who represent agricultural constituencies to a greater extent than my hon. Friends behind me do. I am disappointed that the last Act placed on the Statute Book by the late Government, the Housing (Rural Authorities) Act has produced no result, because it has not been worked as it should have been. It has made, under the present administration, no contribution. We were to have devoted £2,000,000 to local authorities for the building of 40,000 houses. The latest figures presented to this House show that the Minister has given his approval to the acceptance of tenders in respect of 680 houses. That means that no attack has been made on the problem of rural housing. If it be true that agriculture is one of our fundamental industries, as I believe it is—hon. Members opposite know more about it than I do—if it be true that agriculture is an essential industry of the community, then it is clear, I think, that we ought to have regard to those people whose lives are bound up with the fortunes of that industry. Housing in the countryside is, indeed, a scandal.

Here is an opportunity, this being a National Government, to make an exception to the Government's policy of abolishing subsidies. Here is an opportunity to do something for those who are engaged in an important national industry. I think it is bound to be admitted on all hands that private enterprise, the building societies—such building societies as have taken part in this work—would never dream of going to the country villages, the little hamlets and building three cottages here, four there and 10 somewhere else. That is not the scale on which their operations would work. The Bill will fail to deal with the rural housing problem. If that problem is to be dealt with, it must be dealt with either nationally—and I am not committing myself to any kind of national building—or through local authorities. Local authorities cannot deal with it if the 1924 subsidy is to be taken away. With the utmost difficulty, under very considerable pressure, and then only in certain selected areas have we been able, with the very substantial subsidy given under the 1924 Act, to build in England and Wales 26,000 cottages.

The problem of the countryside is as serious as that in the towns, and relatively, even admitting the decline in the agricultural population, the problem is becoming more serious. The only solution I can see—and I am not trying to make a party case—is that in this Bill we should at least exempt from the operation of Clause 1 the powers of local authorities to build in agricultural parishes. I am not asking that the rural district councils, semi-urban and industrial in character, should be allowed a privilege that other industrial areas are not allowed. I am only asking that agricultural parishes, which are agricultural parishes as defined in the Act, should still receive public assistance. It is an awkward term to use in these days, but I am still asking that they should receive financial assistance in this case, for there is no way, short of that, of the problem of housing in the countryside being settled. I hope that on this point the Committee will be with me, and I hope that the Minister will be prepared to grant this very humble request, but one which, I am satisfied, is in the national interest.

Sir PERCY HARRIS: I should like to add my plea, if it be necessary—I hope it is not necessary—to exempt these agricultural parishes. I have some confidence, because the Minister of Health built up the whole of his case for the withdrawal of the subsidy on the urban problem. He based his case on what has come to be known as the Ray report, on the suggestion that private enterprise in the towns, owing to the drop in costs and cheaper money, can now construct houses, but when interrupted and questioned on the rural problem, he did not seriously suggest that it applied to rural districts. It is common knowledge that with wages something like 30s. a week, it is impossible in most areas for the agricultural labourer to pay an economic rent. I have a very vivid memory of a discussion on the Housing (Rural Authorities) Act, associated with the name of Tudor Walters. That was an agreed Measure. It was the result of appeals from all parts of the House. The personality, character, energy and imagination of Sir Tudor Walters gave hope that as the result of that Act being provided with ammunition, the only kind of ammunition necessary, that is to say, money, a real attack would be made on the rural housing problem. That Act has disappeared practically into limbo. It is not in operation. I am going to suggest that if the Minister now will come forward and say that it is going to be revived, that the machinery is again to be put into operation, the need will largely disappear, and I do think that the conscience of the House, the common sense of the country, would demand that, whatever may be done in withdrawing the subsidy from the town problem, it should not be withdrawn in regard to agricultural housing.

A very important part of this Bill is Clause 2, which provides the new machinery for bringing into the housing of the working classes, for the first time on a large scale, the building societies. No one could suggest that the machinery of the building society can tackle the scattered problem of houses here, there and everywhere in the numerous rural parishes all over the country. I suggest that this Amendment, aiming at putting into operation the Sir Tudor Walters Act, should be accepted. Let the Minister try a new great experiment in the towns, and deal with this rural question on its own by special treatment. It may be said that, after all, I am a town Member, and what concern have I to go into the interests of rural parishes? Well, my answer is that there is a constant migration from the rural districts to the cities to compete for the only too scarce jobs at the dock-gates, the factory and the workshop. They will leave the rural districts because the agricultural labourer, when he gets married and starts on his own, finds it impossible to get a cottage or a house. The Minister would have the most meticulous economist on his side in drawing into the purview of the Bill the rural housing question.

Mr. CHARLES WILLIAMS: Speaking as one who would naturally wish to see the largest amount of development in the countryside, I hope the Minister will not accept the Amendment. Every one of us knows that you would have development and expenditure of money in a great many ways in a great many areas, but many of us also realise that, although in the country districts you might have considerable improvement in the housing system, what we really want both in the country and in the towns is a restoration of general prosperity which will make the money flow back into the countryside and develop it in a natural way. The Government, as I understand , are laying it down as a definite matter of policy that subsidies of this kind should not be encouraged as a general rule, although there may be exceptions, and for that reason, realising that the larger side of the Government policy must be a general increase of prosperity, which can only be brought about by drastic reductions in taxation, although every instinct, every desire, and possibly every interest of mine would be to get money for development of the countryside in this way, yet it is essential, if the Government lay down these principles and Amendments are cleverly designed by the Socialist party to break right through the Government policy in this way, that we should resist those Amendments and make it clear that we are going to stand by the Government in their main policy and not be led away by what may seem very attractive at the moment. For that reason, I hope the Government will not accept the Amendment.

Mr. PRICE: Coming from a district which has had difficulty in dealing with housing in small agricultural parishes, I want to add my plea to that of the Mover that the Minister should give this question serious consideration. I have been rather astonished at the urgent support given by hon. Members opposite representing agricultural districts to the removal of subsidies. Our experience has been that in the erection of rural housing in remote districts it is impossible for private enterprise to meet existing demands. Moreover, if prosperity does come to agricultural areas, you will have very great difficulty in retaining the youth there unless you provide through local authorities, to my mind the only authorities who can do it, with financial help from the Government, reasonable, sanitary, social housing conditions. It is a mistake to speak of the agricultural labourer to-day as you would have done 20 or 30 years ago. He is as intelligent as the hon. Member for Torquay (Mr. C. Williams), and he fully appreciates reasonable, sanitary housing conditions for his wife and children.

I do not wish to put any blame on anyone, but the agricultural labourer has never had in the whole history of the country reasonable and fair conditions of housing. There has been some change since 1924 and a certain number of houses equipped with modern sanitary conditions have been erected, which have been greatly appreciated by men and women who never before have had an opportunity of living in a house with a fresh water supply and reasonable sanitary arrangements. I was speaking only last week to one of the most eminent agriculturists in the country, formerly a Member of the House. I was asking for his observations on this Bill as a man purely interested in agriculture. He admitted that one of the difficulties in keeping the youth in the countryside was housing conditions and the lack of houses when the youth who worked on the land is thinking of taking a wife and making a home of his own. The modern youth looks for something better than his grandfather had and, unless you provide it, he will go into the thickly-populated towns to get for his wife and bairns the improved housing and social conditions which are lacking in his own district.

The building societies cannot possibly meet housing necessities in the remote agricultural areas. If we desire to keep in the countryside permanent residents who understand their job, instead of having people rushing into the towns, there are obligations on us to continue the subsidy; otherwise the problem will not be dealt with. A lot has been said during the reign of the National Government about the development and reorganisation of agriculture, and the Government ought to give very kind consideration to the Amendment and not allow rural housing to be retarded. The authorities who have been operating the Act should have an assurance that the State will give financial assistance so that progress may continue. It is in that spirit that I support the Amendment, and I trust the Minister will agree to the renewal of the housing operations of the Government and give the local authorities the chance of dealing with the problem.

4.26 p.m.

The MINISTER of HEALTH (Sir Hilton Young): I ask the Committee not to accept the Amendment for reasons which appear to me quite unanswerable. There is danger of a certain confusion of thought on the subject of housing in rural areas. The problem is not really one, but two. There is the problem of housing the agricultural labourer, and the problem of providing accommodation for other inhabitants. The two really have to be dealt with separately. I do not think that the arguments that have been used by hon. Members opposite assist us at all in the problem of housing the agricultural labourer with which we really want to grapple. The other inhabitants of rural areas can in general afford rents of about the same standard as people in the towns, and, as regards the provision of accommodation for them, all the considerations and arguments apply which we have already thrashed out as regards the general issue of subsidies or no subsidies. They will have a better prospect of more new houses under the Bill than they had before, because we are clearing from the path those forces of subsidised competition which prevent the free supply of new houses. There is no case at all for special treatment of inhabitants other than agricultural labourers.

I come now to the class which we really have in mind in the discussion—the agricultural labourer. I entirely agree with what was said by the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Price) as to the deserts of that particular class, and I am sure we all have their interests very particularly at heart. I say freely that if I thought that the Amendment was necessary in the interest of agricultural labourers I should take a very different view of it from that which I take now. The passage of the Amendment would be no good whatever to the agricultural labourers. Consider the conditions of the problem as regards the agricultural labourers? We are dealing with a problem which is absolutely different from the problem of the towns because on the whole the population of the rural areas is decreasing whereas the population of the urban areas is increasing. Unfortunately, I have not the full figures of the new census yet, but I have obtained the best sample I could from the new census of the state of affairs as regards change of population in the rural areas. I find that it has been calculated from the returns already available for the counties of Kent, Surrey, Essex Hertfordshire, that the agricultural population of those counties declined from 1921 to 1931 by at least the equivalent o a drop of 7 per cent. The decline of the agricultural population in the rural districts which are the districts most affecting agricultural labourers was a good deal more than 7 per cent. Therefore, we perceive at the outset that, clearly, the problem with regard to the agricultura labourer is a problem not of the number but of the right sort of houses for his accommodation.

The second fact to which I would direct the consideration of the Committee is that new houses at the sort of rents at which they could be let under the subsidy could be very little if any good at all to the agricultural labourer because the rents have been too high. It is no good providing huoses for the agricultura labourer at rents which he cannot afford In my part of the country agricultura cottages are still let at 1s. 6d. a week and 2s. 6d. is quite a common rent. Workers who can only afford to pay those rents cannot afford to pay the rents of the new houses. It is to meet those two facts that of a shrinking of population on the whole and the small rents which the agricultural labourer can afford, that we have framed the policy which will be enacted in the present Bill. That policy is to continue special assistance for the sake o agricultural labourers and to continue it in the form in which alone it is going to be any use to them, namely, the reconditioning of existing cottages which, even after reconditioning, can still be let to the agricultural labourer at a rent which he can afford to pay. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wakefield (Mr Greenwood) said that the Reconditioning Act of 1926 admitted that there was a special problem. Undoubtedly, it admits that that is a special problem, but it also shows a remedy for the special problem which is to take the existing cottages which are not up to modern standards as regards what is decent for life and to put them into a proper state under the very large subsidies provided by that Act.

Let me remind the Committee how very big those subsidies really are. The cost, you will remember, is divided into equal thirds between the local authority, the Exchequer and the owner, and the subsidy goes up to a maximum of £100 per cottage. With the assistance of that subsidy cottages can, after reconditioning, still be let at such low rents as 3s. per week, and are available for the agricultural labourer. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the small number of cottages built under that Act. What is the matter? We have a perfectly good Act only it has not been used. Probably one of the principal reasons why it has not been used is because other activities have distracted the authorities' attention. That has been the actual experience under the Act. I propose to do what can be done by central administration to assist the administration by taking a vigorous initiative in calling the attention of the responsible authorities to that Act.

There is another matter. It has been suggested to me by men who have practical knowledge that the reason why that Act—and, I believe, it is probably the solution of this problem—has not been sufficiently used is because it has been too exclusively left in the hands of the county council, though some county councils have done excellent work. Comparisons are odious, and I will not particularise the councils in question. But on the whole there has not been sufficient initiative and energy introduced into the Act by the county councils. I suggest that you would get more steam behind the Act by a mere transference of its powers to county districts, because it is among those who have more intimate knowledge of the special requirements of the smaller areas. the members of the authorities of the county districts, that you get a more pressing necessity to put the Act into force. I therefore propose by way of getting a more ready use of the Act, a freer transfer of the powers from the county council to the county district. That by no means completes the picture of the special help which will still be available to the authorities after the passage of the Bill.

There is another matter in which there is too little interest to which I should like to call attention and enlist the assistance of Members in calling the attention of their local authorities to the question. The Act of 1930 is also available to the rural authorities for dealing with the evil of the rural slum. There are slums in rural areas as there are in urban areas. Too seldom does it occur to local authorities that they can make use of the powers and subsidies under the Act of 1930 for clearing away their rural slums as well as their urban slums. I will give one instance within my personal knowledge of the sort of good work which can be done. A rural district council in my constituency recently put through a successful scheme for clearing away four cottages which were no longer fit for habitation under the powers contained in the Act of 1930. With the assistance of the full subsidy they provided for the substitution of four rural workers' cottages in place of the four condemned cottages.

Sir BASIL PETO: Can my right hon. Friend say whether the four cottages can be let at a rent of 2s. 6d. per week?

Sir H. YOUNG: My hon. Friend has put his finger on the point. The subsidies under the Act of 1930 are, as the Committee know, £2 10s. per person displaced from the Exchequer, and £3 15s. per house from the council. It will be found in practical experience that with the assistance of those subsidies the rent charged for the replaced cottages can in normal areas be kept down to 3s. or 4s. per week and thus brought within the reach of the agricultural labourer. It is, therefore, a practical power to be made use of for the betterment of housing conditions of which sufficient use has not yet been made.

Miss RATHBONE: Will the right hon. Gentleman kindly say whether that estimate includes rates or not?

Sir H. YOUNG: That is the situation. You are dealing with a different problem from the general problem because you have a shrinking population and one which cannot afford the rent. Ordinary subsidised building has done no good to the agricultural labourer. What you need in order to improve conditions and to give him the house he wants is a more active use of the Reconditioning Act and of the Slum Clearance Act to which I have referred. It will be the policy of His Majesty's Government, as I have said, to take the initiative in promoting the use of those Acts among the rural authorities.

4.42 p.m.

Mr. HARCOURT JOHNSTONE: I think that the Amendment which stands on the Paper is absolutely essential if rural housing is to continue upon anything resembling adequate lines. The Minister, in a cogently reasoned and temperate speech, has put the view of his Department, but I find myself very far from being convinced by any of the arguments that he put forward. The first argument was the shrinkage in the rural population. There is no doubt that shrinkage has taken place, but it is not universal, and it is accompanied, at the same time, by changes in rural population; an alteration and shifting in rural population which makes new housing essential in those areas in which the rural population is increasing—and there are such areas—instead of diminishing. Moreover, we have to bear in mind the fact that rural housing, neither now nor at any previous period of our history, has never been adequate. It has been insufficient, and, in many cases, of the lowest possible quality. I dare say the right hon. Gentleman knows of villages in which the standard of housing is so low that the reconditioning of such houses is practically impossible.

I very much regret that I have not the figures—I have been inquiring into specific figures and hope to have them before the Third Reading of the Bill—but surely the Minister will agree, that in many cases, and in many areas, the reconditioning of houses is also intolerably expensive and is not the most economic method of dealing with the problem. You have exceptions to the rule. My right hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall (Sir F. Acland) is not here, but, if he were, I am sure that he would assure the Committee that in Devonshire the reconditioning of rural cottages has worked extremely well. But then, my right hon. Friend is there to put pressure upon the county council, and he does it with great effect. In other areas the Measure has not been effective, and, indeed, in some areas cannot be effective, owing to the difference of cost between one area and another. I hope to be able to show the right hon. Gentleman, before the Bill is finally through the House, that in certain parts of the North of England reconditioning of rural cottages is not an economic proposition. It was the first part of the right hon. Gentleman's argument, that the population in the rural areas was decreasing and that what was wanted was not new houses but the reconditioning of old ones. On various grounds I dissent from that view.

But I go much further. The Minister has stated that the building of new houses, with the subsidy, has not provided and cannot provide houses at rents which agricultural labourers can pay. That is not so. I have here a report of a scheme which is being carried out by a rural district council, in which houses are being built to be let at very low rents. The rents can be fixed at 2s. 7d. a week, plus rates 1s., making 3s. 7d. The houses show a profit of 5d. per week per house if they are let at 4s. a week. The rural district council will come out flat if the houses are let at 3s. 7d. Four shillings is the rent which an agricultural labourer can pay and is going to pay.

Mr. KIRKWOOD: Can the hon. Member tell us the size of those houses?

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Yes. The superficial area is 759 square feet, the accommodation is three bedrooms, a living room 15 feet by 12 feet 10 inches, a wash-house and a bathroom.

Mr. KIRKWOOD: Built under the 1930 Act?

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Under the 1924 Act.

Mr. KIRKWOOD: Under the Wheatley Act?

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Under the Chamberlain and Wheatley Acts, I presume. [HON. MEMBERS: "What is the cost per house?"] The cost of the house which enables rents to be fixed which agricultural labourers can, and in this case will, pay, is £281. The land in this particular case has been given, but even if it had not been given it would only have added a trifling cost to the price of the house. It would not have affected the rent more than 1d. per week. That is an actual case, of which the Minister must have knowledge, in which rural housing under the subsidy is being carried on, and houses are being built for agricultural labourers, which will be inhabited by agricultural labourers, at rents which hey can pay. With prices in their present ondition there is no reason why a policy n the same lines should not be carried ut in many more areas. I should be repared, if the Minister would make a oncession, to accept half the present ubsidy for rural houses. I think it would hen still be possible, with a £5 10s. subidy instead of the £11 subsidy, to build ouses which the agricultural labourer ould inhabit and of which he could pay he rent.

I am sure the Committee would be xtremely gratified if the Minister would ive us that concession, because it is not subsidy that would cost the country ast sums of money. The amount of rural ousing that is needed, although large, s not enormous, and the Minister by naking that concession would put the ecessary drive into rural housing, which annot possibly come from simply handng over to rural district councils the ecessary authority to use the Reconitioning Act. I should like to hear what he Minister's experience is in regard to hat Act. I know that in some areas it as worked fairly well, but I know posiively that in other areas it is not an conomic proposition, and cannot be nade one. I am equally certain that here are all over the country, we have ll seen them, houses that have fallen nto disrepair, or are falling into disepair, or ought to be abandoned, which o amount of architectural ingenuity can ver render habitable.

The second class of person with whom he Minister was concerned was a very mportant class—the person who is not n agricultural labourer but who lives n a rural area. There, again, I differ rom the Minister's proposition. He said hat under this Bill private enterprise vill be able to build houses at approxinately the same rents, or at the same ents, at which houses of that character re being built at the present time. That s not so. The rents which private enterrise will have to charge under the cheme of borrowing from the building ocieties, to put it at the lowest figure, vill be 12s. per week. That is a high ent, whereas at the present time I can raw the attention of the Minister and he Committee to houses that are being uilt for that particular class of people, ccording to their quality and size, to be et at 9s. 10d., 7s. 9d. and 6s. a week.

Mr. MICHAEL BEAUMONT: Can the hon. Member give us any data on which he bases the figure of 12s. as the rent chargeable by private enterprise?

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Yes. That is the rent which is being charged, with the subsidy, at the present time by local authorities, and there is no reason to suppose that private enterprise is so much more skilful than public enterprise, seeing that they will employ the same contractors in the building of the houses, that they will be able to build cheaper.

Mr. BEAUMONT: Is it not a fact that private enterprise has built houses and is letting them at rents much lower than that?

HON. MEMBERS: Where?

Mr. JOHNSTONE: That is not so. The houses that are going to be built by private enterprise for this class of people will be at rents averaging not less than 12s. I do not think that the Minister claims that the rent will be any lower than that.

Lord EUSTACE PERCY: Surely, if houses have been built in rural areas at £281, the rent of 12s. now mentioned by the hon. Member is entirely out of relation to his figures.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: I agree, if the figures related to the same class of house; but I would point out that the houses in question do not come up to the standard which will be required in regard to the expense of drainage, of road making, of site and the rest of it, that is required for urban houses.

Lord E. PERCY: In rural areas if the agricultural labourer can get a house built for £281, why should he pay 12s. rent for it.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: It is a different house altogether, but even in regard to the cheaper house of the agricultural labourer, if you take the subsidy away the rent to which I have referred, amounting to 4s. per week, inclusive of rates, would be approximately 8s. a week.

Lord E. PERCY: No.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Indeed it would. I have been referring to houses which are being built to let, with the subsidy, at 9s. 10d., 7s. 9d. and 6s. Without the subsidy the rents would be 13s. 10d., 12s. and 10s.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Certainly. I cannot argue with the Noble Lord here. Perhaps I might take him out into the Lobby and in half an hour I might enlighten him as successfully as my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary enlightened my hon. Friend the Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. D. Mason). My point is, that for those who reside in rural areas but who are not engaged as agricultural labourers there are at present being built with the subsidy, houses to let at 9s. 10d. a week for the parlour type, with three bedrooms, 7s. 9d. for non-parlour type, three bedrooms, and 6s. for non-parlour type, two bedrooms, inclusive of rates. That is the type of rent which those people can pay. They are being provided in this particular instance by a public utility society in three different classes, to meet three different classes of wages, three different sizes of family, and three different sorts of requirements, and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that under this Bill activities of that kind, which are exceedingly useful, will immediately come to an end, nor do I think that under the Bill they will be replaced by the activities of private enterprise enabling houses to be let at the same rents.

The right hon. Gentleman said that over a large part of the country houses to be let at approximately the same rents at present being charged for council houses can be built by private enterprise, at a profit. That applies to a great part of the country, but it certainly does not and can never apply to the rural areas, whether in regard to houses for the agricultural labourer or the individual who lives in a rural area and is engaged in what is known as rural industries. I am sure the Minister is anxious that housing should proceed under the Bill. He would do an immense amount to prevent harm being done if he would grant one-half the subsidy, if he cannot grant the whole. There is a strong case for reducing the £11 subsidy, which was granted at a time when costs were immensely higher. Costs have fallen and the necessity for so high a subsidy has also decreased, but some subsidy there must be, or the form of activity with which I have been dealing will cease.

The Minister made one final reference to the question of rural slum areas. There I am in complete agreement with him. I do not believe that anything like sufficient advantage has been taken of the opportunity of clearing rural slums. Anyone who knows the country, particularly small country towns, must know of little back streets in which there are slums as bad as any in our great cities. I trust that the Minister will take steps to encourage local authorities to schedule these slum areas and get on with the clearance of these slums. Before we dispose of the Amendment I hope we shall have a further explanation from the Government on the question of houses for the agricultural labourer. I cannot see how, in the face of the figures I have given for rural districts, the Minister can maintain the proposition that under the subsidy new houses cannot be built to let at rents which the agricultural labourer can pay. That is not so, it is being done; and the Bill, unamended, will prevent it being done and thus set back the whole case of the rehousing of our rural population, which is just as urgent a question as the housing of our urban population.

5.2 p.m.

Captain HEILGERS: The Minister of Health has stated that there are two problems, which are entirely separate, one, the problem of the agricultural worker and, secondly, the problem of the other residents. I cannot agree that they are not in some ways interlocked. Many people have been unable to obtain "C" class houses in the towns and have descended upon the countryside. They now occupy houses which should be occupied by agricultural workers. The 24,000 houses referred to by the right hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Greenwood) have taken off some of these people, but a great many are still occupying these houses, and unless we have some type of new house for rural districts we shall never really cure the housing problem in our rural areas. The Minister of Health also stated that there has been a decrease of 7 per cent. in the numbers living in rural districts.

Sir H. YOUNG: No. That was only a sample figure, taken from the last ensus in connection with certain disricts, to which I referred.

Captain HEILGERS: I am much bliged to the right hon. Gentleman, but the same time there has been a derease in the number of rural houses. any in my own district have become rotten and obsolete that they have een allowed to fall down. As regards he future of the Housing (Rural Workers) ct, I am glad to hear that the Government propose to hand over its adminisration to the district councils. It has een a success only in a few county ouncils like Devon, and East Suffolk, nd in Scotland, but in those districts here it has been a success I hope the overnment will consider the possibility f the county councils being allowed to ontinue the good work they have done the past.

Mr. BANFIELD: I want to call the ttention of the Committee to what, in y opinion, is the vital and fundamental atter which underlies the question of ural housing. Since I have been in this louse I have heard from time to time xpressions of opinion from all sides that e have to get back to prosperity in agriulture, to get the people back upon the and, if we are to get rid of some portion f our great army of unemployed. I sugest that it will be impossible to get eople back to work on the land unless ou ensure to them decent housing conditions for themselves and their families. n the main it is true to say that the only emedy in many of our rural areas for the ousing problem is to pull down at least wo-thirds of the existing buildings and ebuild them again. Reconditioning is o solution of the problem. The majority f these places are too far gone already to ebuild, or to be reconditioned, and the urroundings of these places, the drainage, are such that many of us feel shamed of the conditions under which gricultural labourers are asked to exist.

Hon. Members opposite always put hemselves forward as representing the rue interests of agriculture. They are lways anxious to impress upon us that hey are the agricultural party, and I am old that at election times they very often alk to the wives of agricultural abourers about the bad conditions; and o on. This important Amendment is designed to do something practical for the agricultural labourer, but very few of those who are supposed to represent the best interests of agriculture are taking any interest in the Debate. I appeal to the Minister to allow the 1924 subsidy to continue. Far more might have been done had there been goodwill and determination among those who sit on county councils and rural district councils to do something to improve the housing conditions in their areas. I feel sometimes that the class who are elected on these bodies are very anxious indeed to do nothing to build more houses in their areas. The tied house system is a scandal in our rural districts, and many of those who flourish among the farmers and who are of the type which the tied house system suits, are elected to our local bodies and to county councils, and are the most reactionary among the whole agricultural population. Consequently you get a drag upon the wheel.

The Minister says that he cannot agree that the subsidy should go on. The hon. Member for Torquay (Mr. C. Williams) talked as he usually talked; and suggested that in some way the demand for housing in rural areas, and the subsidy, is something in the nature of Socialism. There are men of good will on all sides in this Committee who demand that there shall be a square deal for the agricultural labourer and for the rural areas; and to say that it is a demand for Socialism is preposterous to say the least. I am surprised that the Minister considers that there are two problems; the question of the agricultural labourer and the problem of the others. "The others," I suppose, are the carpenters and masons, and bricklayers, whom he says can afford to pay rents equal to those paid in the towns. I put it to anyone who has a knowledge of rural life and conditions that it is not true to say that these "others" can pay anywhere near the rents which are paid in the towns. The hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Johnstone) has proved conclusively that given the will and a continuance of the subsidy, given a desire to get a drive in rural areas, something can be done, but there is a weight in these rural areas which, in spite of all the efforts of men of good will, is sufficient to keep back and retard any efforts towards improving housing conditions.

[Mr. Banfield.]

If it is true, and I think it is possible to get a real revival in agriculture, which is the one thing which holds out some hope for our people in the future, I am confident that the Government must face the question of housing. If county councils and rural district councils will not carry out their work then the responsibility lies on the Minister of Health to tell them to do their job or he will be obliged to do it for them. The Bill drops the subsidy and gives the whole matter into the hands of the building societies. I repeat that I am confident that building societies will not do this class of work in rural areas. The Minister says that they can use the Slum Clearance Act. Yes, but the difficulty is how are we to compel these people, knowing the facts as we do, to open their eyes and declare that there are any slums in any rural area. You will have considerable difficulty in persuading many of the farmers that there are, as a matter of fact, any slums in their particular area. The idea still remains in the minds of many of them that almost any kind of accommodation is good enough for the agricultural labourer, and accommodation is so terribly scarce that these men, who after all are the backbone of the country, are compelled to live in hovels which are a disgrace to our civilisation.

We have a perfect right to make an appeal to the Committee to help us in the problem of rural areas. I wish we could get rid of the tied-house system altogether, and get enough free cottages in the village and the hamlet to enable agricultural labourers to have a choice of accommodation. If we are to deal with this matter we must realise that we cannot get prosperity back to the countryside by paying low wages, or by providing houses with low rents to go hand in hand with low wages. Prosperity can only be brought back to the countryside by having well paid agricultural labourers living in decent houses, with a chance for their children. Unless you do that you may tinker with this problem year after year and pass Acts of Parliament, as you have done, without touching the problem, and you will still be up against it. There will be reactionaries who will put sprags into the wheel of every effort to improve housing conditions in the country. If the Minister is really enthusiastic and sincere, I ask him to take over this matter of rural housing and declare that he will see that something definite is done on behalf of the rural population. If these hidebound county councils and rural councils will not do their job, the Minister should take the matter in hand and do the job for them.

Mr. M. BEAUMONT: I regret that I did not hear the Minister's speech or the whole of the speech of the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Johnstone), but I want to say that I am in fundamental disagreement with those who, in what they allege to be the interests of the agricultural labourer, of whom they probably know singularly little, desire to increase or continue the subsidies for rural housing. There is a fundamental difference between those, like hon. Members of the Socialist party who quite honestly and sincerely believe that the housing of the people is primarily a matter for the State, to be assisted by private enterprise, and those who, like myself and the majority in this House, believe that it is primarily a matter for private enterprise, to be assisted if necessary, and only if necessary, by the State. That is a sincere difference of opinion on which we are not likely to find any common ground of agreement. I suggest that the Government are right in saying that the time has come when State subsidies can serve no useful purpose in the matter of general housing.

The hon. Member for South Shields, in a most able and informative speech, gave an instance with the details of which he had been kind enough to furnish me, in which rural housing is being provided by a rural district council at rents which the agricultural labourer can and in fact will pay. But the fact remains, and the hon. Member who has just spoken showed an appreciation of the point in his somewhat fanciful condemnation of certain rural district councils, that though it may be that in this particular instance these houses are being provided, taking the country as a whole the houses for the rural population, at rents which they can afford to pay, are in fact not being built. Anyone who goes to the country districts, particularly those not very remote from London, knows that many houses are being built by rural district councils ostensibly for the rural opulation, and are in fact lived in by eek-enders and other people who have o connection with the locality, while the ural population prefer to continue to ve in the hovels so justly condemned by he hon. Member for Wednesbury (Mr. anfield) and by the hon. Member for outh Shields, and these rural workers re living in these hovels because of the ifference in rent. That has been going n all over the country for a considerable eriod.

If this Bill does nothing else it will top that most deplorable practice, ecause there is no reason whatever why n impoverished countryside should be alled upon to build, or the Government e called upon to subsidise, week-end ottages for urban dwellers in the rural reas. I differ also from the hon. Member for South Shields in his assertion hat private enterprise cannot now build ouses for the people of rural areas who re not in fact agricultural labourers—ouses at rents which they can afford to ay. The fall in building prices has educed the cost to such an extent that rivate enterprise can, and in fact has lready begun to, cope with the situation. failed entirely to follow the argument f the hon. Member for South Shields hat 8s. a week represented the value of he subsidy. I do not understand where e got his figures. If we take a comparable figure it is nearer 2s. You can nd new houses being built by private nterprise, some without the subsidy, at ents which the population in the rural reas, not agricultural labourers, can nd do pay.

I agree with the hon. Member for South Shields that the housing of the agricultural population is not an economic proposition in the true sense of the word, but I believe that private enterprise is now, in view particularly of the complete failure of the subsidy system in the past as far as other housing is concerned, in a better state to deal with it than is any local authority. While I have not the virulent objection to the subsidy in principle that some of my hon. Friends have, I do believe that the subsidy, as far as the housing problem still remains is concerned, has lamentably failed, and I am delighted that the Government have seen fit to discontinue it.

Mr. McENTEE: I want to ask the Minister to reconsider some of the arguments that he has used to-day. His first argument really was that the rural population is decreasing and that therefore there is not the same demand for houses in rural areas as there would be if the rural population were not decreasing. The right hon. Gentleman divided the rural population into two classes, the class of agricultural labourers who, he says, cannot afford to pay an economic rent, and another class that he think can afford to pay a rent approximately the same as the rent now paid by workers in town areas. I put it to him that if the rural population is decreasing, as it undoubtedly is, one of the main reasons for the decrease is the lack of suitable housing accommodation for the people who live in the rural areas and desire to continue to work there. It has been said many times that young couples desiring to get married cannot find any kind of accommodation in rural areas, and consequently there is every inducement for a man to seek occupation in or near one of the big towns if he can get any kind of accommodation there at all.

The other class is the class of which the Minister speaks entirely wrongly, the class that he thinks can afford to pay rent about equal to that which is being paid in urban areas by similar types of workers. I think the Minister will realise that in all negotiations for wages between trade unionists and their employers, the rural population of mechanics and the type of workers who are generally catered for by trade unions, are compelled to accept a lower wage because the conditions of living in the country are not as expensive as in the towns. I have had some experience of that type as representing the working-class people, and I hardly remember an instance, when we were negotiating on wages in rural areas and in agricultural areas, and in fact in the areas surrounding the smaller towns, where we have not been met with the argument that rents are lower there and that therefore wages ought to be lower. But the Minister tells us that these people are able to pay and in fact do pay a rent equal to that which is paid in the towns. I think the right hon. Gentleman on further inquiry will find that his information is entirely wrong.

[Mr. McEntee.]

The right hon. Gentleman also told us that in the past, with the subsidy, we have never provided houses at rents which the agricultural labourer could pay. The hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. M. Beaumont) said that the houses that had been built had been used very largely by week-enders. I can hardly imagine that there is much truth in that statement, although I have seen it in the Press a good deal, for I presume that county councils and rural councils pay the same attention to the question of their tenancies as is paid by the urban councils, and I can hardly imagine their building houses for use by their own people in their own area and then letting those houses to week-end trippers. In fact I imagine that the Ministry, if it were aware of such practices, would very soon put a stop to them. It is impossible for such a thing to be done on anything like a large scale. But the Minister's main argument was that the houses were not of much value to the agricultural labourer because the rents were too much for him to pay. Now he is proceeding by this Bill to take away the subsidy which without doubt will make the rents considerably higher than they were before.

I was interested in the speech of the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Johnstone) which the hon. Member for Aylesbury attempted to controvert. It was said that it is not possible, even under present conditions in rural areas, to build houses at a rent that the agricultural worker can pay. The Minister will be aware of a housing scheme with which I had some association. We built houses of three bedrooms, 12 to the acre, with all the modern amenities that are allowed in houses built by urban authorities, and we let them at 5s. 3d. a week with a £7 10s. subsidy. If they can be built with that subsidy, after paying for the land, and let at that rent, I ask the Minister to consider at what rent the houses could be let if, instead of the £7 10s. subsidy, there was a £11 subsidy as suggested in the Amendment. With £11 subsidy those houses could be let at approximately 4s. 4d. per week, provided that they were built under the conditions that prevailed at the time when those houses were built, that is 18 months to two years ago.

Since then prices have fallen considerably and if allowance is made for the fall in prices, these houses could now be let at approximately 4s. a week. There are many thousands of agricultural labourers who would be delighted to get a house of the kind to which I have referred at 4s. a week. But if they are to be left to the tender mercies of the building societies and the jerrybuilders, then I am afraid that the agricultural labourers' opportunities of decent housing conditions in the future are practically nil. "But," says the Minister, "we are going to recondition some of the old houses and we may spend in some cases up to £100 upon reconditioning." For the purposes of the people who have to live in these houses after they are reconditioned, it would be infinitely better if the Minister spent £100 in building some kind of decent wooden house with modern amenities and decent sanitary conditions.

The hon. Member for Aylesbury suggested that we on these benches knew nothing of agricultural conditions. I have lived in agricultural cottages —not for any long period of time, thank heaven, because it is no pleasure to live in an agricultural cottage in any part of the country. But I am qualified to claim that I know something of the conditions by the fact that I have lived in these cottages and I very much doubt if the hon. Member for Aylesbury has had that experience. My point is that the Minister, by his policy, can only succeed in one thing and that is to make it impossible for building to go on at all in agricultural areas unless the subsidy is granted. A plea has been made to him to grant even a reduced subsidy. Personally I think that if houses are to be provided for the agricultural labourer to meet the needs of the situation it will be necessary to have the full subsidy, but, when we take into account the reduction in the cost of building and in the cost of money since the subsidy was fixed at £11, the agricultural labourer might be able to get houses to-day, built by local authorities with half the subsidy, at a rent approximating to that at which he could get a house at the time when the £11 was fixed.

I ask the Minister to consider the fact that agricultural houses have never been sufficient at any time during his lifetime or mine. Ever since I was a boy I have heard the story of the bad housing conditions in rural areas. I think the Minter himself in his Parliamentary career as made speeches about the housing of e agricultural labourer. We have often eard it said that the agricultural bourer lived under conditions which ere not decent and of which the country ught to be ashamed. We have heard eas, especially when the Labour Govrnment were in office, from hon. Memers who now sit opposite and who ppear to have forgotten those pleas, that e agricultural labourer should be given ecent housing conditions. Such opporunities as he had of securing decent contions under the existing law will be ken away from him by the Minister, nless the right hon. Gentleman is preared to make this concession. I hope erefore that those who sit behind the inister and who have talked so much bout the agricultural labourer will show eir earnestness by voting for the mendment.

Sir JONAH WALKER SMITH: I do ot suppose that the Minister in his conideration of this Amendment will be reatly influenced by the views expressed y the hon. Member for Torquay (Mr. . Williams). It seems to me that the rgument which the hon. Member subitted was fallacious and it is an arguent to which the hon. Member for Aylesury (Mr. M. Beaumont) lent a certain mount of support. The suggestion ppeared to be that there is something nmutable in the policy of the Minister; at, as and from a certain date, say h December, 1932, onwards, in no circumstances whatever and for no purpose, all there be any Government subsidy. hat of course is not the policy of the inister. The right hon. Gentleman has n the Order Paper an Amendment which ould provide for the extension of the ubsidy to those schemes which had een under consideration for some conderable time and had reached a stage f maturity before 7th December, 1932. hus, in due course if that Amendment accepted as I have no doubt it will e, the subsidy will apply to those houses. urther, the subsidy is to apply for a urther period to all houses built in Scotnd for the reason—very properly—that here is a considerable lag in the proision of working class houses in Scotnd and it is right that that lag should e overtaken by means of the extension of subsidy. There is recognised to be a considerable lag also in the provision of houses in connection with slum clearance——

The CHAIRMAN: May I call the hon. Member's attention to the Amendment which is before the Committee? He has made no reference to it at all up to the present.

Sir J. WALKER SMITH: The point of my argument is that there is a great dearth of houses in agricultural parishes, and, just as it is right and proper that subsidy should be available for houses in connection with slum clearance, just as it is right and proper that subsidy should be available for houses under those schemes which had reached maturity by 7th December, 1932, so it is right and proper that subsidy should be available, as the Amendment provides for houses in agricultural parishes which are so urgently required. I have no particular love for subsidies to industries of any kind, and especially to the building industry, and the building industry as such never asked for any subsidy from the Government. The subsidy has been asked for the provision of houses by local authorities and others, but never by the building industry. The building employers urged the Minister two years ago, and have consistently held the view, that it is desirable that subsidies for all housing purposes should be withdrawn. There may have been some who thought that a subsidy would be a good thing for the industry but for the building industry the subsidy has been Dead Sea fruit, turning to ashes on their lips. No one dislikes subsidies more than I do.

Nevertheless I do not think there is anyone who is interested in agricultural development and in the housing of the agricultural workers who can fail to give a certain amount of sympathy, if not of support, to this Amendment. It ought to be supported upon at least three grounds. First, there is the exceptional dearth of houses in agricultural parishes. Secondly, even with the amount of subsidy hitherto available—£11 from the Government and £3 15s. from the local authority—it has been impossible for rural district councils to provide houses in agricultural parishes. Third, while under the Act of 1931 additional facilities were provided to meet the needs of agricultural parishes that Act, if it has not been maladministered has been administered without the sympathy and understanding which I think is requisite. For those reasons the Amendment ought to find acceptance in the Committee.

Under the Act of 1931 a committee was set up to assist and advise the Minister in the provision of houses in agricultural districts. It was decided, or at any rate it was so understood, to place at the disposal of that committee £2,000,000. That committee has never functioned in the manner intended and I gravely fear that it has been regarded very much as a smoke screen for Departmental inactivity. Since the War and prior to 1931 the number of houses erected in rural districts by local authorities has been about 41,000, out of the total of 700,000 erected by local authorities. About 5 per cent. of the total have been erected in rural districts. Of that percentage the number erected in the agricultural parishes of rural districts has been about 15,000 or rather about 2 per cent. of the total number of houses erected by local authorities all over the country. Of those houses erected in the agricultural parishes only one-third—that is one-third of 15,000 or about two-thirds of 1 per cent. of the total number of houses erected by local authorities in the whole country—are those available for agricultural workers.

It is to remedy that state of affairs that the Amendment is designed. It was recognised during the passage of the Act of 1931 that the dearth of houses in rural districts for agricultural workers was serious and clamant. That dearth had not been met by the ordinary financial facilities previously available considerable though those were, and it seemed to be recognised that, whatever might have been the shortcomings in the past either of Government Departments or local authorities, under the 1931 Act the stigma of apathy was to be removed and facilities made available for housing agricultural workers in the agricultural districts. Under that Measure considerable facilities were provided. A sum of £2,000,000 was placed at the disposal of the Minister and additional powers were conceded to the county councils upon whom the Minister now appears to rely very considerably for assistance. They were given the power to supersede recalcitrant and lethargic rural district councils in cases where it was necessary to do so and further powers were given them by which they could make an additional monetary contribution themselves. Further, there was a committee set up which was supposed to consist of able and practical men who were to have the opportunity of assisting the Minister, but they have never had the opportunity of assisting the Minister in the spirit that was intended when the Act of 1931 passed through this House. I wish for a moment to compare that which was anticipated to be done for the purpose of providing agricultural cottages when the Act of 1931 was passed with what actually has been accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. Member to keep a little more strictly to the Amendment before the Committee. This has nothing to do with the Act of 1931, and we cannot have a disquisition on that Act.

Sir J. WALKER SMITH: I submit to your Ruling, Sir. My argument was directed to showing that that very great need which was established beyond any doubt in 1931, still exists, and I wish to tell the Committee, with your approval, that extremely little, a ridiculously small amount, has been done under that Act, that therefore almost 99 per cent. of that which was recognised as being required in 1931 still requires to be done, and that this Amendment should be passed in order to allow of a little further instalment. It was considered in 1931 that at least 40,000 houses for agricultural parishes should be erected, not in the course of a great number of years, but immediately, as they were required at that very moment. One year was given within which that particular scheme had to be carried out. A matter of 40,000 houses had to be provided by the Ministerial machinery in 1931, and £2,000,000 was placed at the Minister's disposal to effect that purpose. I know there was a fundamental defect in the Act of 1931, in that——

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member may be quite in order in referring to that Act, but he really is not entitled to go at great length into discussion about that Act, which does not come under this Amendment at all.

Sir J. WALKER SMITH: I submit to your Ruling, Sir. What I wished to show ras how extremely little had already een done and what a very large balance emained to be done towards that which ras recognised as essential in 1931. hereby, I wished to show how very ecessary it was that this Amendment hould be passed, in order that there ight be a little more done towards proiding the enormous lag which was shown o clearly in 1931. The net result under hat Act is that there has been provided t the present time the merest dribble f houses. I understand that up to the resent the Minister has approved about 00 houses. That is the way in which his great scheme is flickering out. Forty housand houses were recognised and greed upon all sides to be urgently reuired, and as they were required then, o they are required now, but that numer has gradually dwindled and dwindled, ntil the 7,000 houses for which the rural ouncils applied were reduced to 4,000, nd then, by a stroke of the Ministerial en, they were reduced again to 2,000.

I doubt very much if there has been a single house completed up to the present, though approval has been given for 400 houses; that is to say, 400 houses in 20 months, when it was intended that 40,000 houses should be built in 12 months. My point is that the need remains clamant, that it is such a vital need that ordinary financial assistance was found to be quite impossible, and that therefore special financial facilities were provided. The proposal under the Bill as presented to the Committee today is not only that special facilities should be withdrawn, but that ordinary facilities also should be withdrawn, that no facilities whatever should be available for houses in agricultural parishes, and that the needs of agricultural workers should be left to Providence.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—Sir Victor Warrender and Mr. Womersley.

The following Amendment stood upon the Order Paper:

In page 1, line 13, to leave out the words "seventh day of December, nineteen hundred and thirty-two," and to insert instead thereof the words:

"first day of July, nineteen hundred and thirty-three."—[Mr. McEntee.]

6.0 p.m.

Mr. M. BEAUMONT: On a point of Order. May I submit that this Amendment, inasmuch as it will cause subsidies to be paid which are not intended under the Bill, will create an increased charge?

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN (Captain Bourne): I think that the hon. and gallant Member overlooks the fact that under the existing law the Minister is empowered to grant these subsidies, and that this Amendment would really prolong the period of an existing charge, and would not therefore make a new charge.

6.2 p.m.

Mr. McENTEE: I beg to move, in page 1, line 13, to leave out the words "seventh day of December, nineteen hundred and thirty-two," and to insert instead thereof the words:

"first day of July, nineteen hundred and thirty-three."

The object of this Amendment is to extend the time during which the subsidy will be granted to local authorities which have housing schemes in course of preparation. I think that the Minister was rather harsh in his method of cutting off the subsidy. When local authorities have schemes in preparation they think, and they have a right to think, that they will receive some consideration, and, if they have submitted schemes in some preliminary form, they are entitled to expect, if it is proposed to abolish the subsidy, some consideration for those schemes which they have in hand and on which they have expended a considerable amount of money. The Minister brings in a Bill and says without warning: "I am going to cut off the subsidy right away." That is not the type of thing that local authorities have the right to expect.

Sir H. YOUNG: It may have escaped the hon. Member's attention that I have an Amendment down which deals with this point, namely, in page 1, line 14, at the end, to add the words:

"Provided that if the Minister is satisfied that proposals for providing or promoting the provision of houses under those Acts had been prepared and were substantially ready to be submitted to him before the said seventh day of December, he may, subject to the approval of the Treasury, treat the proposals for the purposes of this Section as if they had been submitted to him before that date."

Mr. McENTEE: It has not escaped my attention. I have read it very carefully and have noticed the word "may." I have always been suspicious of that word in Acts of Parliament. If we say that a local authority "shall" do a thing, we know that it will be done, but, if we say that the local authority "may" do a thing, there is considerable doubt whether it will be done. My experience in these matters is that if a scheme would cost a local authority anything and if it happens to be a reactionary local authority, the word "may" is a means of enabling it to get out of a responsibility that Parliament very often desires it to carry out. I want the Minister to say that where housing schemes have been prepared within a reasonable time, the subsidy shall be paid, and I hope that, having made some concession to us in this matter, the right hon. Gentleman will go a little further and say that the subsidy "shall" be paid. A good deal depends on the officer in the Ministry of Health before whom a scheme comes. I have had experience in dealing with officials in that Department, and I find that all of them are very nice people, but, at the same time, one gets a consideration from some of them that one does not get from others. The question whether a subsidy shall be granted should not depend upon the whim or the will of a particular individual in the Department before whom a scheme happens to come. If the Minister will accept the Amendment and agree that a local authority shall have an extension of six months during which it can get the subsidy for schemes that were in preparation at the time of the introduction of the Bill, he will do something that is fair and that all local authorities and the Committee will appreciate.

6.7 p.m.

Mr. LOGAN: In supporting the Amendment, I wish to call the attention of the Minister to the unfortunate position in which many local authorities will be placed, and I will take Liverpool as a typical example. When the Minister announced his decision that the subsidy would cease on the 7th December, it had no regard to the liabilities which Liverpool and other local authorities were incurring in the housing schemes which were about to be carried out. For months preparatory work has been going on in order to carry out a letter which we received from the Minister in the early part of January last year. That letter pointed out the necessity of housing at a cheap rental being provided in the city. We were able to make some arrangements, but we were not able to go forward with the plans until January of this year. Apart altogether from the political aspect of the question, Liverpool is anxious, as every other great centre is, for facilities to carry out the requirements of the Ministry and the obligations laid on the local authorities to make provision for houses. The Minister's Amendment would not meet our requirements, because it contains a reference to the approval of the Treasury and the word "may," with which I do not agree. I wish to see something more definite inserted in the Bill. Liverpool has already sent to the Minister plans of a scheme involving almost 5,000 houses. The drastic move to stop all subsidies places it and municipalities in every part of the country in an undignified position. All their work goes for nought.

It is remarkable that, while the Ministry of Health laid down this mandate without warning, the Scottish Office sent out a fortnight's warning notice. I know that Scottish Members as a rule want to get the best of everything, but England expects at least the same fair treatment with regard to housing. We hope that the Minister will meet us in regard to the obligations that we have undertaken so that we can have the opportunity of providing the cheap houses which he has asked us to provide. The abolition of the subsidy will make a difference of 4s. a week in the rent. We have bought the land, we have prepared the plans, and we have a demand for the houses, but we shall not be able to meet it without the subsidy because the rents, which would have been 7s. and 6s. 8d. with the subsidy, will be 11s. and 10s. 8d. without. I am not sure what was in the mind of the Minister when he put his Amendment down; I am not sure of my own mind at times; and I would like to see it in black and white in the Bill if it is in his mind to grant the subsidy to local authorities which have got out plans. It is most essential that municipalities should have no further liabilities in regard to the schemes that are already in hand. They are badly hit, particularly in the depressed areas.

I ask the Minister to put aside the question of national economy and to consider the responsibility that rests upon this Committee to see that justice is done to those local authorities which have got out plans for schemes. It is unfair to produce a Bill and say without warning that the Government have nothing to do with the obligations which local authorities have incurred through housing schemes and that it is not their responsibility. The Government have a great responsibility in housing which calls for the particular attention of every hon. Member. I am not seeking this concession in order to gain any party capital. Every Member for Liverpool who does not represent the party to which I belong will be bound to support such an Amendment as this. I am not speaking from the party point of view at all, although the Amendment meets my views as to the responsibility that falls on this House. Therefore, I have great pleasure in supporting this Amendment, and I hope that the Minister will accept it in order to do the right thing by the municipalities of the country.

Sir FRANCIS ACLAND: I wish to say a word or two on this Amendment, although I recognise that the Amendment which is on the Paper in the name of the Minister will, if reasonably administered—and I have no reason to think it will not be—go a considerably way in the direction which the Amendment before us suggests, and may in some ways prove to be a better one, because I can see the inconvenience and difficulty of adopting this present Amendment. The county of Devon, with which I am connected, has been quoted as one in which good work has been done and is being done under the reconditioning Act, and that is true. We hope to get the county council to grant a further sum for additional work to be carried out, because we find that the more we do the more there is to be done. But I do not want it to be understood that because we are working that Act fairly well there is not a very considerable need of new houses which is not touched at all by reconditioning, and still less do I want it to be understood that the demand for new houses can in any way whatever be touched by private building.

In rural districts the operations of uilding societies are really unknown. Vhatever they do in towns, building ocieties are not active in the rural arishes. The people there have never eard of them, and that is a fact. Thereore when we talk of private enterprise n connection with rural houses we mean he private enterprise of the ordinary uilder building rural cottages, which ave to be built in twos or fours. From nquiries I have made I find that taking nto account the cost of land, roads and vater supply, these cannot be built nder £350 a house. To make a reasonble profit the builder will not let such house under 8 per cent. on his outlay; nd after making provision for the cost f repairs, the collection of the rent and he possibility that the house may be mpty, and taking rates into account lso, he will want a rent of 10s. 10d. a veek, which is an absolutely laughable um from the point of view of the people n the villages. As far as I can see, his Bill will stop dead the building of ew houses in rural districts.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I rather hink the right hon. Gentleman is ddressing himself to an Amendment vhich has already been dealt with. We re now concerned simply with the quesion of the date.

Sir F. ACLAND: I bow to your Ruling, nd will only say that I am very glad hat the Minister has had second houghts on his original proposal, and is t any rate willing to consider the quesion of allowing schemes which were subtantially ready at a certain date to go orward. I join also with what has been aid from the benches opposite in hoping hat the word "may" will be really enerously interpreted, and that we shall ot find that a lot of these schemes are nocked on the head when they come orward.

Sir J. SANDEMAN ALLEN: I do not nyself expect the Minister to accept this mendment, because I feel that the real rouble does not arise over the date but ver the stage which the preparations ave reached at the date. There has to e some date, and the same trouble will xist whatever the date may be. I have een very much impressed with the care hich the Minister has given to this matter. Those of us who were present when he spoke on 7th February will agree that he recognised that the terms of the Bill were too cast-iron on the point of the preparations, and he undertook, in consultation with the Committee, to make them a little broader. That is the real issue, and I am only anxious that it should be appreciated when the Minister comes to speak. It is all very well to talk about making a rule for the whole country, but it must be remembered that different parts of the country have different methods. The case of Liverpool has been quoted by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division (Mr. Logan), and though he had something to say about the Scotland Division of which I do not approve, I agree otherwise with what he said. In Liverpool it has not been usual to apply for assistance until an accepted tender has been submitted for approval and there has been a statutory undertaking by the council, but I believe that in Manchester, Birmingham and in other places they follow a different procedure. The real issue is to meet the difficulties arising in practice in the different parts of the country. I do not challenge the policy of the Bill, and we are grateful to the Minister for having made good his promise by the Amendment which he has put down.

Mr. LOGAN: Does the hon. Member say that the Amendment of the Minister will suit Liverpool? I say distinctly that it will not.

Sir J. SANDEMAN ALLEN: The hon. Member interrupted me before I had finished. I would point out that that Amendment has not yet been discussed. I say that I think the Minister realises the difficulty, and he has already promised an Amendment in consultation with the Committee. What he has to consider is the different methods prevailing in different towns rather than any particular date. I do not object to the date.

6.23 p.m.

Sir H. YOUNG: The right hon. Gentleman for North Cornwall (Sir F. Acland) succeeded, in the parlance of the Navy, in "neatly bracketing the target." He spoke about the last Amendment and then about the next Amendment, and I was hoping that his next shot would be on the target itself, but that did not come about. The speech by which this Amendment was supported by the hon. Member for West Walthamstow (Mr. McEntee) and his Seconder showed a complete misconception as to what the result of the Amendment would be. They told us they were under the impression that if it were carried it would exercise some compulsion upon the Minister to accept schemes. Of course, it would have no such effect at all. All that would occur would be that the Minister could make no contribution as subsidy for houses provided after a later date than the one provided in the Bill. It would leave his discretion totally unfettered. There is no intention on the part of the Government to alter the general state of the law regarding the conditions and terms under which these proposals are considered and either accepted or rejected. The only question is where we shall draw the line, and there, again, it appears to me that the Amendment defeats the purpose of its supporters. I have agreed that the date fixed in the Bill cuts the thread too sharply. What we need is reasonable elasticity. This Amendment would not provide that reasonable elasticity, but simply replace one sharp and arbitrary cut by another. It would not enable me as Minister to deal with the matter as I should desire and as I believe the Committee would desire.

[Sir H. Young.]

Mr. LANSBURY: If our Amendment has no effect, how is yours effective?

Sir H. YOUNG: The effect of all three Amendments will be precisely the same as regards any compulsion on the Minister to accept proposals; he will retain the same discretion as the general law gives him. The only question is as to what elasticity there shall be. I suggest that the reasonable way to arrange this is not to insist on an arbitrary date, as the Bill does, and as the Amendment does, but to have regard to the state of development of the plans. I should call that taking account of the practical aspect of the matter. We do not want to encourage a lot of artificially stimulated plans. We want to make sure that if bona fide plans—and I use that word in a wide sense, without any derogatory meaning—are submitted which are in a reasonably advanced state they shall have consideration. That is the practical and elastic method adopted by the Amendment to which I may not refer; but I suggest that the present Amendment will leave us only at as much disadvantage as does the Bill itself.

Mr. HICKS: The reason the Labour party put down an Amendment to extend the period to July, 1933, was that we hoped it would give the Minister time to make effective alternative plans. We very much appreciate the decision of the Minister to go beyond the date of 7th December, and his statement that where plans are in a reasonably advanced and practical shape at that time he is willing to give them sympathetic consideration, but we honestly believe, in view of the "economania" of the National Government, that the interpretation of the promise will not be as wide and as liberal as we should like. If the date were July, 1933, the Minister would have time to make other plans. We do not think that the gap which will be created by the sacrifice of all the machinery, built up over many years, for dealing with the housing problem can be effectively bridged by agreeing to accept plans that may be prepared, or partially prepared, at Christmas or January, or perhaps by the end of this month.

The machinery that was evolved for the purpose of dealing with house building was very effective, and we might say that it was the most effective machinery that has been evolved for that purpose in any part of the world. That machinery was constructed since the War, and all of it is to be dropped. Nothing tangible is to take its place. So far as we are aware, no official pronouncement has been made on the part of the building societies that they are committed to anything. They are not, so far as we are aware, pledged to do anything. Consequently, there will be a definite gap created by sacrificing the whole of the established organisation. We very much regret that the subsidy is to be abandoned altogether. The Ministry would be well advised to accept our proposal to take at least six months in which to move and in which to be able to get something tangible from the building societies, who have not yet made any general declaration.

We cannot lightly regard the sacrificing of the machinery that has been stablished. Over 2,000,000 houses have een built since the War, a most ormidable proposition in housing which as been accomplished as the result of achinery evolved by the Ministry of ealth, through municipal authorities, mployers and organisations set up all ver the country. All that is to be ropped. We are throwing ourselves nto the pool of chance by saying that nder the Bill provision will be made or building societies to advance up to 0 per cent. of the cost, and that the uilders have to fill in the gap between 0 per cent. and 100 per cent.; but there s no guarantee. There has been no fficial announcement, and no one has hallenged the building societies. Every-hing is left to chance, and the Minister hould have the opportunity effectively to repare something to take the place of hat which he is now proposing to bandon. The 1st July is we think the arliest date that should be laid down in his Clause.

Sir HENRY CAUTLEY: I entirely gree with what the Minister has said, ut I would like to ask him why, under his Amendment, he requires the pproval of the Treasury?

Sir H. YOUNG: The hon. and learned ember realises, of course, that the point e is discussing arises upon the next mendment but one.

Sir H. CAUTLEY: I agree, as a matter f order, but if I may be allowed——

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: Perhaps he hon. and learned Gentleman had etter raise the point on the discussion f the Minister's Amendment.

Sir H. CAUTLEY: I understood that e were discussing this question because he Minister had referred to his Amend-ent when dealing with the Amendment hich is now before the Committee. It ould influence the minds of some of us f this matter were clear up. I will be ery brief if I may refer to this matter.

Sir H. YOUNG: Perhaps we might ave a wider discussion to include my mendment. That would save the time f the Committee, and we should not ave to deal with the same points over gain when my Amendment turns up.

Mr. DENMAN: Hon. Members seem to me omitting the Amendment that lies in between the two which they are discussing. In that Amedment there is no reference to the Treasury and no reference to the date. It leaves the matter to the discretion of the Minister.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: If it is the wish of hon. Members, I will take a discussion on the three Amendments, the one now before the Committee, the one in the name of the hon. Member for Ormskirk (Sir S. Rosbotham), and the one in the name of the Minister. If that course is objected to, I will proceed with the Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Ormskirk, and in that case I think we had better discuss the points raised in the Minister's Amendment when we come to it. I am in the hands of the Committee, and I will take any course that is desired.

Mr. DENMAN: It may be found speedier to conduct the business in strict order, and to discuss the Minister's Amendment when it arises.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: It may be the most convenient course if we dispose of the present Amendment and then raise any further points on the Minister's Amendment.

Mr. MORGAN JONES: I would like to point out that we cannot effectively discuss our Amendment alone, because the right hon. Gentleman has suggested that his Amendment is the alternative to ours. It is clearly open to us to argue that our Amendment is a much better way of meeting the point that the right hon. Gentleman meets in his Amendment. It would be therefore much better if we could discuss them together.

Mr. McENTEE: I should very much like to have said a word or two on the Minister's Amendment when I was speaking, but I have felt that I was precluded from doing so because it would have been out of order.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I am in the hands of the Committee, but it seems to me that it will be better on the whole to take all the discussion on this Amendment. If hon. Members object, it is not for me to overrule them.

Mr. C. WILLIAMS: Is it not possible to deal with the dates raised in this Amendment and on the Minister's Amendment, and to leave out entirely the other Amendment which comes in the middle, the subject of which is as to whether the Minister may determine the date? Then we could deal with the point as to whether the Minister should have a discretion in regard to the date. They are two separate propositions.

[Mr. Williams.]

Mr. DENMAN: It seems to be the general will of the Committee to have a general Debate, and I therefore withdraw my objection.

Mr. LANSBURY: I think that we should be able to vote on each Amendment, even if we discussed them together.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: Obviously that must rest with the hon. Member in charge of the Amendment. If that hon. Member desires a vote, he will move for the matter to be decided upon forthwith.

6.38 p.m.

Sir H. CAUTLEY: The principle to be decided and the whole object of the proposal which we are now discussing is, as I understand it, to take care that those local authorities who have gone to the expense and trouble of preparing their plans, and who have got everything almost ready for submission to the Minister by the 7th December, should still be able to obtain the subsidy under the Act that we are altering by this Bill. The question is whether those plans and the steps that have been taken are such as make it fair and just that the authorities should go on under the old Act and should not be subject to the limitations provided by the Bill, which would mean that they have no subsidy. It is not affected by the amount of money which is involved. I suggest to the Minister that it is obviously a question for him and his Department to decide. He is in constant communication with the local authorities. The matter depends, as I read the Bill, on whether the plans under the old Act have been so far prepared and schemes so far adopted that it would be unfair to cut them off short on 7th December and to render all the work that has been done wasted, subject to the provisions of this Bill. I understand that some question has been raised with the Minister by the Corporation of Liverpool, but there is no reason whatever to bring the Treasury in here, because it is a matter that ought to be left to the Minister himself. If the Corporation of Liverpool has the slightest trouble or anxiety because the steps that they have taken have gone to such a point, it is the Minister himself who will have to deal with that situation.

6.41 p.m.

Mr. DENMAN: After the speech of the hon. and learned Member for East Grinstead (Sir H. Cautley) it is advisable that I should bring into the picture the Amendment which stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Ormskirk (Sir S. Rosbotham) and myself and other hon. Members, because that Amendment does precisely what the hon. and learned Member wants. The Amendment is to add at the end of the Clause the words:

"save in such cases as the Minister may determine."

It leaves the Minister as much discretion as he now possesses in the matter of raising money and of approving loans for housing, and it avoids the specific reference to the Treasury to which the hon. and learned Member objects. It is clear that the argument in favour of the principle of our Amendment is accepted in all quarters of the Committee. The idea that the axe should fall suddenly and sharply, to withdraw the subsidy from any house in respect of which proposals had not been submitted by 7th December, is repudiated. There must be elasticity. Submission of a proposal is not a good criterion of whether houses should or should not receive the subsidy. Our Amendment proposes, in a single sentence, the recognition of the fact that these proposals will be in the very last stage of incubation. Some will be nearly coming out, and some will hardly have been put into the incubator. We wish to leave the Minister complete discretion to be able to examine the egg and if it is fertile, and if he sees that it is shortly going to hatch out, we ask him to regard it as a chick.

Sir P. HARRIS: We have heard a very specious speech from the Minister and one that was very persuasive. The Minister almost persuaded the hon. Member for East Woolwich (Mr. Hicks) that if his Amendment were carried it would t make very much difference to that the Minister himself. The hon. Mem- r is too old a bird to be caught with at. He was very nearly caught by it, t before he had finished his speech he d wriggled out of it. The Committee ght to realise this fundamental differ- ce: I want the Acts of Parliament m 1923 to 1924 to operate for another months, whereas the Minister wants bring them to an end and take them the Statute Book for all practical rposes, and to bring in the provisions Clause 2. I agree with the hon. ember for East Woolwich that that is sudden a change. This is a great w experiment which I hope is going be a success. I hope that the build- g societies will function, and that pri- te enterprise will be effective.

Inevitably, new organisations like those oposed in the Bill, and new methods d new ideas cannot come into opera- n right now. It must take at least six nine months. The builders have to get e financial assistance arranged, they ve to buy the land, to lay out the ads, and to make arrangements about werage and so on. Anyone with perience of housing development knows at it is necessary to look a long way ead; that, indeed, is the real problem housing, and it takes time. You can- t turn out houses like sausages out of machine; it means long thought-out ns. Local authorities have now built a complete organisation, with archi- ts, valuers and engineers. They ssess knowledge and information, and n go right on to build houses. This nendment proposes that the old chine should continue operating for months, so as to give time for the w experiment devised by the right hon. ntleman to mature. I am informed at only three building societies have reed to this proposal. The great bulk them are still hesitating on the brink; ey are not yet persuaded; and there is eal danger in an interregnum between e old order and the new. Instead of a eat push in house building such as the nister wants, it may mean, and I think will mean, a complete hold-up, with al authorities stopped, and private ilders and building societies still nking out plans.

I think that the Amendment is a asonable one. Of course, the Minister s always the power to veto any scheme that may be unsound. He has had that power ever since the Act of 1923. We want the machinery of the Acts of 1923 and 1924 to go on for another six months. It may be said, and with some reason, that local authorities would take advantage of this to push forward a great number of schemes and get them through within the next six months. I hope they will, because houses are required. This is a most critical moment as regards unemployment. Money is cheap, materials are cheap, building costs are low, and it would be a great thing if during the next six months the Minister could say to local authorities all over the country: "You have six months more in which to get on with your business, and then you will disappear." I think that this is a sensible Amendment, which would meet a good deal of the opposition of all those good people throughout the country who are terribly depressed and upset at this complete change of policy. I am in favour of the Amendment, and shall certainly vote for it.

Major HILLS: I think I shall be in order now in discussing the Minister's Amendment as well as that which has been moved by the hon. Member opposite. The Minister's Amendment, I apprehend, does two things. It gives to the Minister a discretion to admit for subsidy schemes which were substantially ready to be submitted before the 7th December last, and I take it that the object of that is twofold. It enables the Minister to meet hard cases, and there certainly will be some hard cases—we have heard of them already; and, further, to tide over the transition period between the old system and the new. The Minister may have to bring in more cases under the old system, in order that there may be no gap between the old system ceasing and the new system starting. These are both really valuable powers, and they are given to the Minister by means of a discretion. He may treat these proposals as though they had been submitted before 7th December. But there is a very important qualification—it is to be subject to the approval of the Treasury. I understand the giving of a discretion to the Minister, and I understand a limitation by the Treasury, but I do not quite see how these two are going to work together.

[Major Hills.]

This is a partnership, and I want to know whether the Minister is the predominant partner, or the Treasury. I can conceive of the imposition of a limitation for several different reasons.

The Treasury may say that they will only approve of a certain number of houses—a quite conceivable limitation; or, more probably, the Treasury may say that they will only approve of a certain financial commitment, a certain definite sum. These are important considerations. The Minister's responsibility, however, is wider than that. He has to consider, as I have said, the necessity of easing the transition stage, and he may have to consider the needs of the locality and the necessity for housing in certain places. I should like to know on what terms the Treasury are to approve or disapprove of a scheme. If we have the Minister there, we can tell more or less. We know him, and, if he does not approve, we can ask him why. But the Treasury is an impersonal body, and its consent is given or refused away from the House of Commons. That would mean the putting of a bar upon the Minister's discretion which might not be for the benefit of housing.

We all admit the necessity of economy, but, at the same time, I think the Committee ought to bear in mind the big change that we are making here, and the great importance of seeing that there is no break in the continuity, and also of seeing that special cases are met, and met not entirely upon the financial obligations involved. We all know that certain parts of the country are more distressed than others, that certain parts are more crowded than others; and I should like to see the Minister the judge in such circumstances. I believe that a certain amount of public expenditure is not only justifiable now, but beneficial. I believe that we have passed out of the era of extreme economy and cutting down everything, and that it is being generally recognised that beneficial expenditure, even though it does not produce a complete financial return, is of advantage to the country. I think that for that reason it is extremely important that we should know where we stand in this matter. Are we to be held up entirely upon financial considerations, or is the Minister confident that the great powers of persuasion which he exercises to the full in the House of Commons will be equally effective when exercised on the Treasury?

Mr. MORGAN JONES: I do not feel that the Minister, in the remarks that he addressed to the Committee a few minutes ago, quite did justice to the Amendment moved by my hon. Friend. I think that a very strong case can be made out for the Amendment, and that, on merits, it deserves the support of the Committee to an even greater degree than the suggestion of the Minister himself. The right hon. Gentleman wishes to fix a certain date in December, 1932, as the appointed day, if I may so call it. We wish to fix a date in July, 1933. What are the respective merits of the two dates? I think it is unfair to many local authorities to fix upon December, 1932. A great crisis occurred in this country in 1931, and a great wave of economy spread throughout the land. Great pressure was brought to bear upon local authorities to cut down their activities, and it is fair to assume that, certainly for a long time during 1932, local authorities presumed that it was not very much worth while to discuss plans for building new houses, and probably, therefore, they did not press on with that side of their activities to the degree that they otherwise might. If, therefore, the Minister insists upon fixing the date in December, 1932, it is fair to assume that a comparatively small number of local authorities could argue that their plans were sufficiently advanced to merit the Minister's approval. We suggest, therefore, that, if the date were changed from December, 1932, to July, 1933, it would give to local authorities who would like to be included within this provision a much better chance of being included than if the original date is adhered to.

I recall that in 1929 the then Labour Government desired to encourage local authorities to build a number of schools within a certain period, and their standard was that, so long as the work was contractually undertaken between certain dates, the Treasury was prepared to make an additional credit grant. That may not be possible in this case, but it seems to me that the Minister ought to give a chance to authorities which were prevented by the period of crisis from going ahead with their plans, to get in before the door is finally closed. What the Minister's alternative? His offer plies to cases in which the plans were bstantially ready—I think that those e the words. But what does "subntially ready" mean? It is loose raseology, to say the least. I dare say e Minister will apply it in as fair and st and impartial a way as he can, but, wever just and impartial he may be, will inevitably create a great deal of sappointment, and there may be some kind reflections upon the measure of scretion which he has exercised. If, wever, he fixes a definite date six onths from now, no one will have a ght to complain, because everyone will ow that they must be ready by a cerin date in July, and that, if they are t in "on the ground floor," to use a mmon expression, before then, that will their fault, and they will not be able blame the Minister for it.

I was glad to hear the right hon. and llant Gentleman the Member for Ripon lajor Hills) and the hon. and learned ember for East Grinstead (Sir H. utley) point out that even the Minter is going to be circumscribed under e terms of his own Amendment; he is t to be master in his own house. I n understand that the Government may sire to take control of the amount of oney to be spent, but nowadays we ar too frequently the cry that everying must be subject to the ipse dixit of e Treasury, and the right hon. and llant Gentleman has given expression a growing opinion in the House that e time for economy in cutting down cially desirable work of this sort has me to an end. The dead hand of the easury ought to be removed. If, therere, we can put in our date, large numrs of plans will flow in to the right n. Gentleman. But even if there are ge numbers of plans, he will still have, der the old law, the right to withhold e sanction of any plans which do not et with his approval. There are merits tached to our proposal which the right n. Gentleman has overlooked, and I g him to reconsider our Amendment.

Sir H. YOUNG: It is necessary, when are discussing the third Amendment, at I should add a word regarding the her two Amendments. I do not want repeat the argument on the subject of e Amendment we are voting upon first. That Amendment has the effect that the only people it would help would be those who were artificially stimulated at the last moment, and who pushed their affairs along to get them through. Let me pass to the next Amendment. That Amendment, as far as its practical working and intentions are concerned, is identical with my Amendment. The reason why I ask the Committee not to accept this Amendment is that it is really too vague in its terms. It is a novel experience for a Minister to stand at this Box and protest against too large powers being conferred upon him, but by this Amendment I should be promoting what is not good legislation.

When power is conferred upon a Minister some definition must be given by the Act as to policy, or the circumstances, under which that power is to be exercised. I do not find these requisite directions in this Amendment. These directions are given in the Amendment I propose to the House which sets out, the Committee will remember, that if the Minister is satisfied that proposals for providing, or promoting, the provision of houses under the Acts in question have been prepared, and were substantially ready to be submitted to him before 7th December, he may, subject to the approval of the Treasury, treat the proposals for the purposes of this Section as if they had been submitted to him before that date. The final words would give the Minister the necessary instructions from the House of Commons that he is to give consideration to schemes which "had been prepared and were substantially ready." The right hon. Gentleman who spoke last claimed that these terms were too vague or too wide. The intention is that they should be wide.

I think the Minister should be subject to some direction, but he should have wide discretion as to the acceptance of plans which are prepared and substantially ready, and commend themselves to him on general grounds. I do not hesitate not only to admit, but to claim, that the words are quite wide. The point is that we must put the matter in this form, and not in the more arbitrary form proposed by the other Amendment. This is really doing something to meet the class we want to consider. The other Amendment is arbitrary, and not co-extensive with that class. We want to consider the matter on the merits. I come to the point taken by my hon. and learned Friend and my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ripon (Major Hills). I confess to some surprise at this attracting any comment. The policy which this Committee is asked to approve is that applications, which recommend themselves, shall be accepted and that is a policy which the Minister will be authorised to carry out. I am asked who is to be the predominant partner. I have no hesitation in saying that, with regard to housing policy, the Minister will be the predominant partner and will have the decision as to the applications to be accepted.

It is quite usual to insert these words in Acts of Parliament where a single non-recurrent financial charge is in question. It is put in because the powers granted here—the powers which I deliberately ask—are so wide that if abused by a Minister—one must consider possibilities, not probabilities, in Acts of Parliament—if they were abused by me, or some more fortunate successor, they might confront the Treasury with an embarrassing position. That is always a feature of powers of this sort granted for single non-recurrent transactions. I think it is not only usual but is really wise and sensible, to recognise the presence of the factors which are necessary for decisions, and the financial factor is represented by the Treasury. That is all that the insertion of these words means, and, in the circumstances, I do not think they need cause any undue apprehension to the minds of hon. Members. I think at this juncture the Committee might come to a decision on the Amendment.

7.10 p.m.

Major MILNER: I do not think the Committee will be satisfied with the Minister's further explanations. On every side of the Committee there is opposition to the Minister's Amendment. I do not think that, so far, mention has been made of there being considerable opposition outside the House from a very influential quarter, the Association of Municipal Corporations. Incidentally, the electors of Rotherham have expressed in no uncertain voice their view.

Sir H. YOUNG: Will the hon. and gallant Member allow me to ask him to what expression of opinion of the Association of Municipal Corporations he refers?

Major MILNER: The Association of Municipal Corporations, or the housing committee of that Association, saw the right hon. Gentleman on 2nd February and informed him that they viewed with very grave alarm the suggestion made in the Bill now before the Committee, namely, that the subsidy should be cut out immediately. They pointed out that only 12 months ago the right hon. Gentleman requested members of that Association to do what they could to remove the very serious and urgent need for the provision of small houses. He circularised the municipalities to that effect and now, within 12 months, he is coming along to them again before they are able to tackle the problem. He is now proposing that the subsidy should be cut clean away. So far as they can ascertain, from the great knowledge they possess, they cannot see any possibility, under the proposals now made, of providing houses to let at anything like the present rental, so the problem is to remain unchanged.

Sir H. YOUNG: I do not think the hon. and gallant Member wishes to mislead the Committee, but the opinion of the Association of Municipal Corporations was expressed before my present Amendment was proposed.

Major MILNER: I have not quite finished. I hold in my hand a letter from the Association of Municipal Corporations, dated since the Minister's Amendment was put on the Paper, and they express the hope that I may see my way to object to the present Amendment which is before the Committee. Is the Minister content with what I said, namely, that the Association of Municipal Corporations is, in effect, objecting not only to the original proposals to stop the subsidy, but also to the present proposals?

Sir H. YOUNG: I did not know of the later document which the hon. and gallant Member has, nor has he read it to the Committee. I have no information of the fact that the Association objects to the form of the present Amendment.

Major MILNER: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will do me the justice of believing that I have such a letter in my hand, which I shall be most happy to show him.

HON. MEMBERS: What is the date?

Major MILNER: The 25th February. It is a letter which I received this morning, and I have no doubt that my hon. Friend on the Front Bench, who is a vice-president of the association, also received one.

Mr. WOMERSLEY (Lord of the Treasury): Why do you not read the letter out?

Major MILNER: Why do you not bring your copy out and hand it to the Minister? The position is that the influential body, to which I have referred, not only take exception to the right hon. Gentleman's first proposals, but have stated that in their view—I will not put it quite so strongly as to say the right hon. Gentleman has not quite played the game. But he did request them to provide certain further houses, and then he comes forward with this proposal, which was, at first, to stop this subsidy altogether. He now comes forward with a further proposal in which the matter is left entirely to his discretion, subject to the approval of the Treasury. What can the object of that be? The inclusion of these words means something. I think it is a decision, by the use of these words, to limit the consideration of proposals which municipalities might put forward now. In these circumstances, I do not think the Committee should, without some more definite assurance from the right hon. Gentleman, pass this Amendment.

I hope the Committee will approve of the Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend which suggests that a date should be fixed in July, 1933. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Health, and the Parliamentary Secretary, that on 15th December the Parliamentary Secretary said that, in this matter, obviously some date had to be fixed. The Parliamentary Secretary added on that occasion that when we came to the Committee stage we would see whether a date could not be fixed in order to include genuine applications and exclude spurious ones. It was not then suggested that the matter should be one for the discretion of the right hon. Gentleman, either with or without the approval of the Treasury. It was in pursuance of that statement, made I am sure with the approval, if not in the actual presence of, the Minister, that my hon. Friends put down their proposal in which they inserted a date, and a very reasonable date, not six months ahead. It is going to take quite a considerable time to prepare the necessary technical work to enable the local authorities to go on with their building.

It has been said that only three building societies have indicated their intention of participating in the scheme. In the very nature of things, they are only likely to invest their surplus funds in schemes under this Bill. If they can lend funds to their occupiers or in other directions at 5¼ per cent., they are not likely to lend under the Government scheme, though, no doubt, they will do what they can to assist as far as their surplus funds are concerned. I hope the Committee, in view of the statement of the Parliamentary Secretary on 15th December, will pass the Amendment, and will pay due regard to the views of such an important body as the Association of Municipal Corporations in taking exception to the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment, because it is clearly directed to limiting the number of proposals that are likely to be considered by him.

Mr. ATKINSON: I cannot understand anyone raising any objection to the Minister's Amendment, and I do not want to say anything about that, but the earlier Amendments deserve a little more sympathetic consideration, particularly the second one, which I prefer. I think it will take quite a considerable time to get the scheme of Clause 2 in operation. I find that local builders are very averse from building to let. They understand that it implies some restriction on their right to sell for some unknown period. They are busy building for the purpose of selling, and they tell me they are terrified at the cost of road making. They say it is too expensive to buy land for building small houses on roads that are already made and, if the roads are not made, the local authority can come along at any moment and make them in an expensive way. They say that as long as that burden has to be faced there will be, in their view, an insuperable barrier to very much use being made of Clause 2 by local builders. It seems to me that more time than is contemplated will be wanted to get that Clause into operation. The builders will have to be got together, to be brought in touch with the building societies and to meet the chairman of the building committee of local authorities to indicate the sort of programme the local authorities would have undertaken if they had the power, and every inducement will have to be brought to bear upon them to put the scheme into operation. I cannot help feeling that there ought to be some discretion with the Minister far beyond that in his own Amendment, giving him power, without limitation as to date, to approve schemes under the old system where he finds that builders cannot be induced to put Clause 2 in operation.

Amendment made: In page 1, line 14, at the end, add the words:

" Provided that if the Minister is satisfied that proposals for providing or promoting the provision of houses under those Acts had been prepared and were substantially ready to be submitted to him before the said seventh day of December, he may, subject to the approval of the Treasury, treat the proposals for the purposes of this Section as if they had been submitted to him before that date."—[Sir H. Young.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, " That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

7.32 p.m.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN: Before we part with the Clause there are one or two comments I wish to make. The Clause leaves us with an entirely new situation in regard to the housing of the working classes. The housing of the working classes has now, with the exception to which I will refer in a moment, become a question almost entirely for private enterprise. The Minister, both on the Second Reading Debate and in the Debate on the Financial Resolution, seemed to be pretty confident that the new situation which the Bill would create would be one in which private enterprise would be able adequately and cheaply to meet the needs of the working classes for houses. His refusal to accept the Amendment which we had put upon the Paper to continue subsidies in connection with rural housing led him to make a statement with regard to the policy of the Government on that particular matter. He told the Committee that the Government are now prepared to leave the matter entirely to the housing (Rural Workers) Act, and to what can be done for rural housing under the Act of 1930.

The right hon. Gentleman used two rather curious arguments in this connection. The argument he used about declining populations in the countryside was a very curious one to come from one of the leading Ministers of the National Government. I should have thought that the policy of the Government ought to have been a co-ordinated policy in all spheres of Government activity. I should have thought that the housing policy, either for urban housing or rural housing, would have fitted in with the general policy of the Government in regard to trade, industry and agriculture.

We have been told that the policy which is being pursued by the Government in regard to agriculture will bring us an agricultural revival and that it will mean that more people will be settled in the countryside. It seems, at any rate, that the Minister of Health and the Department which deals with the question of housing have very little faith in the general policy of His Majesty's Government in connection with agriculture, because the Minister of Health this afternoon, in refusing an Amendment to Clause 1 which would have continued the subsidy to houses erected in agricultural parishes, stressed the fact, that apparently in his view there would be less need for houses in the countryside owing to declining population.

He went on to use another argument, saying that houses built in rural areas by means of subsidies were not houses which agricultural labourers could afford to occupy. That argument was very effectively demolished by the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Johnstone), and I do not propose to say any more about it. Obviously, the cessation of subsidies, particularly in connection with rural housing, leaves the agricultural labourer and the rural worker generally in a position in which they are not likely to have, in any future which I can visualise, any improvement in their housing conditions. I cannot for a single moment see the likelihood of private enterprise coming along and erecting houses in the countryside at rents which agricultural labourers and rural workers will be able to pay. The hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. M. Beaumont), in the course of the discussion this afternoon, said that the difference between us was primary, that he and those hon. Members who thought as he did believed that the question of housing the working classes was a matter for private enterprise, while we who occupy these benches thought that it was a social obligation—he did not actually use the words "social obligation"—on the part of the country, if the thing was not being done satisfactorily in other ways, to see to it that people who lived, not only in the countryside, but in the towns and the cities, were properly and adequately housed.

Mr. M. BEAUMONT: I know that the hon. Member does not wish to misrepresent me, but what I actually said wa that we believed that it was primarily matter for private enterprise only to b assisted when necessary by the State and that admits the social obligation o the public as a whole. But we sugges that it is better carried out by privat enterprise than by the State, and that i where we differ.

Mr. BROWN: The only thing I wish t say on the further explanation which th hon. Member has given, and which entirely accept, is that we on these benches do not think that the condition are such that the houses, which, as everybody agrees, are urgently needed, ar likely to be provided by private enterprise, and because we do not think tha that situation exists we strenuously oppose the proposals put before us in thi particular Clause. That is why I am making these comments before the Committee finally pass from the Clause. Obviously, only the future can decide the issue between us, but there is nothing ir past experience, as far as housing in this country is concerned, which leads us tc believe that private enterprise will ever adequately and decently house the workers in the countryside. There is nothing in past experience which leads us to that conclusion. If by some miracle a complete change takes place and private enterprise provides the dwellings which are necessary in rural England, the hon. Member will, I suppose, at some future date, have an opportunity of chastising us for the attitude which we are taking up on this occasion. But if, on the other hand, private enterprise fails to fulfil what many hon. Members opposite are obviously expecting it to fulfil in the distant future, the emphasis we put this afternoon upon the question of the social obligation upon the community to attend to the matter if no one else does, will amply be justified by the events as we see them in the days that lie ahead.

The hon. Member for Torquay (Mr. C. Williams), in opposing one of the Amendments to the Clause, said that he hoped the Minister would resist the Amendment, because he saw in it some kind of Socialist action designed to undermine entirely the attitude which His Majesty's Government are now taking up in regard to the question of housing. He went on to argue, particularly in connection with the countryside, that if there came a general restoration of prosperity, which is something, I presume, at which His Majesty's Government are aiming in their general policy, then, in some mysterious fashion, out of that general prosperity you would get the provision of the houses which the working-classes in rural England need so badly. In other words, he was saying that if the farmer and the tradesmen prosper, and generally prosperous conditions come about, then houses will be provided. That is the sort of argument he used, and, when you listen to arguments like that, you cannot help but remember that that has not happened in the past. There have been many prosperous periods in British history and many periods when business has been thriving and farmers and all kinds of undertakings have been doing well, but in such circumstances were the working-classes of this country housed under satisfactory conditions? If under prosperous conditions in the past that had actually happened, we should have had very little complaint to bring before the Committee to-day. It does not seem to us who sit on these Benches that when you have, by passing this Clause, abolished subsidies in connection with the provision of houses for the working-classes, except in the case of the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, where there is slight assistance, and in the case of the Act of 1930, you are likely to produce conditions which will effectively and definitely house the working-classes, and consequently we shall have no option on this occasion but, both by word and vote, to oppose this Clause.

Mr. TINKER: I wish to support what has been said by my hon. Friend against Clause 1. It is the crux of the whole Bill and takes away all subsidies with the exception of the slum clearance subsidy. I have spoken to a good many of my friends who know more about housing than I do and are concerned with municipalities and have spent a good deal of time in endeavouring to provide for the needs of the working-classes. They looked forward to continuing providing that kind of house, but to their consternation they now find that the National Government, which I term the Tory Government, are reverting to their long established ideas of private enterprise. Behind this Bill lies the establishment once more of private enterprise. With the knowledge that those people have had of private enterprise in the building of houses and what it has meant, they feel that no good can come from the Government's proposal. For a long time private enterprise has failed to provide adequate housing accommodation for the people and because it failed, the Government had to step in and try to do something. The people of my class, realise what it means. The class to which I belong have had the sad experience of not being able to get houses. Those of us who have been able to get houses have not been able to forget what has happened to our poor brethren who have not been able to get housing accommodation. Constant appeals have been made to us to assist them to get houses, and finally the Government had to give way to pressure and to grant subsidies.

The housing needs are not being satisfied. Wherever one goes there is a shortage of houses, and it is because of that fact that we are so keenly anxious that the House of Commons should not attempt to stop building by means of subsidies. If the Government do stop the subsidies, we believe that we shall go back to the position that existed when subsidies had to be given originally. The Minister of Health and the Parliamentary Secretary say that private enterprise can meet the needs. Candidly, I do not think it can, and it is because of that fear that we are so much opposed to the Bill. Because of our knowledge of what has taken place in the past, we hope that the House of Commons will not place the country in the power of private enterprise once more. If they do, it will mean once again a fight for houses. The owners of houses will be able to extort from the people more than they ought to pay, and they will do that by various means. Because of the tragedy of the shortage of houses I do hope that we shall be able to prevail upon the Government not to trust themselves to private enterprise again.

If at any time later they can satisfy me or any of my friends that the housing shortage has been met and that times have become normal, we might agree with them, but wherever one goes, or to whatever public body one speaks, one hears of the prevailing shortage. I have here a cutting from a newspaper of a conference on housing which was held at Manchester in January of this year, by the Industrial and Social Order Council of the Society of Friends. That conference passed the following minute:

> "In view of the very acute problem of overcrowding and the serious housing shortage, we believe that it would be a disastrous step to abolish all ordinary municipal housing development and to leave it to the uncertainty of private enterprise to meet this great need, which might so easily be exploited for private profit."

It is because of the fear of what might happen that we are opposing Clause 1. If we can defeat Clause 1, we shall be well satisfied with our work to-night. Looking at the House at the present moment it is hardly fair that there should be recorded in the Division Lobby, when the vote is taken, probably the names of 300 Members against us, although there are not more than 50 Members in the House. I do not think it is right that hon. Members should crowd into the Lobby to support the Government unless they fully realise what the trend of the discussion has been. It may be that we can put forward nothing fresh in our arguments and that we are saying what has been said before, but it is not fair to the House of Commons that on an important matter like this the House should not be crowded by hon. Members listening to the discussion on the merits of the case.

Sir SAMUEL CHAPMAN: Will the hon. Member count how many there are on his own side? You are seven, I think.

Mr. TINKER: Yes. Probably the hon. Member has a right to point to my side, but may I say that these benches have been fairly full this afternoon and that my hon. Friends have to go out to procure some refreshment to stimulate them to carry on the Debate? We have to go in relays, because there is only a mere handful of us.

Sir S. CHAPMAN: Our friends have to do that, also.

Mr. TINKER: The hon. Member's friends are more numerous than we are. Surely, they could provide more representatives here in order to keep things going. We are certainly entitled to a better assembly than we get on these occasions. It really gives the spectators the idea that we pay little attention to the business of the House of Commons. This is a matter of great importance to the working classes, and I hope that we shall be able to persuade the Committee not to pass Clause 1.

Major PROCTER: One would have more regard for the sincerity of the Labour Opposition in regard to the question of subsidising houses if they would help in the matter of restricting somewhat the lines of demarcation which exist in the various trades concerned in the building of houses. When municipalities or Governments engage in the building of houses for the working classes it would appear as if those who are engaged in the building industry, both masters and men, regard the municipality or the Government as a milch cow from which they can extract everything possible for the benefit of profit on the one hand and the highest trade union rates of pay and conditions on the other. If Labour were sincere in this matter of houses it would be easy to do something useful by reducing the harshness, the fine lines which are drawn between one trade union and another. It was my lot at one time to live in a municipal house that was built under the grandiose scheme of Dr. Addison. It was supposed to be a working-class house, and it cost £1,200 to erect. When I got into that house the gas was not on. When the gas was turned on, it was found that the workmen had nailed the skirting board and the picture rails to the gas pipes, with the result that something had to be done about it. I went to the foreman on this large municipal scheme, and he said: "That is quite right. I will send the plumber round, right away." The plumber came and knocked off the picture rail and the skirting board, and wiped the joints. He left the picture rail on the floor. I said to him: "What about this wood?" He replied: "Oh, I cannot touch that. That is a joiner's work." Next day a joiner and his boy came along and they put up the picture rail and the skirting board again. I then said: "The backyard gate is an inch too long and will not shut." The joiner replied: "Oh, I cannot touch that. It is an outside joiner's job." I found when I talked to the men that they were only allowed to place so much wallpaper per day. I have respect for trade unions. In fact, I am a member of one myself. [HON.

MEMBERS: "Oh."] Why should I not be? I served my apprenticeship as an engineer.

Mr. C. BROWN: Will the hon. Member tell me if a barrister would do a solicitor's job?

Major PROCTER: I am not arguing that point, but if barristers and solicitors claimed to be the friends of the working classes and refused to do what I am asking trade unionists to do, the hon. Member would have some cause for blame. Barristers and solicitors do not talk with tears in their voices of their interest in the working classes, and at the same time refuse to do things necessary for their best interests. In regard to the building of houses for the working classes by private enterprise, without a subsidy, I believe that we shall have something of the variety in the building of houses which we see at Port Sunlight. When subsidised houses are built by a municipality or under a Government, the Government or the municipality can only think in the terms of the mass. When Governments think of clothing, for instance, they think of it in terms of uniform, and when municipalities or Governments think of houses you have houses that are fit for jockeys to live in, all built to a standard type and subject to certain regulations. The subsidised houses built by municipalities will be slums 20 or 30 years from now. I hope that, at least, those Labour Members who are leaders of trades unions will be sincere in their utterances and will get the workers not to exploit the workers who want houses, and that they will endeavour as far as possible to assist in the building of houses that are worth while for the working classes of this country. In so far as rural areas are concerned, seeing that sooner or later we shall have people being settled on the land, cultivating a few acres and thereby providing a solution for one part of the unemployment problem, the Government might consider putting up in those wide open spaces houses built of wood, so that when a man gets on a little and makes his holding pay, the house might be replaced with a more permanent structure, and the portable wooden building might be moved to some other place.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: I do not think that the Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part," involves the whole question of Government building policy. We are limited to the question as to whether or not subsidies are to stop.

Major PROCTER: I hope that private enterprise may regard this matter in the light in which I have put it and that we may have, as I believe we shall have under this scheme, a great deal of property being erected, so that the working classes, people looking for homes, may find homes which are worthy of them and at a rent they can pay.

8.0 p.m.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I am tempted to follow the hon. and gallant Member for Accrington (Major Procter) in his attack on trade unions. If there is one section of the community which has a grumble against the Government under this Clause it is the employers and workmen in the building industry. In 1924 the Labour Government made an attempt to face the problem of housing as it existed at that time. There was a tremendous scarcity of houses, a shortage in building trade labour, and it was said that the industry was not organising itself. An appeal was made to all the parties concerned to try and get on with the provision of houses, and in response to that appeal the four parties concerned, the State, local authorities, the employers and the workmen, came to an agreement with the then Minister of Health to carry on for a period of 15 years. The building trade workers were given to understand that if they would lessen their restrictions the agreement would be made. In those circumstances the building trade agreed to lessen their restrictions. The number of boys allowed to become apprentices was increased and in addition men who had not properly served their time were allowed to rank as properly qualified masons.

The employers also have a grumble, because they planned their capital development on a 15-year agreement. To the credit of the building trade it must be pointed out that they produced houses under this scheme at a faster rate than ever before. Yesterday we heard a great deal about the sanctity of agreements, and the need for agreements being kept. This agreement is just as sacred as any agreement made with a foreign power, yet this Clause scraps the agreement and sets aside both employers and workmen alike. The Secretary of State for the Dominions is always telling us about the sanctity of agreements and taxes the Irish Free State with breaking an agreement; yet this Government proposes to cancel an agreement they have made. The building trade will probably learn by their experience. They have been shockingly treated by the Government, and no one can blame them if they safeguard their livelihood. But for a barrister to talk about the line of demarcation between workmen and to utter cheap sneers upon them is the limit of bad taste.

Major PROCTER: I made no aspersion on the workmen, but I did question the sincerity of Labour Members who speak on behalf of the working classes and yet refuse to do something which will help the working classes to get houses at a rent which they can afford.

Mr. BUCHANAN: The building trade, which has now an ample supply of labour, can provide the houses required three times over. There might be something in the hon. and gallant Member's case if the building trade could not supply the houses required, if their restrictions were keeping back house building, but the facts are all against the hon. and gallant Member. The building trade can supply the houses required if allowed to do so. The hon. and gallant Member draws a line between one trade and another, but he says that there must be no line of demarcation between lawyers and barristers. He must remember that a man who serves his time at a trade, say for five years, invests his livelihood in that trade and is not likely to throw up his whole livelihood because the hon. and gallant Member makes sneering remarks about how he does his work in the nailing up of some picture. Sneering and offensive remarks can be made about Members of Parliament. Any cheapjack comedian can make offensive remarks about politicians; and I say that members of the building trade do their work with credit to themselves and as craftsmen and compared with any other body of men either here or abroad. If they make a mistake in nailing up something it is only human after all. Their mistakes will not compare with the mistakes which this Government will make before their job is finished. I am tired of all this. I once knew a joiner who went to repair some property, and whilst doing the work was told by another man how he should do the job. When he asked the other man what he was and was informed that he was a billposter he said, "I cannot stand this. I cannot be told what to do by a man who is a billposter." And when the hon. and gallant Member tells working men how to do their job it is about the limit.

Major PROCTER: The hon. Member forgets that I, being an engineer, am entitled to do so; I could have done the job myself.

Mr. BUCHANAN: We have your assertion; but some of them will have sneering remarks to make as to how you do your job as a politician just as you have made sneering remarks as to how a plumber does his job. I have lived in an Addison house, and they have a lot of faults. They were built in very difficult times, when the industry was not organised and when men were coming back from the War after two and three years in the Army. These men were credited with the years they had served in the Army and were admitted as full tradesmen, because it was thought that they should not be penalised through having fought in the War; and the hon. and gallant Member sees fit to make sneering remarks. The Addison scheme left a lot to be desired, but it was a genuine attempt to build houses at a time when the country needed them, and I would sooner have the millions of pounds wasted in that way as perhaps some of that money was wasted, than the millions which were wasted in warfare in Russia and elsewhere.

I look upon this Clause as the violation of a treaty made between various parties to build houses over a period of 15 years, with a guarantee of a £9 subsidy. The value of such a subsidy was never greater than it is now. In 1924 the cost of houses was much higher, money was dear. Money is now, comparatively speaking, much cheaper, and costs are falling. A £9 subsidy which could not bring the houses down to a working-class level in 1924 would do so now, and now, when it is of the greatest value in the erection of houses, it is proposed to take it away. This is not the time for such a policy; we must keep the subsidy because houses should be built in greater numbers now than ever before. No one who really considers the housing conditions of the country, urban or rural, can do so with any satisfaction. It is said that private enterprise can build the houses required. Private enterprise will only build when it can see a profit on the capital invested, and no one can argue that the building of working-class houses has yet reached a profit-making basis. The great bulk of the people who require them, the mass of the working population, are those whose wages are falling, who are working on short time and who are insecure in their employment. They cannot meet the rents which it will be necessary to charge if private enterprise is to make a profit. It is wrong to take the subsidy away at this moment and I hope the Committee will vote for it to remain.

8.15 p.m.

Mr. COCKS: The hon. and learned and gallant Member for Accrington (Major Procter) has seen fit to come down to this House and level a charge of insincerity against the Labour party on the question of housing. I do not question the sincerity of the hon. and learned and gallant Member for Accrington, but I do question his authority to speak on this question of housing. I should have thought that after his wide experience with the Black-and-Tans in Ireland he was a greater authority on burning down houses than on constructing them.

Major PROCTER: I hope the hon. Gentleman is not inferring that I was a Black-and-Tan.

Mr. COCKS: I was referring to the hon. Member's experience in Ireland in connection with the Black-and-Tans.

Major PROCTER: I was an officer in His Majesty's regular Army and not a Black-and-Tan.

Mr. COCKS: Anyone who served in Ireland during that terrible time must have a far better knowledge of burning down houses than of constructing them. I think that the hon. and gallant Member when he has been a little longer in this House will know better than to come here and charge his fellow Members with being insincere without, as far as I could see, any knowledge of the subject on which he was talking. As far as this Clause is concerned, there is less to be said for it than for any other part of the Government's policy. The Government's general policy seems to be the policy of doing nothing. Here they are going backward and causing people to be thrown out of work by withdrawing the subsidy for municipal housing. Therefore this is a Clause which deserves even greater condemnation than the general policy of the Government is receiving, not only in this House but throughout the country, at Rotherham and places of that kind where by-elections occur. My hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. C. Brown) made a very interesting speech as to the effect of this Clause upon rural housing. That is a very important subject. At least 20 years ago a Royal Commission reported that there was a shortage of 200,000 cottages in the rural districts, and very little has been done since then to meet that shortage. Two years ago my friend Sir Tudor Walters had a scheme for building a large number of cottages in the country.

Mr. BUCHANAN: He and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Health were then in the same group of the Liberal party.

Mr. COCKS: I do not know the extent of the intimacy between the Parliamentary Secretary and Sir Tudor Walters, but the facts I have stated are not in dispute. We have a great shortage of cottages in the country districts. Many of the existing cottages are very old. They may be very picturesque. Visitors from overseas admire them, with their honeysuckle round the door and all the rest of it, but these visitors would not like to live in the cottages. The sanitary conditions are very bad, there is often no water supply, and although the people are living in ideal surroundings, as far as the natural beauties of the countryside are concerned, they cannot be expected to be very healthy. So we find that in the villages, phthisis, rheumatism and all sorts of illnesses are extremely common. We have only to read the reports of medical officers of health on the condition and health of the children and people in the country villages to realise the importance of providing them with better accommodation. Apart from that, although the rural population is declining, there are workers who have no cottages to live in when they grow up and wish to get married.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Why should they wish for such a luxury?

Mr. COCKS: My hon. Friend thinks it is a luxury. It is one of the luxuries that he enjoys.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Rather expensive for me, anyhow.

Mr. COCKS: No, I think the hon. Member would be far worse off if he had not got that particular luxury. One result of the shortage of cottages is that the population of the countryside is coming into our towns and increasing the army of unemployed there. There is another effect to be borne in mind. Farm labourers often have to live miles away from their work, to which they have to cycle or walk in all sorts of weather. The children, too, live too far from their schools. Here public expenditure is involved, for the Government have to erect schools in widely scattered districts for a few children, whereas if the children were concentrated in the villages the expenditure on education would be less. Owing to the shortage of cottages we have also the terrible position of the people who live in tied cottages. We know that tyranny exists. Decent English people are sometimes afraid to express their views on politics or religion because they are afraid of being turned out of tied cottages, and they have nowhere else to go. The unemployed man in a town is a comparatively free man, for if there is another opportunity of getting work he can take it, but in the country very often if a man is thrown out of his employment he is thrown out of his cottage at the same time. The withdrawing of the subsidy is perpetuating conditions such as these.

Then there is the urban problem. Hon. Members opposite have only to read the "Daily Herald" every day to find some very vivid descriptions of the disgraceful state of the slum population in our great cities. I challenge anyone to read those articles and not say that slum clearance is one of the greatest tasks the Government can undertake at the moment. They should blow up the slums and rebuild them. Overcrowding conditions, we all know, are terrible. The families living in one room make a total of 500,000 people, and about 5,000,000 people are living in crowded conditions. Yet we have unemployment growing every day, builders out of work, and plenty of money available, in spite of the stranglehold that the Bank seems to have on the Government. In this matter the position of the Government in the presence of the Bank of England is like that of a frightened rabbit in the presence of a stoat. The Government seem to want to prove that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right when he said that there would be no decrease in unemployment for 10 years.

The Government are taking away the subsidy from municipal authorities, and preventing those authorities from carrying on the rebuilding of houses in our towns. One of the things which I cannot understand is that a highly intelligent man like the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Health, sitting there with a highly intellectual party behind him, cannot see these things, or, that, if he sees them, he does not say: "This must be done, or, if it is not done, I will get out of the Government." It has been admitted by the Minister of Health that, whatever else he may say about this policy, it will not succeed in erecting houses which can be let at the lowest rents to the poorest of the people. The Minister has said that under this scheme the building societies cannot build the very cheapest houses.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is now going past the Clause with which we are dealing. We have not yet reached Clause 2 of the Bill.

Mr. COCKS: I will reserve my remarks on that point for Clause 2. What is really wanted to-day is a great national policy for rebuilding our towns and cities through the medium of municipal and other local authorities. This Clause strikes against such a policy. A policy of that kind would reduce unemployment, would improve the health of the people, and would bring about economy even from the point of view of the Treasury. But the Government are facing against that policy, and that is one of the reasons why the Labour party are unanimously opposed to this Clause.

Mr. LOGAN: It may be that some Members of the Committee are very anxious to get this business out of the way, but we are anxious to have business done properly and to have a full expression of opinion on the Clause before us. Certain hon. and learned Gentlemen who are accustomed to sit in the courts may be anxious to get rid of business of this kind in the House of Commons, but in their own particular class of work they are not so expeditious and they should allow a little latitude to Members of this Committee who desire that full consideration should be given to a Clause of this importance. We, who come from working-class districts and who represent the people, more especially those of us who have served on housing committees, have a right to express our opinions even to a Minister of the Crown in charge of a Housing Bill. We may at times criticise the Minister from a political point of view, but I am anxious to approach this matter, not from a political point of view, but from the point of view of impressing upon a Minister in the National Government the necessity of giving some consideration to those people in our cities who are directly interested in the housing question.

The subsidy has been a Godsend to the depressed areas of this country. Under the subsidy system, it was found practicable by housing authorities to carry out their obligations and to give, in some measure, decent homes and the amenities necessary for the moral life of the people. When, in this year of 1933 a Minister of the Crown at short notice announces that he is going to end that system, and that he is not prepared to accept conditions whereby we think justice might be done, we are justified in raising our voices in protest and pointing out the difficulties of the situation. In Liverpool, irrespective of parties, we have had to house about 13,000 people. We have done so, and we have been very thankful to previous Governments who enabled us to fulfil that great obligation.

If hon. Members treat their responsibilities so lightly as to be absent from this Committee when a discussion on housing is in progress, and only attend here when high finance is being considered, that is a matter for their constituents. But I am concerned with the problem of those who have to live nine or ten in a room, who have to live in cellars and garrets under conditions described by medical officers as demoralising. As a member of the housing committee in Liverpool I am surprised at hon. Members for that city not being in their places to-night. They ought to be here, because they have been asked to support our point of view as against that of the Minister. There is an obligation on every Member of this Committee to take part in dealing with the grave subject of housing in our cities. The question of the subsidy is one of the vital factors in the depressed areas. The proposals of the Government are going to increase the rates and place tradesmen in a difficult position, and, what is more important, in the words of the Minister himself, they are not going to provide cheap houses for our people.

The Minister approaches this matter from the point of view of financial economy. He is out to protect the interests of the Treasury and that being so, liberal time ought to be given to the local authorities in order that they may face their obligations and meet the difficulties of the housing situation. After 10 years on a local council I know of no problem in which hon. Members ought to be more interested than this. We speak to the people about better homes and improved housing conditions, but when we come here to this Committee we find an Amendment which merely seeks to give the local authorities time to get through their responsibilities, thrown on one side. We find a Minister stern, autocratic, despotic, out to protect the interests of the Treasury. He asks for power to carry on; he says that he is not going to have any datum limit. He admits that a datum limit might in certain circumstances, be necessary, but he says that in exceptional circumstances he will be pleased to deal with exceptional cases. Whatever merit there may be in that kind of statement, we want more than that. We want the statement implemented in a Bill, and, when we are confronted with the kind of legislation which is before us, every Member who professes to look after the interests of the people ought to protest against it. We have 5,000 people in Liverpool waiting for homes, and there are hundreds of thousands up and down the country. Surely no Minister of Health in those conditions can find fault with one who raises this question from the point of view of unemployment and housing conditions. If there is a forum in which such a voice should be heard, surely it is the British House of Commons.

I come here not to find fault with the Minister, but to demand whether it is not possible for us to provide homes for people who want them so badly. What do we find in this Clause? We find that the Government propose to withdraw the subsidy, representing the equivalent of 4s. a week on the rent of three roomed non-parlour houses over a period of 40 years. That will not give to the poor, to the unemployed, to the destitute cheap houses in which to live. I contend that no nation can be grand or good or can avoid the spread of Communism unless it has proper housing conditions. I live in an overcrowded area, in which every street cries out for the retention of the subsidy, to enable the municipality to deal in a proper and generous manner with those who are unable to afford decent housing accommodation. I come here only to express the voice of the people who sent me here, in whose district I live. The Parliamentary Secretary visited the City of Liverpool, and he knows that the housing conditions there are terrible. Dante's "Inferno" is nothing in comparison with the miserable hovels there, which should have gone 50 or 60 years ago; and we are unable to remodel our city because of the price of land.

The Government, in taking this drastic step of depriving us of the subsidy, have practically taken the life of the people of the City, and I trust that whatever may be in the mind of the Minister, and whatever he may mean by his word "may," there will be some elasticity offered to us, at least in regard to our scheme, which is only a few weeks late in coming forward, which is bona fide, and which gives us on the outer area of the City an opportunity to take advantage of a subsidy, if the right hon. Gentleman can find in this Measure some method by which to enable us to complete what is essential, namely, at least 5,000 houses. I have spoken from my heart, and I trust that the Minister will believe that it is not a case of empty vapourings from this bench, but an honest and sincere desire on our part that our people shall be able to get the benefit of that word "may," which the Minister himself says gives him elasticity. I have spoken against this Clause only in order to put forward the point of view of Liverpool in the unhappy position in which that City finds itself in regard to housing.

8.38 p.m.

Mr. McENTEE: I do not apologise to those who appear to think that this is a matter that ought to be passed over very lightly and who want to get on to some other matter, which apparently they think more important. I have often been struck with the things that attract Members into this House and the things that apparently empty the House and bore Members, particularly those representing agricultural constituencies. One would imagine that if there was anything, outside the question of unemployment, that should interest Members of the House generally, and fill the House for a real, live discussion, it would be the question of the housing conditions under which the people live, but all the time that I have been here, both in this Parliament and in others, I have been struck with the fact that when housing is under discussion the House is practically empty, yet when elections are on, housing forms perhaps the main plank in the election addresses of most of those who address the voters. Apparently what interests hon. Members most——

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. Member come to the Clause under discussion?

Mr. McENTEE: With all humility, I submit that I am discussing the Clause, which deals with the housing conditions of the people and the taking away of the subsidy, which has been in existence for a number of years. The effect of taking away the subsidy will be to make the housing conditions almost impossible in most districts in this country. I submit that this Clause will do several things. In the first place, and perhaps the most important of all, it will definitely increase the rents of people who obtain houses under the new conditions. I think I am not far wrong when I say that the £7 10s. subsidy is worth about 2s. 1d. a week on the rent of the tenant, and that the £11 subsidy for rural housing is worth perhaps 1s. 4d. more, or, say, 3s. 6d. or 3s. 8d. a week. I cannot see that there is any alternative to this Clause meaning that, even if the houses are built in large numbers—as the Minister appears to think will be the case, though I do not agree—the houses that are now let at 12s. in urban areas will cost 14s. or 14s. 3d. under the new conditions. That will be a very serious matter for the people in my constituency and in other constituencies.

In Walthamstow we have a waiting list of something like 3,800 people, in spite of the fact that we have built 1,300 to 1,400 houses—I do not remember the exact number—and we are particularly anxious to see that those people get a reasonably good habitation. We are very dissatisfied with the housing conditions in the area, and we naturally want them improved; and, as a member of that local council and of this House, I have to ask myself, Will the new conditions that are now sought to be imposed upon us increase our opportunities of making decent homes for the people? I do not think the Minister will dispute my contention that they will not increase those opportunities, because, in the first place, they will increase rents. That is a certainty. As to the houses themselves, there is no guarantee at all that when they are built they will be let at the old rent, plus the value of the withdrawn subsidy, as the Minister thinks will happen. There appears to be no guarantee at all that the increase in the rent due to the withdrawal of the subsidy will stop at that, because it will be open to any of the speculative builders who may induce building societies to make loans to charge what rent they like, and as a result the opportunities of the people to live in those houses will be lessened again.

Therefore, I cannot help feeling that this is one of the worst Bills, from the point of view of the opportunities of the people to live in decent houses, that have been introduced into this House in my experience here. I cannot help feeling that the knowledge that it was coming probably played a very large part in the election result that has been announced to-day, and I cannot help feeling also—and I am not at all sorry for it—that when it becomes known that the Minister refuses to make any concessions at all, as apparently he intends to do, along the lines which we advocate, the result will be even more disastrous for the Government. I want to make the strongest possible protest, in the interests of the poor people, not only in my own constituency, but in all urban and rural areas, at the attempt which has been made by the Minister to prevent them from living in decent houses and to drive them back into miserable dirty slums.

Mr. HICKS: I would not have risen had it not been for the speech made by the hon. and gallant Member for Accrington (Major Procter) who referred particularly to trade conditions in industry as being responsible for the lack of houses. His remarks were particularly vindictive, and I do not think that they were based on very much information. I have a sense of satisfaction, however, in that the hon. and gallant Gentleman brought an atmosphere of reality into the Debate. It seemed as if the speeches that had been made were simply being poured off in order to pass the time until the clock reached the hour when we were to go into the Lobby. The proposal in this Bill will change the whole course of housing activity from that which we have known for the past 10 or 12 years. Fundamentally it changes the whole method of approach to the problem of house building, and from my experience I seriously believe that the Government by this proposal will signally fail to produce anything like the number of houses that even they have in mind. It may be an easy thing for us at the end of 12 months to be able to say that we had told the Government that this method of approach to the problem would not materialise in the provision of houses, and we might be able to propose a Vote of Censure and get it substantially supported in the House, but what about the people who would be deprived of housing accommodation and who could have had it if there had been a right method of approach? They are clamped down in the misery of their housing conditions with little or no chance of escape.

The attempt to rely upon voluntary effort—voluntary from the point of view of the financing organisation, the builder, and the measuring of the housing requirements—will fail to make any substantial contribution to housing. I speak as one who has taken part in negotiations for housing activities. I have helped to build houses and to superintend building, and I have negotiated with responsible persons for a number of years in an attempt to get housing activity in this country. The hon. and gallant Member for Accrington referred to the lines of demarcation in the industry, but he was particularly ill-informed of the general activities of the building industry to bring forward such a frivolous point as a serious contribution to the Debate. He gave instances where relatively incompetent people were called upon to do certain work, and he spoke of picture rails and skirting boards being nailed to a gaspipe. I do not know whether it was an iron gaspipe. He followed that up by saying that if it were not for the strict rules of the trade unions housing could be made cheaper. If he had applied the ordinary measures of examination, he would have found that they were incompetent persons who were executing the class of work to which he was referring. Competent tradesmen could not do anything of the kind. No responsible body in the country, either of municipal authorities or employers or anyone who knows anything about building, has any complaint to make about the effect of the general lines of demarcation on the expedition of work or the cost of work. It is absurd to attempt to argue that such a thing is responsible for stopping house production.

Owing to the Government's change of policy, I feel that the members of my own organisation are condemned to a longer period of inactivity than is necessary. Instead of having an opportunity to exercise their skill in building houses, they will still be signing on at the Employment Exchanges or going to the public assistance committees. We have increased our personnel at the request of previous Governments. We agreed to adopt ex-service men and to train them and to give them work side by side with craftsmen. We have paid very dearly for it. These men were the first to be unemployed when there was little opportunity for employment because their skill was not equal to that of the others, and we had to subsidise them out of trade union funds during unemployment. We have spent hundreds of thousands of pounds in that direction. In addition, manufacturers must feel very apprehensive about this change of policy, for in order to meet the housing needs they laid down additional plant. Many yards and factories are partially idle to-day. It seems such a pity to waste all the skill and the capacity that we have. There is no chance to apply it unless there is assisted guidance. All the technique of our builders, which is as rich as the country has ever known, is to be allowed to be picked up here and there in a haphazard sort of way. There is to be nothing organised about it. It is all to be left to chance—the chance that some municipal authority, finding that they have a waiting list of 3,000 or 4,000 people wanting houses, may call the master builders together and suggest to them that they should approach the building societies to see if they would be agreeable to advance financial assistance.

The CHAIRMAN: The speech of the hon. Member is becoming a speech on the Bill rather than on Clause 1.

Mr. HICKS: I do not wish to trespass against any ruling you may lay down, Sir Dennis, but this Clause is altering the whole principle on which we have acted in housing matters, and I wish to direct attention to this violent change, which, in my opinion, will be responsible for slowing down housing activity rather than stimulating it. I am sure the House would wish to see house building encouraged, in view of the effect which poor housing has upon the character of our people and in face of the terrible statistics we have as to people who are living in overcrowded and unhealthy conditions. I fear that the general complacency with which hon. Members appear to accept this change will be regretted in the future. The statement of the Minister that if we take away the subsidies and leave private enterprise a free and unfettered opportunity the effect will be to stimulate building enterprise is one with which we respectfully disagree.

The change we are introducing will not increase the number of houses to anything like the extent which is necessary. In present economic conditions, with the poverty which prevails among our people, there will be no sufficient guarantee to master builders that they will find people able to rent or purchase houses and that will be no stimulus to them to build. The Government have taken the wrong approach to this problem. We are sorry, also, that the Minister has not agreed to extend the period during which schemes may be submitted and sanctioned. If he had agreed to the longer period it would have given him a better opportunity to secure from agencies such as building societies some guarantee, some public statement, something more than a mere gesture—secure a definite assurance that they were prepared to build houses. We cannot say whether ten houses will be built by the building societies, or 10,000.

The CHAIRMAN: I must again call the hon. Member's attention to the Motion before the House. He is definitely wandering on to Clause 2.

Mr. HICKS: I will reserve my observations on Clause 2 to a later period. I hope the Committee will agree that the taking away of the subsidy from house building is not a step in the direction of providing houses, but is a retrograde step.

8.59 p.m.

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of HEALTH (Mr. Shakespeare): I do not think I need detain the Committee for more than two minutes, because we have had a very full discussion on the Clause, but one or two points have just arisen with which I would like to deal briefly. I agree with the hon. Member for East Woolwich (Mr. Hicks) that it is a great pity to interpose the question of demarcation. After all the problem is big enough in itself. We are hoping to secure good will, and if we start flinging taunts at building operatives we shall never solve this problem. The question is, "Shall we or shall we not get more building activity by this change of policy, by the withdrawal of subsidies under the Act of 1923 and the Act of 1924?" The hon. Member said he regretted the complacency shown by the House. As far as I am concerned I am not complacent, but I am infinitely delighted at this change of policy, because it meets the point made by the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Cocks) and the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. Logan)—whose constituency I knew too well for one day. In my humble judgment, and I am not saying this without a good deal of thought, the only hope of clearing out some of those hovels lies in the policy on which we have embarked, because as long as we have the 1924 Act subsidy continuing local authorities will go on building lovely housing estates, although not a fraction of 1 per cent. of slum dwellers will ever get into the houses. That is my strong conviction. These lovely new houses nearly always go to the aristocracy of the working class.

We propose to reverse that policy and concentrate on the 1930 Act subsidy, which is payable only in respect of persons displaced from the slums. No displacement, no subsidy. Local authorities will have an unrivalled opportunity in the next few years of using the Act and concentrating on slum clearance as they have never done before. I hope hon. Members will observe what is happening —I think it is happening in Liverpool. The local authorities are already concentrating to a quite remarkable degree on this Act. There have been more houses "declared" in the last fortnight than for a long time past. I would like to congratulate the Corporation of Liverpool on the way it is solving the question of re-housing on the spot. It is solely due to the fact that we have announced the removal of the subsidy under the Act of 1924 and left the local authorities free to get on with this tremendous and baffling question of slum clearance. That is all I need say. My right hon. Friend dealt fully with the justification for the Government's policy in agricultural areas. I just wanted to add that one word on slum clearance.

Mr. LOGAN: Is there no gleam of hope with regard to the date? What about any concession? It is all right for the Minister to say, "Oh, oh," but we want to know. We are not concerned with the Minister's "Oh, oh."

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: I have dealt very fairly, and I think very fully, with that point, and I feel that we have the general assent of the Committee for our policy. There has been a full discussion and I hope the Committee will now let us have the Clause.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

CLAUSE 2.—(Power of Minister to reimburse part of losses sustained under guarantees to building and other societies.)

9.12 p.m.

Sir P. HARRIS: I beg to move, in page 2, line 8, after the word "houses," to insert the words:

"of not less than six hundred and twenty and not more than nine hundred and fifty superficial feet, and."

My inspiration for this Amendment is the Act of 1923, which was fathered by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer when he was Minister of Health. I am always glad to pay tribute to the right hon. Gentleman for his great work for housing as Lord Mayor of Birmingham and as Minister of Health. I always felt that he did his great work when he was Minister of Health. Although in this, that or the other way one may find fault with certain details, he nevertheless did a great constructive work. He had had intimate knowledge of housing needs and of the necessities of the great towns, during his experience in local administration, and he was assisted by the good advice of his Department and of the housing experts. I was on the Committee at the time with him when the 1923 Bill was upstairs, and when he devised his formula.

I suggest to the Committee—and most hon. Members will, I think, agree with me—that, if it is necessary to put figures into a Bill when you are dealing with the local authorities, it is even more necessary to do so when you are dealing with private enterprise which is to get public assistance, in however small an amount. The partnership of the State with the building societies and the private builder is to be small, but the very fact that public money is to be involved should make it necessary on the one hand to see that public money does not go to too large a house occupied by people quite above the poverty line, and, on the other hand, that it does not go to too small a house. The fault of many of the poorer districts of our great towns is that the houses are mean, badly planned and designed, and quite unsuitable for their purpose, and, therefore, I have proposed this formula.

I know that the right hon. Gentleman is going to give sympathetic consideration to another Amendment later on the Paper, but I think it would be more satisfactory to everyone concerned—and there are three, indeed four, partners in this matter—to have the figures specified in the Bill. In the first place, there is the State; secondly, there are the local authorities; thirdly, there are the building societies; and, fourthly, there is the builder. It would be just as well to know what kind of house is going to be sympathetically considered by the Department when schemes come before it for approval, and it is just as well to give a clear lead. I suggest that the matter would be solved once for all if we put the figures, as in the Act of 1923, in this new Act of 1933.

Mr. JANNER: I desire to support the Amendment which has been so ably moved by my hon. Friend. I do not think that there is very much to be added to what he has already said.

9.17 p.m.

Sir H. YOUNG: As the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) has rightly stated, there are certain other Amendments later on the Paper which cover something of the same ground, and on which we shall be able to meet the point of view which I think is also represented in this Amendment. If I ask the hon. Member not to press his Amendment, it is for the following reasons, which I think are adequate. In the first place, I think it is wrong, if we desire to promote activity, to impose any unnecessary regulations. Are the particular restrictions which the hon. Member would impose unnecessary? I think I can satisfy him that they are. In the first place, as regards the upper limit of 950 square feet, that is certainly far in advance of anything that is necessary for the provision of the sort of house that we want to provide—the small house let at a reasonable rent to the lower paid wage earner; and, that being so, it is not the type of house for which we want this scheme to be used. It would be wrong to specify this upper limit in the Bill. Its inclusion would only give rise to unfounded anticipations of assistance for the provision of middle-class houses, which is not what these guarantees are intended for; they are intended for the provision of working-class houses.

As to the lower limit the answer is that it is unnecessary to provide a lower limit in this Clause because it is already provided in our legislation in a satisfactory and reasonable way. The point is already covered by Section 92 (2) of the Act of 1925, which provides, in the case of a two-storey house, a lower limit of 620 square feet, or, if the Minister is satisfied that the special circumstances of the area justify houses of smaller dimensions, of 570 square feet. That applies to every house which can be assisted by a local authority either by advance or by guarantee. Therefore, the main purpose of the Amendment is already secured in our legislation, and it would only produce confusion to introduce the repetition proposed. In these circumstances, I trust that the hon. Member will not find it necessary to press the Amendment.

Mr. McENTEE: The Minister's speech was very interesting, but, to me at any rate, not at all satisfying, because the policy appears to be to stereotype the house at the lower level. I notice that the Minister said, in reference to what he calls the higher and the lower limits, that the higher limit is something to be discouraged, because, he says, such houses would be in the main occupied by middle-class people. I do not agree at all. The higher limit represents the level of building by local authorities for many years past in the case of what we call the parlour type of house. In effect, the Minister's policy is to encourage the building of as small houses as possible. Apparently, the highest standard that can be obtained in his judgment will be houses of a superficial area of 620 feet, and, in certain districts, 570 feet. I do not want to see that type of house encouraged as against a better class of house. I think the Minister would agree that the demand for houses by what may be called, if you like, the better paid artisan class, is not by any means satisfied, and is not likely to be satisfied for many years. I think it could be successfully argued that the demand for houses by that class of people at the present time is just as great as it was four or five or six or seven years ago, and practically no inroad has been made in meeting that demand, which is almost, if not quite, as great as it was some years ago. This appears to me to be a definite attempt to lower the standard of houses to the smallest possible space in which a human being can be expected to live, and I hope that the hon. Member for South West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) will not agree to withdraw his Amendment, in view of the very serious statement that has been made by the Minister.

We are going to hand over all our housing to the building societies and speculative builders to make as much profit as they can out of the housing needs of the people. The Minister told us on a previous occasion that he does not believe that the building societies will be able to cater for the very poorest class of workers. If that be so, and I believe it to be very largely true, it appears obvious that that class of workman who is now getting a better class of house—the parlour type of house, as we have become used to calling it—is to be driven down to what we used to consider the lower standard or non-parlour type of house not exceeding about 620 superficial feet. That is a standard which I hope the House of Commons will not permit the Minister or anyone else to reimpose on the people of this country as a maximum. I shall oppose it as vigorously as I can both here and everywhere else. The figure of 620 superficial feet represents a reduction on the previous low standard, and we are now told that that is to become the highest standard that will be permitted. I hope that the House of Commons will not assent to that suggestion. I wish I could hope that the House, which talks to its people about its desire, as individuals, to raise the general standard of housing, will not submit to this general lowering of the standard to a figure which does not represent decent living accommodation, at any rate for a large family.

Lord E. PERCY: I wonder if I can save the Committee from what I believe would be an absolutely unreasonable and meaningless Division. The position is that, so far as the lower limit of 620 square feet is concerned, that is already in the Bill. The Bill refers to Section 92 of the Act of 1925, which says that no house to which it applies shall be less than 620 feet. Therefore, this Amendment introduces nothing new into the Bill.

Mr. McENTEE: Does it not introduce into the Bill that that shall be practically the standardised size? The Minister said the larger 950 feet type would not be built.

Lord E. PERCY: No, not at all. If the Bill stands as it is, no one may, under the Act, build a house of less than 620 feet superficial area.

Mr. LAWSON: Except at the discretion of the Minister.

Lord E. PERCY: I think not. If hon. Members will look at the provisions of Section 92 they will see that 620 superficial feet, in the case of a two-storied house, is the minimum, and then there comes in the case of the structually separate and self-contained flat or one-storey house of 570 superficial feet. That is being calculated in accordance with the rules by the Minister, provided, if an authority or council in any particular case satisfies the Minister, and so on, he may determine in the case of a two-storied house to reduce it to 570 feet. That has been the position up to now. All you will really be doing if you pass this Amendment is to say that the houses shall not be larger than 950 superficial feet. You will be going into the Lobby in order to support a limitation on the size of the houses local authorities may build under this Bill, and you will be saying that they shall not be larger than a certain superficial area. That is a proposition which no one wants to go into the Lobby to support.

9.27 p.m.

Mr. LAWSON: I hope the hon. Gentleman who has moved this Amendment will not accept the position laid down by the right hon. Gentleman. I think the right hon. Gentleman himself made an unanswerable case when he pointed out that his own suggestion was based on the minimum laid down by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer when Minister of Health.

Lord E. PERCY: It is in the Bill already.

Mr. LAWSON: The Noble Lord must not think that we are taken in by that kind of chaff. As a matter of fact, he has already admitted himself that it is possible, at the Minister's discretion, to cut the size down to 570 superficial feet in the case of a one-storied house.

Lord E. PERCY: When the hon. Gentleman says he is not going to be taken in by that kind of chaff, that seems to me rather an insulting remark. I was quoting from the Act to which he refers.

Mr. LAWSON: I did not mean to be at all discourteous to the Noble Lord. The point I was making was that the Minister, at his discretion, may make the one-storied house 570 feet and the two-storied house in certain cases. I remember very well some years ago my hon. Friend the Member for Spennymoor (Mr. Batey) and other Members, asked for a subsidy for the homes of aged people in the North of England. It was all we could do to persuade the Minister of Health to give us a subsidy for houses round about 600 superficial feet. Now we have come to the stage when you have the possibility of having houses of 570 superficial feet. I take it that is about the size of the house laid down now for the aged people, so we have got now for a family a possible minimum that my hon. Friend laid down in his Bill for two aged people. I do not expect that Liberals are going to agree to a proposal of this kind. A house of 620 superficial feet is low enough as a minimum. As the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) has said, 620 superficial feet is in the Bill, and I take it he thinks that is the desirable minimum, but there is considerable doubt in the minds of hon. Members, as in the mind of the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment. I take it that the Committee will agree that any doubt should be removed and that 620 feet is certainly a low enough minimum for working-class people or anyone else, with a family, to live in. Let us get into our minds what 620 superficial feet means. The figure has been pushed down stage by stage until we have got to the position that though we had to ask the Minister of Health to give us subsidies for our aged miners' homes with a minimum space which was too small for our old people, yet that is practically the minimum space laid down in this Bill. I hope the hon. Member who moved the Amendment will stick to his guns, and refuse to compromise on the matter.

9.32 p.m.

Mr. C. BROWN: We are practically abandoning altogether, except in one or two special instances, our social responsibility in regard to the housing of the working classes by State and municipalities and turning the matter over to private enterprise. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) that we should do everything we can to keep private enterprise up to the scratch. I cannot square the argument of the Minister with the argument of the Noble Lord the Member for Hastings (Sir E. Percy). The Minister suggests that he does not want to accept this Amendment because it would be imposing what he calls unnneccessary restrictions in this Bill. He prefers to leave the matter hazy, indefinite and indecisive, and he does not wish to put in any unnecessary restrictions. The Noble Lord tells us that as far as the lower limit is concerned, this is already secured by the provisions of the Bill, but the Minister, in the course of his remarks, said it was not at all likely that the houses which private enterprise would provide would be anything approximating to 950 superficial feet.

Sir H. YOUNG: Not quite that, but it is not the intention to make use of the guarantee for the provision of houses as big as that. Private enterprise may very likely provide those houses. I hope it will, but these are not the houses we desire to promote for social purposes, and for which the guarantee would be given.

Mr. BROWN: That does not seem to be any argument why the Minister should refuse to insert these figures in the Bill. The argument about unnecessary restrictions falls to the ground on the arguments that the Noble Lord the Member for Hastings has put before the Committee. Let us have something satisfactory, decisive, clear and definite. Why cannot the right hon. Gentleman accept this Amendment? It will not overload the Bill with any unnecessary restrictions. I feel that the hon. Baronet ought to stick to his guns and press the Amendment to a Division.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—Mr. Womersley and Commander Southby.

9.44 p.m.

Sir P. HARRIS: I beg to move, in page 2, line 9, after the word "classes," to insert the words "at reasonable rents."

I appreciate the real difficulty of making these words operative, but we are embarking on a great new experiment, and we are going to come in as partners with builders and building societies to provide houses for what are generally described as people of the working-classes. I have taken considerable trouble to inquire how this machinery is going to operate. The private builder, as I understand it, will see a particular site in Kensington or in one of the provincial towns, half an acre or an acre of land, and will decide to build houses of the character which we described in the discussion on another Amendment—houses of 620 or more feet. If the demand of middle-class people, clerks in banks and various sections of the community, is such that the supply is short, there is nothing to prevent those houses being let at £2 or even more. Take the Borough of Kensington, where there is real house planning. You cannot get housing accommodation for love or money. There is nothing to prevent a builder in Kensington from getting public assistance from the State in the form of a guarantee, and then letting his houses to the highest bidders, and the people for whom it was intended that the houses should be constructed would find the rents charged would be such that they would be unable to pay them.

[Sir P. Harris.]

Therefore, it is reasonable to put into the Bill some words of the character suggested, and I believe that the words "at reasonable rents"—and I have taken legal advice from my hon. Friend the Member for Whitechapel (Mr. Janner)—are the best words which can be devised for the purpose. If my hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Bristol (Sir S. Cripps) has better words, or if the Minister of Health is able to suggest something even beter, I shall be satisfied to substitute such words. If this Bill is really going to touch the fringe of the question, and if the machinery is to act as we require it to act, something of this kind of necessary.

I have been told by some people who have made an intensive study of the operations of the private builder that the ordinary builder, the builder of working-class houses, is not worthy of respect, and is sometimes called a jerry builder. But I would point out that he has not finance on a large scale to enable him to build houses to let. He has always been accustomed to build houses to sell. He is not in the financial position to embark upon the building of houses on a large scale to let unless he is able to get a very considerable return on his capital. He is generally a man of comparatively small means, and is accustomed to make his living by turning over his capital immediately. He builds half a dozen houses and sells them, and then proceeds to build more houses. In that way he gets a large return for his money and is able to keep his organisation constantly occupied. If he is going to operate in regard to this new kind of demand, the building of houses to let, something of this character will prevent him from profiteering. If we are to prevent exploitation with the aid of public money and the guarantee of local authorities and the Treasury, some such words as I suggest should be inserted. Perhaps if the right hon. Gentleman cannot accept these words, at any rate, he will make clear to the Committee how he is going to operate the Clause and see to it that the houses really do go to the working classes.

Sir H. YOUNG: I quite understand the motive of the hon. Member in moving the Amendment, and I have given it most careful consideration to see whether it is desirable, but I fear that the answer must be, that it is not really necessary, and further, that it is quite unworkable. The hon. Member properly asks me the process by which control will be exercised in order to see that the guarantee is not given in respect of houses to let at rents which make them of no use to the working classes. That, of course, will be the function of the local authority and of the Minister at the time at which the scheme is put up for the guarantee. They will then consider all the circumstances of the scheme, the type of houses to be built, the price of the houses, and the economic rent at which they can be let when completed. If they consider that all these things indicate that the rent of the house which is proposed under the scheme and the price which it will cost, are such as to provide a house which can be let at a reasonable rent to the working class, then the guarantee will be given. But if, at the critical period when the scheme is adjudged, the local authority and the Minister are not satisfied that the type of house is one to be let at a reasonable rent to the working class, the guarantee will not be given.

That is the process, as I envisage it, which gives the answer to the question of the hon. Member as to how the control will be exercised to secure houses being let at a reasonable rent. That being so, really all that the Amendment says is that the Minister will exercise his discretion and act reasonably. I suppose it is still the assumption of our legislation that the Ministers act reasonably on the whole, and to give protection to the Minister to act reasonably, without a definition of what reasonably might be, is not of very great utility. That is not the real objection to this Amendment. It goes a good deal deeper. If those words were to be inserted they would impose an obligation upon the Minister to control the rent that is impossible of execution. I am not arguing whether it is desirable or not, but stating the simple fact that it is impossible of execution. There is no unity, as it were, between the local authority and the Minister and this House. There is no connection by which they can review the rent. The only way in which this could be done would be by the establishment of a new office and staff, the cost of which would be considerable. Since it is not in the essence of the scheme that there should be such control, this enormous expenditure should not be contemplated. The short reply is that the control which the hon. Member desires to see is effectively exercised when the Minister approves the scheme.

9.54 p.m.

Mr. C. BROWN: Most of us on these benches, I think, will be very disappointed with the speech we have just heard from the Minister. As I understand the position, the next Amendment on the Paper will not be called. We have had very little definiteness about standards of housing and that kind of thing, and now, apparently, the question of rent is to be entirely uncontrolled. All the houses which will be built by private enterprise under the Bill will be outside the control of the Rent Restrictions Act. There will be no control with regard to the rents which can be charged, and here obviously is a field in which, in certain circumstances not difficult to visualise, there can be any amount of exploitation of the working class in areas where housing needs are pressing. It is most deplorable indeed that even the moderate words proposed to be inserted by the hon. Baronet the Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) are not to be inserted. The Minister is apparently going to leave this matter to the free play of competition which he so greatly admires. He is going to leave the working classes more or less to their fate in regard to what may or may not happen in regard to the play of free competition. We on these benches feel that some provision, whereby the Minister would have some control over rents, ought to be inserted in the Bill. Consequently, we shall support the Amendment of the hon. Baronet.

9.55 p.m.

Miss RATHBONE: I share the disappointment of the last speaker at the Minister's reply. The point is one on which many of us feel very anxious. The right hon. Gentleman's reply, if I understood it correctly, amounts to this, that the control which we want to see exercised will be exercised by himself in conjunction with the local authority at the time when they give the guarantee to the building societies. Before the question goes to the Vote, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will tell us what control there will be to see that the guarantee is carried out. He argued that he could not accept the Amendment, because there was no machinery to supervise the rents, or what happened to the houses after they had been put up. Suppose a building society states, quite honestly, that it is its intention to put up houses to be let to the working classes, and that five years or so after the houses are put up the building society finds that letting is a very troublesome business and decides to sell the houses. What will be done in that case?

Sir H. YOUNG: Perhaps I can assist the hon. Lady. There is a specific Amendment on the Order Paper dealing with that matter.

Miss RATHBONE: I am glad to hear that, but I should like to be sure that that specific Amendment ensures that not only will the house be a house to be let but that it shall be let at a reasonable rent. How can that be ensured if, in the right hon. Gentleman's own words, he is not going to exercise any sort of oversight into the question of what the rent can be? The very case for this Amendment is proved by the unsatisfactory place in Acts of Parliament of phrases which are never defined and which are left to the local authority to interpret rightly. Some time ago I asked a question as to what was the definition put by the Ministry upon the phrase, "Housing of the working classes," which has been used in practically all the Housing Acts for the last 50 years. I was told that it had never been defined and that it had never been found necessary to define it, but that it was left to the local authorities.

Yet, by the statement of the Parliamentary Secretary to-day, one of the reasons for the subsidy being stopped is that the beautiful houses, as he termed them, which had been put up by the aid of the subsidy had not gone to the people who really required the subsidy. He said that they went to the cream of the working classes. I think he put it much too mildly. Many of the houses have not gone to the working classes at all, but to the middle classes. In one Debate in the last Parliament a former Member of this House gave an instance which stuck in my mind, where the London County Council had in the same week accepted two tenants, a retired captain with an income of £600 a year, and also two spinster school mistresses with joint incomes amounting to £700 a year, and had refused a man with a wife and three children, whose earnings were £4 a week. It is notorious that one of the things which has led to contempt in the country in regard to the working of the subsidy system is that there has not been control by the local authorities of the houses once they had been put up.

There has been no attempt to make certain that the houses got into the hands of the people who required subsidised houses. It is very largely because that has gone wrong that the Ministry has now put an end to the subsidy system, yet in this Clause the Minister is going to be content with the least form of control, apparently exercised at the moment that the contract is entered into with the building society. We are not told the nature of the control. Is it to be definitely ensured that the houses are to be let and not sold and, if so, for what period? Is there any termination of the obligation to let and not to sell? In the second place, if the houses are let, is there any guarantee that they will be let at rents that will make them useful to the class of people defined by the Minister as the lower paid wage-earners?

10 p.m.

Mr. JANNER: I would not have risen to speak were it not for the fact that the right hon. Gentleman made reference to the impossibility of saying what control might be imposed upon the rents to be charged to tenants of these houses. I hope that the Government will find some method of coping with this matter. At a later stage the houses may either be sold or let to the highest bidder. I cannot see any reason why a formula cannot be obtained, a formula similar to the one which prevails in respect of the Increase of Rents and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Acts. We might very easily follow a similar wording for the purpose of control in respect of these houses as we do under those particular Acts.

Sir H. YOUNG: Perhaps I can help the hon. Member. There is a specific Amendment on the Order Paper to deal with that matter.

Mr. JANNER: If I can be assured that that Amendment is going to be taken, I shall sit down, but if it is not the intention to call that Amendment, I should prefer to continue my remarks. May I ask if it is proposed to call that Amendment?

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. Member indicate the Amendment to which he refers?

Mr. JANNER: It is the Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. Member for West Walthamstow (Mr. McEntee)—in page 2, line 9, after the word "classes," to insert the words

"at rents which do not exceed the rents which would be chargeable if the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Acts, 1920 to 1925, applied to such houses."

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: It is not my intention to call that Amendment as the present Amendment appears to me to cover a much wider ground.

Mr. JANNER: I understood that to be the case, and that is why I was referring to this particular method of coping with the position, when the right hon. Gentleman interrupted. It appears to me that a formula has been found. It is clear that the Increase of Rents Acts were introduced because it was realised that some kind of control must be put upon the amount of increase permitted in respect of the rents of houses. Why on earth when a grant is being given for the purpose of erecting houses a similar proviso should not be forthcoming to protect the tenants who are going to occupy those houses, I cannot say. It is obvious that it is possible to insert such a proviso, and it is equally obvious that it is not the intention of the Government nor of anybody else in this House to allow the Increase of Rents Acts to be dropped entirely. Consequently, if the Government were to regard the position in its proper light, they might accept some formula of that description. There is no reason why they should not say, so long as these Acts are in force, that the houses which are now being built shall come within the provisions of those Acts. It is the simplest thing in the world and requires no intricate formula. It could be easily worked, because one Act would cover all houses referred to in this Bill as well as houses covered by the Increase of Rents Act. If the right hon. Gentleman will not accept the Amendment I hope he will try and provide by some Amendment to the Bill for tenants to be protected. I suggest that the easiest way would be to accept the decision of the House in respect of the Increase of Rents Act and make this simple remedy apply in both cases.

10.6 p.m.

Mr. McENTEE: By the interjection of the Minister of Health just now I rather gathered that he thought you, Mr. Deputy-Chairman, would call the Amendment which stands in my name, and I rather imagined that he was favourably disposed towards it. However, as you have determined that my Amendment cannot be called I should like the Minister of Health to reconsider his decision on the present Amendment. Let me point out the contradiction in the policy of the Government in regard to rent restriction. In a Bill which the right hon. Gentleman introduced a few days ago he preserves control over the type of house which we are considering at the moment; the only houses which go out of control under that Bill are the larger types of house. The type of house which is to be preserved under the other Bill is not to be controlled at all under this Bill. That indicates one thing to me; that where local authorities are dealing with houses control of rents is to exist, but that where private enterprise is dealing with houses they are to be allowed to exploit the public as much as circumstances will permit.

Under the proposal a local builder may go to a building society and say, "There is a great demand for houses in a certain locality, indeed, houses are so badly needed that the people there are ripe for exploitation. All you have to do is to enter into an agreement with me to finance a scheme for the building of houses. When the scheme has been approved by the local authority you agree to a loan of 90 per cent. instead of 70 per cent. In regard to the 20 per cent. two-thirds will be guaranteed by the Government and the local authority, and the only extra risk you have is the 6⅔ per cent.; but in consideration of that the Ministry of Health is prepared to give you the power to exploit the tenants you can get up to the fullest extent. The real position is that there is a tremendous demand for houses and the people will be prepared to rent houses under almost any conditions." That is a serious position in which to leave tenants in congested areas, and some control should be exercised, in the same way as it is exercised in regard to other houses. Why should a tenant living in a house be protected in his rent and a tenant who goes into one of the new houses not receive similar protection? There is no logic or reason in it.

The only excuse given by the Minister is that there is no machinery in existence. May I remind him that machinery does exist, and that it operates very well. If a local authority, through a public utility society, goes to the Minister with a scheme and the scheme is approved, it is approved under certain conditions; and one of the conditions is that before sanction is given the rent shall be determined and the local authority is compelled to insist on the carrying out of that condition. Is not that machinery available in this case? Why should not a local authority in this case have the control over rents which they exercise in regard to certain schemes? It is not a question of machinery, nor is it expensive. It is available; and could be extended. The Minister's statement is only an excuse for not imposing some form of control over rents. Why should tenants be exploited in this way? The ordinary speculative builder who gets his money through building societies has only one consideration in mind. He does not go in for the building of houses because people need houses. No baker makes bread because people need food. They bake bread and sell bread because there is a profit in the making and selling of bread; and in the same way a builder enters into a contract solely because he can make a profit out of it. If we are good business men we run our business with the object of making as much profit as we can. That is the system to which the right hon. Gentleman gives his full support, and he is doing a fine service to builders and building societies in refusing to prevent them from exploiting the people to the full. They will thank him very much for it. But we shall take every opportunity to point out that this Government is really not what it professes to be, a National Government, but is a Government which passes a Bill to give further opportunities for an exploitation of the poorer people of the country.

The title of the Bill is wrong. It should be called a Housing Bill to enable builders and building societies to further exploit the people of the country. That is apparently the main object of the Bill. The object certainly cannot be to give the people houses at reasonable rents, because the Minister has taken every opportunity to show his desire to enable those people to exploit the tenants and has shown himself definitely opposed to the public interests and the interests of those who are least able to pay for decent housing accommodation. It is sheer rubbish to say that it is not possible to set up machinery. The machinery exists already, and could easily be put into operation if there were any desire to do so. The trouble is that the Minister has no such desire.

10.16 p.m.

Major NATHAN: I wish to join my voice to that of the hon. Baronet, my colleague in the representation of Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris), in pressing this Amendment on the Minister. The Minister has twice, in interruptions, referred to an Amendment which covers the point intended to be covered by the Amendment under discussion, but he has not vouchsafed to tell the Committee to what Amendment on the Paper he refers. I find no Amendment on the Paper in the name of the Minister, and I am entirely in the dark as to what Amendment he has in mind. I ask the right hon. Gentleman now to be good enough to inform the Committee to what Amendment he has twice referred. If he will not condescend to do so——

Sir H. YOUNG: I hope the hon. and gallant Gentleman will acquit me of any discourtesy. It takes a moment or two to look up the Amendment.

Major NATHAN: I would not for the world suggest any discourtesy on the part of the Minister. We all know him far too well to do that, but I gathered from his attitude that he was not going to reply to my question.

Sir FRANCIS FREMANTLE: If the hon. and gallant Member will look at the middle of page 281 he will see an Amendment in the name of the hon. Baronet the Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris).

Major NATHAN: I am very much obliged to the hon. Member for St. Albans (Sir F. Fremantle), but it was the Minister's reply that I desired to have. The right hon. Gentleman's interruptions and references to an Amendment on the Paper was in any case irrelevant unless accompanied by the further statement that he proposed to accept that Amendment. The Bill provides in the Clause that a guarantee is to be given in respect of houses intended to be let or to be occupied by the working classes. The guarantee is to be given at the point of time when the contract is made, and may very well be long in anticipation of the point of time when the building is finished and ready to be let or sold. It may well happen that in perfect good faith both the Minister and the society will come to an arrangement under which the guarantee has to be given on the footing that at the time the arrangement is made the houses are to be let for occupation by persons of the working classes. But of course there is nothing in the Bill to give any guarantee that public funds will, in fact, only be used for the purpose of ensuring that these houses are let to persons of the working classes.

In the nature of things no such guarantee or definite undertaking to be fulfilled in all circumstances can either be given by the society or exacted by the Minister, because the future does not lie in the hands of the Minister or of the building society. But if there is prescribed in the Bill a figure for the rent, or an indication of how the rent is to be ascertained, that would ensure that the property cannot be used otherwise than for the purposes of letting, and, if the rent be, in the words of the hon. Baronet, "a reasonable rent," the demand by the working classes for houses at a reasonable rent is so great that, as far as anyone can form a judgment in anticipation of the event, the houses will not only be available for the working classes but actually occupied by the working classes. The Minister dismissed rather casually the phrase "reasonable rent" used by my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bethnal Green. I ask myself and I ask the Committee whether the Minister is fully justified in doing so. In the first place, what are the working classes for the purposes of this Act? I refer the Committee to the definition given in the Fifth Schedule to the Housing Act of 1925:

"The expression 'working class' includes mechanics, artisans, labourers, and others working for wages, hawkers, costermongers, persons not working for wages . . . . and persons other than domestic servants whose income in any case does not exceed an average of three pounds a week."

It is clear that in the contemplation of the legislature, broadly speaking, the houses that were to be supplied under the Housing Acts were houses for persons in the employments mentioned, with a general indication that it might be assumed that they were persons whose income on the average was £3 a week. That involves that the rent shall be a small rent. It involves that the rent shall be a "reasonable rent"—the term used in this Amendment—having regard to all the circumstances of the case.

Lord E. PERCY: Will the hon. Member read the heading of the Fifth Schedule to the Housing Act of 1925 from which he has quoted?

Major NATHAN: I am giving the definition used in that Housing Act, and I believe the Noble Lord has the document before him.

Lord E. PERCY: Yes, but the Fifth Schedule is headed:

"Provisions as to rehousing in case of displacement of persons of the working-class."

Major NATHAN: Do I understand the interruption of the Noble Lord to indicate that the definition of persons of the working class in the Bill which we are now considering is different from the statutory definition in the Housing Act of 1925?

Lord E. PERCY: As far as I know, the Fifth Schedule to the Act of 1925 is the only place in which any definition of working class is contained, and that is not a definition for the general purposes of that Act.

Major NATHAN: It is clear that the definition given in the Housing Act of 1925, in the Fifth Schedule, was given for the purposes of that Act.

Lord E. PERCY: No, for the purposes of part of that Act.

Major NATHAN: It was given for the purposes which are indicated in the Fifth Schedule. But I challenge the Noble Lord to find, in the whole of the Housing Acts, any other definition of persons of the working class. That is the only definition, and if it is any assurance to the Noble Lord, I have taken the trouble to search the Housing Acts to find if there was any other definition. Therefore, it may be assumed that, for the purposes of housing legislation, that is the definition which the Legislature has deliberately adopted. The hon. Baronet framed his Amendment "reasonable rents," and I must confess that it is not a phrase which at first sight I should have regarded as particularly happy, because it is notoriously difficult to define what is a reasonable rent. But I find very considerable assistance from a Circular issued by the Ministry of Health in relation to housing, where this very phrase is used. In Circular 520 the following phrases appear, and for the sake of saving time I put them shortly, though I quote textually the relevant phrases. It was in relation to the Housing Act of 1924, and in this Circular it was laid down that the object of that Act was to enable "provision of houses to be made for letting at reasonable rents."

That is the very phrase used by my hon. Friend. But the Circular does not leave the matter there. It goes on to define how a reasonable rent is to be ascertained, and it says that the first thing to be done is to determine what are to be regarded as the rents of ordinary working-class houses, which is to be ascertained according to the rules set out in the Appendix. If one refers to the Appendix, one finds there a set of rules, headed "Rules for determining the appropriate normal rent." In the face of this Circular, issued by the Minister's predecessor in the distinguished office which he now holds, and still in operation, as I understand it, I fail to understand what grounds he can have for refusing to adopt the Amendment of my hon. Friend in the actual terms in which it is proposed, for if my hon. Friend had, in framing his Amendment, sought a precedent, he would have found it in the Circular relating to housing to which I have referred, issued by the Ministry of Health itself.

Sir H. YOUNG: If I may answer the question put to me, the Amendment to which I referred was that relating to the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Acts, which had not yet been ruled out of order. The Amendment would, in the view of the Government, be of no assistance in the matter at all, for the reason that it seeks to apply to the standard of rents for these houses the rents which would be chargeable under the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Acts. No rents are affected by those Acts except the rents of houses which were in existence before the War, and the figure to which the present rents are restricted is determined by reference to pre-War rents. It is obvious that you cannot apply the standard rent in fixing the reasonable rent for new houses.

[Sir H. Young.]

Mr. McENTEE: Is it not a fact that the appropriate normal rent is taken as the basis on which rents are fixed by the right hon. Gentleman's own Department?

Sir H. YOUNG: The hon. Member has not distinguished between normal rents and rents under the Rent Restrictions Acts.

10.31 p.m.

Major NATHAN: I only venture to rise again because of the Minister's reply to my question. The rules to which I was referring under Circular 520 do not in any way refer to the Rent Restrictions Acts. I appreciate the point made by the Minister there, and I do not think that the Amendment to which he referred can be applied to the circumstances of the present case. The Appendix of Circular 520 sets out rules in this way, however:

> "The local authority shall obtain particulars of the current rents of working-class houses of all types erected in the district prior to 3rd August, 1914, in such numbers and proportion as are in their opinion fair and representative of all those houses in the district."

Then it makes certain provisos, to which I need not refer, and goes on to say:

> "The appropriate normal rent for each of the two classes of houses in the area, or in part of the area as the case may be, shall be the average rent payable in respect of the houses of that class of which particulars have been obtained."

In other words, the Ministry relates reasonable rents of this kind back to the rents as they were in August 1914. Therefore, while I agree, the terms of the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for West Walthamstow (Mr. McEntee) are not appropriate, the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for South West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) has precisely the same object by following out the procedure laid down in Circular 520, which has operated for some years past and still now operates.

Mr. GREENWOOD: I am disappointed but not surprised at the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman. When he introduced the Bill, he was determined to get back to private enterprise without any restrictions whatever. The only kind of limitation that there is in Clause 2 is that the houses to be built are to be intended to be let to the working classes. He has relented somewhat in regard to the size, and so on, of the houses to be built. His argument against this Amendment and against a subsequent Amendment is that they are unworkable. I think that it has been demonstrated clearly that under the Act of 1924 scores of thousands of houses are having their rents determined on the basis of pre-War rents plus the 40 per cent. allowed under the Rent Restrictions Acts. It is therefore possible to get something approximating the appropriate normal rent for the houses which are now to be built by private enterprise. The right hon. Gentleman told a long story and said that we would have to consider the price of the house and the circumstances of the case—vague phrases, like the Amendments he is prepared to accept in Committee—also the economic rent, and then, if we are satisfied with these things the Government and the local authorities will give the guarantee and the building societies will go ahead, and, at a further stage, the private builder will build the houses.

What is the right hon. Gentleman's responsibility? At a maximum 8s. per house, according to the Financial Memorandum on the Bill. He has no responsibility that matters. He has put forward to-night an Amendment enabling him to take certain steps with the approval of the Treasury. I suggest that the approval of the Treasury in respect of 8s. per house is not very much. In fact, the right hon. Gentleman's control over rents is utterly negligible. He would wish it to be so, and so would many hon. Members opposite. Their main desire is to get back to unrestricted private enterprise. We are to have certain Amendments which in practice amount to nothing, but on the return that is to go to the speculator who builds houses there is to be no concession at all.

I do not approve very highly of the hon. Baronet's Amendment about reasonable rents. I do not know what reasonable rents are, and I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman has no view whatever about reasonable rents. They are the rents which a private builder can extract for the houses. I would have preferred something a little more definite. It is quite clear that the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to let loose private enterprise in the building of houses, subject to very ill-defined conditions, without any restrictions whatever as regards rents, and he tells the Committee that he honestly believes that this is a method of solving the housing problem. I am sorry that we cannot debate our own Amendment, but we are bound to go into the Lobby behind the hon. Baronet in support of his Amendment to get some control of the rents to be charged by private enterprise.

Sir F. FREMANTLE: I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Greenwood) is unable to realise the conditions of private enterprise. It is true, as he says, that the Minister is resigning himself to the operations of private enterprise. We have made our choice and decided that building is now to be entrusted not to municipal enterprise with subsidies, but to private enterprise. Obviously there will be very little incentive to municipal authorities to build without subsidies. We have made that definite choice. It may be right or it may be wrong. In the opinion of hon. Members opposite it is wrong and in the opinion of us it is right. When a policy has been decided upon we must note the implications of it, and the implications are not merely the idea that private enterprise is going to plunder and to profiteer out of this business. That is guarded against in Clause 2, where the Minister and the local authorities may—it does not say must—guarantee, and they will only guarantee, presumably, in cases where they consider the scheme is justifiable.

The implication of private enterprise is that we must give it the very utmost encouragement. The minds of the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his friends, although I do not say it in any accusing spirit, have, since they were babies, been running on national, Socialistic, one might also say Communistic, lines, namely, forcing things into a rigid scheme. That is the absolute opposite of private enterprise, and therefore any criticism they make of private enterprise really fails to meet the case, for the very reason that the conditions of private enterprise, of freedom, are opposed to the whole basis of their ideas. They may be right. Their mentality we cannot understand, but their mentality may be right, although it brought this country to the brink of ruin in 1931.

Mr. LANSBURY: Rotherham.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for St. Albans (Sir F. Fremantle) is wandering rather a long way from the subject of the Amendment.

Sir F. FREMANTLE: I beg your pardon, Captain Bourne. It is quite clear that if you are to apply private enterprise to the solution of this problem, even if you start from the point of view of the Socialist party, you must encourage it everywhere you can. We are distinctly imposing conditions already in the Bill, and they are implicit in the Clause by the fact that the local authorities and the Minister have to approve a scheme. That being the case, you are not encouraging the private builder. Hon. members on the other side who maintain—and I trust to their genuineness in maintaining—that they are anxious that we shall make a success of this new idea in housing for the sake of the people, must combine with us in being anxious not to clip the wings of private enterprise more than is absolutely necessary. Any question that you are to have a rigid rule as regards rents, or any rigid figures, is against the theory upon which we are working to-night.

Private enterprise is a very delicate matter. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Hon. Members know perfectly well that when they are dealing with their own rents which they have to pay, and with the other disbursements from their pockets, private enterprise is most delicate. It is capable of the greatest possible achievements as well as of the greatest possible failures. I maintain that the wider we extend the opportunities conferred by this Clause, the more likely it is we shall be able to do what hon. Members on both sides of the Committee must wish, that is, to make a success of the new scheme of housing.

10.42 p.m.

Sir STAFFORD CRIPPS: It is very entertaining that a very rigid trade unionist, a member of one of the most rigid trade unions in the country, should get up with such a defence of the system of free rents.

Sir F. FREMANTLE: On a point of personal explanation. May I say that I belong to no trade union, and that nothing is further from the thoughts of the medical profession than indulging in strikes?

Sir S. CRIPPS: There are other things besides strikes, but I will not chaff the hon. Member any further upon that point. He belongs to one of the closest unions in the country; unfortunately it will not affiliate with the Trades Union Congress. The claims of private enterprise failed years ago. If we are to judge as between free rents and controlled rents, we are entitled to look round the country and see what has been done in the way of housing in the last 100 years, first of all by private enterprise and secondly by municipal enterprise. I guarantee that any hon. Member who makes an investigation into the two systems and their results, will indubitably come down on the side of municipal enterprise. [HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] Indubitably. Hon. Members may take London alone, and I will guarantee that if they look at the matter in an unbiased way, for example at the London County Council building schemes and compare those schemes with the slum areas of London which were built under private enterprise, they will come indubitably to the conclusion that municipal enterprise is better if one wants decent housing conditions.

The hon. Member said that this very delicate flower can only be nurtured provided that you give the maximum of profit, and that, therefore, you have to see that there is no means of regulating the rents at all. This flower can only thrive in a soil which has for its nourishment—[AN HON. MEMBER: "Liberty!"] —complete liberty to exploit. But that is not what we call liberty. Liberty has two sides. There is the liberty of the person who has to live in the house as well as the liberty of the person who owns the house, and we are anxious to give the person who lives in the house some liberty as well as the person who owns the house. The House of Commons has constantly stated, ever since the War that where there is a shortage of houses as there is now, you must control rents or there is no liberty. The hon. Member says that private enterprise cannot stand that type of liberty. It is only one particular type of liberty that it can stand—liberty for the landlord or the owner to charge as much rent as he can force out of the tenant. We do not believe that to be right, especially when it is not unaided private enterprise. Under this Bill, powers are being taken to assist private enterprise at the cost of the State. That is one of the objects of the Bill. Apparently, this delicate flower can stand the State assistance on the one hand, but it cannot stand any State control of its profits on the other.

Sir F. FREMANTLE: May I remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that, as I said, there is a general control through the Minister and the local authority having to consent, because they do not have to contribute?

Sir S. CRIPPS: There is a general control, but there is very specific assistance, and that is the constant concomitant of private enterprise; it is always anxious and willing to take all it can, but it is never anxious or willing to give. In this case we believe that, if the State is going to be asked, as it is being asked, to shoulder some of the burden, those who constitute the State—the vast mass of them being tenants and not landlords—are entitled to say, "If we shoulder the burden of the expense, we make conditions," and one of those conditions, we believe, ought to be a reasonable rent. If private enterprise is so delicate that it cannot stand a reasonable rent, then the sooner it dies the better.

Mr. CURRY: I want to ask the Minister one question before this discussion concludes. We have heard that the State has a general control, but, so far as I understand the Bill, the general control is only at the inception of the proceedings—during the building of the houses; and those houses are to be built at the risk of State money or State credit. I would like to know from the Minister to what extent the control of the authority is going to live after the houses are built and occupied. Is there to be any control at all over the rents or over the ultimate destination of the houses? May the houses, having been built on the credit of the State, be sold on the market? May tenants who are unable to pay these uncontrolled rents be ejected; and what control has the State over these things?

Sir S. CRIPPS: None.

Mr. CURRY: I cannot accept the very ready answer of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I am looking with some confidence to the contradiction of the Government. I should be much obliged if we could have some statement on this question.

10.51 p.m.

Mr. HOLDSWORTH: I want to contradict the right hon. Gentleman who spoke with some confidence about municipal housing. If my experience counts, I know of houses that cost £1,100 to build that would be sold to-day for £300. It is futile to argue that, because houses have been built under municipal housing schemes with a subsidy in the last few years, that is any condemnation of houses built 50 or 100 years ago. I maintain that there can be no comparison and that, if the right hon. Gentleman had been sitting on the Treasury Bench at that time, he would not have put up houses of the standard we put up to-day. Progress has been made and there is a different outlook. In my judgment, it is totally unfair to compare those houses with houses built in the last few years.

As to the question whether those who build houses under this scheme are going to extort whatever they can get, I maintain that that also is an unfair argument. The building societies who will make the loans—the Bill will go through and we must argue on that basis—are not likely to risk their money on building houses to be let at rents too high for the people to afford to pay. These societies are run by business people. They are not going to give permission to build houses to be let at rents which the people cannot afford to pay. The guarantee that there will be reasonable rent is the fact that all concerned have their money at stake. This is mere political propaganda to suggest that the people who build these houses will get a rent which the people cannot afford to pay. The Opposition cannot have it both ways. They cannot argue that the houses will be let at rents that people cannot afford to pay, and that it is extortionate. If they cannot let them, they will not be able to extort the rent.

Sir S. CRIPPS: I never said they would not be let because the rent would be too high. I said that they would extort the highest rent they could.

Mr. HOLDSWORTH: I would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to realise that it is not possible for any private trader to dictate to the community as a community or as individuals what they should pay. Even with the low prices to-day, you cannot tell people what they must pay. That is decided by the people in their demand. I may remind him that there are such private schemes as Port Sunlight and the Welwyn Estate which compare very favourably with anything that municipal enterprise has done. The result of municipal enterprise has been to give people houses at a rent they cannot afford to pay, and in the City of Bradford with a 5d. rate in addition. It is not fair to use this as an opportunity for mere Socialist propaganda and to compare municipal enterprise with private enterprise unless private enterprise is given a fair chance.

Mr. LANSBURY: The hon. Member has waxed very wrathful about political propaganda, and I should like to give the Committee my experience. If he will come to Bow to-morrow, I will take him through streets and show him houses which have been decontrolled and show him the results of decontrol, where people are having to pay key money, sometimes as much as £10, in order to get any accommodation at all. There are hundreds of these houses in my division owned by people who never come near them but employ people to farm them out and squeeze as much as they can out of the unfortunate tenants. The hon. Member talks about a 5d. rate. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for St. Albans (Sir F. Fremantle) knows that a 5d. rate for building houses fit for people to live in saves a 5d. rate on the health services of any district in London.

Sir F. FREMANTLE: Not necessarily.

Mr. LANSBURY: Yes, necessarily so. I have heard the hon. and gallant Gentleman make similar statements himself and he knows perfectly well, if he knows anything at all, that bad housing and moral conditions create the necessity for the clinics and health services which have to be provided in slum areas. The hon. Member for Bradford, too, can come to Poplar and see where we have built by municipal enterprise homes that did cost £1,100. They cost that immediately after the War when the Government, instead of taking control of prices, shovelled out the money to contractors and others who became very rich out of it. It was not the fault of the municipalities but of those in control nationally, who did not control prices. [Interruption.] Addison or anyone else. Anyhow he was cheered and supported by the hon. Member's Friends until he saw the light and left them. It is sheer idiocy to use that as any argument against municipal building. The hon. Member talked about new methods that had come into private enterprise. I can take him to houses built within the last 20 years by private enterprise which are let at higher rents than those charged by the Poplar Borough Council or the London County Council though they do not compare at all with them. I can also show him rows of houses which would all fall down if you took one out of the middle. Many of them have not been built 40 years. They are made up land which has never prope settled.

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The rig hon. Gentleman is getting rather f from the Amendment.

Mr. LANSBURY: I am only tempted do this because of the lecture we ha received from the hon. Member f South Bradford (Mr. Holdswort These houses, which are at Hackn Wick, are a disgrace to any builder any society that allowed them to be bui When you talk to me of private ente prise and what private enterprise h done, go and look at the back-to-ba dwellings in your own city, and in t City of Leeds and the City of Birmin ham, all of them built by private ente prise and by men who were not asham to squeeze extortionate rents out of t necessities of the very poorest of the co munity. They are being built to-day. slum does not necessarily mean a narro street. A slum is created by extortionat rents, when you squeeze people and pac families into one or two rooms becau they cannot afford to pay more. I hav listened to a good many Debates in thi House, but this Debate taken part in b the hon. and gallant Gentleman and hi assistant has more than convinced me tha private enterprise as far as housing i concerned has neither a leg nor a bric to stand upon.

Question put, "That those words b there inserted."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—Commander Southby and Dr. Morris-Jones.

Mr. GREENWOOD: I beg to move, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

We on this side of the Committee understood that although the Eleven o'Clock Rule has been suspended it was not proposed to finish the Bill to-night. That was our impression, and I should like to know how far the right hon. Gentleman proposes to go.

Sir H. YOUNG: There is a good deal of matter still on the Order Paper, but its nature is such that the Committee ought not to take any prolonged time in dealing with it. As a matter of fact, it is my intention to accept some of the Amendments, and others, to an onlooker, seem as if they may not be in order. Indeed, the points raised by the remaining Amendments are such that they may be dealt with in a comparatively short time, and I think we may be able to finish them.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

11.14 p.m.

Sir P. HARRIS: I beg to move, in page 2, line 20, at the end, to insert the words:

"Provided that any proposals made to the Minister under this Section shall—

(a) include such particulars as he may direct as to the number and type of the houses intended to be built or acquired and the approximate size of them measured in superficial feet; and

(b) make provision for securing that, except in so far as the Minister may in any particular case dispense with the requirements of this paragraph, the number of such houses in relation to the area occupied or intended to be occupied by and in connection with them will not exceed the rate of 12 to the acre."

[Sir P. Harris.]

My object in moving this Amendment is to bring the Bill into line with the Acts of 1923 and 1924. I am showing my confidence in the right hon. Gentleman by giving him these large powers. We may criticise him, but I am satisfied that if he has these powers he will endeavour to see that not too many houses are built to the acre, that the principle of 12 per acre will be adhered to, except a very strong case is made to the contrary. Secondly, that he will see that the right type of house is provided for in any scheme which comes before him. The Amendment does not go quite as far as I should desire, but I think it does provide some security that this Bill will not repeat the disasters of the nineteenth century and perpetrate what the right hon. Member for Bow and Bromley (Mr. Lansbury) described as long roads of mean dull streets which disfigure most of our towns. I gather that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to accept the Amendment.

11.16 p.m.

Sir H. YOUNG: The hon. Member's anticipations are correct. I propose to ask the Committee to accept this Amendment. The first part deals only with information which is necessary to enable the Minister to form a judgment of the nature of the application and quite appropriate for him to be entitled to receive as a statutory right. The second part deals in particular with the re-enactment, as a standard, of the density of 12 houses to the acre, except in so far as the Minister may, in any particular case, dispense with that requirement. I have already told the House that it is not the policy of the Government, as a part of the new organisation of housing, to assent to any relaxation of the general standards of national housing. If that is so, I think it would be quite appropriate that we should signalise the fact by re-inserting this definite standard of 12 houses to the acre in the new Bill. Nevertheless, it is true to say that it is necessary that the Minister should have power in any particular case to make a relaxation of that standard. There are cases in which, in order to obtain the housing which the people require, it is necessary that the standard should be relaxed. Otherwise, the houses cannot be obtained at the rents which people can pay. In spite of the relaxation of the standard a lay-out can be obtained which is proper, seemly and good.

11.18 p.m.

Mr. HICKS: I beg to move, as an Amendment to the proposed Amendment, at the end, to add the words:

> (c) make provision for securing that in the case of houses to be built a fair-wages clause which complies with the requirements of any Resolution of the House of Commons applicable to contracts of Government Departments and for the time being in force, is inserted in all contracts or agreements for advances between the society and its members, and in all contracts for the construction of the houses."

I was very pleased to hear the Minister agree to accept the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris). I am encouraged to think that he will also agree to accept the Amendment to the proposed Amendment, which is a serious proposition and one which I think the Committee will be well advised to accept. Apparently there are no provisions in the Bill for fair wages to be recognised in the construction of the houses. The history of the struggle for a standard rate of wage is a very long one.

I hope that in this Bill we shall have some provision to carry out what has been the recognised practice in regard to the wages and conditions usually observed between good employers and trade unions, or, where there is no organisation, the wages and conditions applied by the best type of employer in a district. The old theory of long hours and low wages has proved uneconomic and has been found by experience to minimise the capacity for production and injure the health and physique of the workers. I hope that we shall take advantage of the experience gained in a great industrial country like ours and that in this legislation we shall recognise a principle which has been established for many years and has become a part of the fabric of our social and industrial life. As I hope that the Minister is not unwilling to give this proposal his consideration, I shall not at present go further into the arguments in favour of it.

The CHAIRMAN: I think that it would be better, first to dispose of the Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) and, if it is accepted by the Committee, the hon. Member for East Woolwich (Mr. Hicks) can then move to add the words which he has indicated.

11.22 p.m.

Lord E. PERCY: Perhaps the Committee will allow me to make a protest, even if it is only a solitary protest, against putting into the Bill words of the kind suggested by the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris). The first part of his Amendment provides that the Minister may direct that information shall be given in a certain form. Of course if the Minister has to approve of proposals, he can make that approval conditional on having the information submitted to him. The second part says that the Minister shall make provision for securing certain things "except in so far as the Minister may in any particular case dispense with the requirements of this paragraph."

I am not going to return to the argument about private enterprise. It may be efficient or inefficient. It may require the strictest control exercised by the law of the land and the Minister over all its operations. But to pursue the course of putting up a most imposing-looking and menacing paling and then saying, "My dear fellow, you need not mind. It is only cardboard and not wood after all"—that is a degrading business for this House to engage in and I protest against it.

Sir J. WALKER SMITH: I entirely agree with the protest which has just been made. There seems to be an almost insatiable desire to impose restrictions and to secure control and this Amendment represents a further endeavour to prevent anyone endeavouring to build any houses under this Clause. It is entirely unnecessary. I doubt if there will be very much done under the provisions of this Clause. Certainly, if there are many more efforts to impose additional control and further restrictions, the Clause will prove a complete fallacy. No one will do anything at all under it.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Member had better reserve these remarks until we come to the Question "That the Clause stand part."

Amendment agreed to.

11.26 p.m.

Mr. HICKS: I beg to move, in page 2, line 20, after the words last inserted, to insert the words:

"and

I will move that formally.

11.26 p.m.

Sir H. YOUNG: On this matter of a fair wages clause, there is no intention at all on the part of the Government of making any breach in the defences of that clause or any departure from the principles accepted by the House, which, as we know, are embraced in a famous Resolution of the House. The question is of their proper adaptation to the actual business which we have now in contemplation. The wording of the Amendment presents difficulties, because it refers to contracts, and, as a matter of fact, in many cases there will be no contracts at all in which the fair wages clause can be inserted. It will simply be a case of the builder constructing houses for himself, so that we must look for some other method of doing what we want to do. Again, I would remind the Committee that it has never been the practice of this House to enact the insertion of the fair wages clause in contracts other than those made actually by public authorities. Here we have no contracts made actually by public authorities.

I have been looking to see what the precedents are for the way in which the clause is made as operative as possible under these conditions, and I find that the most appropriate precedent is in the Circular of the 2nd September, 1911. That is a Circular issued by the Local Government Board, in which the strongest possible emphasis was placed upon this clause and the strongest possible recommendation given to local authorities to embody the clause in their contracts. I suggest to the hon. Member that, instead of dealing with the matter in the way proposed by the Amendment, which cannot be done on account of the absence of contracts, we should deal with it, on the precedent of that Circular, by my making now the statement that I will address a similar Circular to local authorities for the same purpose and to the same effect as the Circular of September, 1911, in order to exercise the best influence that can be exercised to maintain the operation of the fair wages clause.

11.29 p.m.

Mr. HICKS: While thanking the Minister for saying what he has, I am hopeful that, before finally disposing of this matter, he will be able to agree to make it still further effective than it would be made by despatching the Circular, which is very important. There is the case which occurs to my mind wherein a builder, in an arrangement between himself and a building society, borrows the money and builds, and there is no contract. It was to meet that case that the words of the Amendment were specially designed. Unless something of this kind is done the best employers will be greatly handicapped, and the work will go to the jerrybuilders who, in the main, disregard the best conditions of labour. Unless provision is made for the observance of fair wages and conditions, the Minister will have diluted labour. That means diluted houses, and the complaint as to demarcation and bad workmanship w express itself in many directions. V know the type of person who thinks th the building industry offers opportuniti not offered by other industries. A m wins a cross-word puzzle and sets up a builder, violating all the conditio that have been recognised in the indu try. We want to eliminate that type person. I hope, therefore, that t Minister will see his way clear to mal the observance of the fair wages clau more certain than it will be by a circul to the authorities, for, however stro the moral appeal of a circular, it w not be sufficient.

11.32 p.m.

Mr. McENTEE: Would it not be po sible between now and the Report stag to reconsider the wording of the Amen
ment? There is a provision in an earli Act similar to this, and I am sure tha if the Minister agrees to the gener principle behind the Amendment, he ca easily frame a form of words that woul meet the situation. The issue of a circu lar is perhaps a good thing, but it do not bind anybody. It might be observe by builders of the best type, but unfo tunately there is a set of people wh cannot be trusted to do anything dece if there is a possibility of getting a extra shilling by doing otherwise. Th is the type against whom we want t guard the good builder.

Question put, "That those words b there inserted."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—Sir Victor Warrender and Captain Austin Hudson.

1.43 p.m.

Mr. C. BROWN: I beg to move, in age 2, line 20, after the words last inerted, to insert the words:

> (c) make provision for securing that the houses are or will be fitted with modern requirements and at least equal in hygienic standards to houses built in accordance with the provisions of the Housing, etc., Act, 1923, or the Housing (Financial Provisions) Act, 1924."

The purpose of this Amendment is to ry to maintain the standards which have lready been set up in municipal houses ubsidised by the State. It is necessary hat some such words as these should e inserted because of what has already een said by the Minister. Apparently, part from the minimum size of the ouses, we have no guarantee about ecent size, or density, after what has appened on the Amendment to which hese words are to be added, and we ave no guarantee on the question of ents. In the absence of all these real uarantees we feel that these words are ecessary, in order that the amenities nd hygienic standards of subsidised ouses may be preserved in this advenure on which private enterprise is being asked by the Government to embark. Those of us who have put down this Amendment, and all who sit on these benches, have in mind the preservation of certain standards which have come into existence relatively recently. We are thinking of certain kinds of interior fittings like cupboards and what are sometimes called dressers, of proper ventilation, decent skirting boards, picture rails, and so on. We do not want houses which are merely four brick walls, on some parts of which there is not even plastering. We want houses that are really worthy of the name. If we are merely going to turn this matter over to private enterprise in the way suggested by the Government, and to give that freedom in regard to the whole matter to which I have already referred in connection with size, density and rents, many of the things to which we have become accustomed are likely to go, and there is every reason to believe that other things will go too. Consequently, the insertion of some such words as these is necessary at this place.

11.47 p.m.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: We all want the best standard of houses that we can get, but I assure the hon. Member that the things of which he has spoken would not be covered by his Amendment. He has already all the things that it covers, with one exception. There is already provision for a minimum floor space, and on the question of density. The only other hygienic standard under the Acts of 1923 and 1924 is in relation to baths, and that we are going to discuss in a moment on the next Amendment.

11.48 p.m.

Mr. HICKS: I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman whether there is complete provision in the Bill so far as cubic air space is concerned. Sometimes, with a view to economy, the roof is brought down into the bedrooms instead of being kept out of them. You may have the standard floor space, but it is necessary also to have a guarantee as to the height of the ceilings on the ground floor and on the bedroom floor, so that the cubic air space may be maintained, and it appears to me that that point is not covered.

The CHAIRMAN: I ought to have warned the hon. Gentleman that I do not propose to call the next Amendment.

11.49 p.m.

Sir P. HARRIS: I have been struggling all the evening, on Clause 2, to get the spirit of the Act of 1923 into this Measure. I remember the tremendous fight that we had then for the very modest requirement of a fixed bath. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman was in the House at that time, but we certainly converted the then Minister of Health, who is now Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the bath has become a sort of symbol of civilisation. It may be that some people regard baths as a luxury, but I regard them as a necessity. I want the Parliamentary Secretary, as a symbol of his administration at the Ministry of Health, to get baths into this Bill somehow or other, so that every house that comes into being under the Bill may have that very pleasant amenity, a real bath.

11.50 p.m.

Mr. GREENWOOD: I understood the Parliamentary Secretary to say that the Minister was prepared to accept this Amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think said anything of the kind. Otherwise should not have said what I said.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: What I sa was that hon. Gentlemen have alread got nine-tenths of what they want. Th only thing that they have not got is th bathroom. I agree that we should a like to see them provided everywher but there are cases where you cannot d it. I could give one case in a rural are where you could not give a bath, becaus if you did, you would have no water t put into it. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where?" In a rural area. Obviously, with suc exceptions, these houses will have bath because a local authority would no guarantee houses unless they are al of a decent standard and with a bath In such exceptional cases in a rura area you cannot put in a bath, fo if you do you cannot get water in i because there is no water laid on. Tha is why we cannot accept this Amend ment in this form. As hon. Gentleme have already got nine-tenths of what the want, I hope that they will not press th Amendment.

Mr. GREENWOOD: I really do no wish to describe a bathroom as a rec herring, and our Amendment may be entirely wrong and may have no point, but I suggest that the Parliamentary Secretary, by raising this question of the bath, is dealing with an entirely different point. It may be competent for him to argue that this Amendment is absurd and ridiculous and that by the good will of the Minister we have got nine-tenths of what we want, but there is nothing in this which deals with the question of baths. I suggest that the Parliamentary Secretary is really not dealing with the Amendment at all, but is trying to prepudice the case for the next Amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is now dealing with the question of water, and, in these circumstances, I must rule that the Parliamentary Secretary was in order, because in my opinion the insertion of a bath in most houses is in accordance with modern requirements.

11.53 p.m.

Mr. LEVY: I only intervene because I think the Parliamentary Secretary has admitted the inadequacy of the water supply. Therefore, I say that it is time that we had an adequate water supply in all these areas, whether for building or for any other purpose. It is not unreasonable to ask that we should have an adequate water supply and that the provision of bathrooms in any houses should not be ruled out because of the inadequacy of the water supply.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: The Parliamentary Secretary's argument is a most extraordinary one. It is that you cannot insert these words because there are areas in the country in rural districts in which, because there is an inadequate water supply, it would be of no use to fix baths in houses. The Clause to which this is an addition does not pretend to deal with rural areas at all. This is a Bill to provide houses, not for agricultural labourers, but in urban districts. As my right hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall (Sir F. Acland) pointed out in his speech earlier in the afternoon, building societies in rural areas are unheard of, and nobody knows what they mean. There is not the slightest idea that building societies will be called upon to advance money for building, by private enterprise, houses to house the agricultural labourer. They cannot do it at a price at which agricultural labourers can hire the houses, and the intention of the Bill is not that houses should be provided under it for that purpose at all. The purpose of the Bill is that houses should be provided at approximately 12s. rent in urban areas where the whole question of the water supply is solved. There is a water supply and there is not the slightest reason why provision for a fixed bath should not be inserted in the Clause. I cannot believe there is a single Member of the Committee who thinks the hon. Gentleman's reason an adequate one. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) that we should as far as possible preserve the standard that this House set up in 1923 and 1924. There is not the slightest doubt that even during these 10 years a bathroom has become a genuine necessity and not, as it was to some extent in some areas, a luxury. Even in rural areas tenants are now asking their landlords to insert baths, having learnt from others and from their own experience that the possession of a bathroom is practically a necessity of life. If the Minister will speak on the Amendment, I feel sure he will give us more satisfaction, because he must know that the Bill is not intended to apply to rural areas at all, and that in urban areas a fixed bath is an obvious necessity. To omit it from the Bill will tend to degrade the general standard of housing, which I am sure he wishes to preserve as much as any of us.

Mr. GREENWOOD: The Parliamentary Secretary is getting deeper and deeper into difficulties. He said nine-tenths of the difficulty had been met, the other tenth being the bath. That is his standard of values. Then we are told it will be all right because of the guarantees. I do not believe in the slightest degree in the effectiveness of the guarantees. This Bill will not work unless the private builder gets his way. The private builders' view of what the working class family needs is not the view of enlightened Members of this House. Master builders think houses 40 to the acre are excellent. They do not agree with the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Johnstone) that people need to wash themselves all over at one time.

There is an illustration of this point of view. It is a matter which has been fought out on the Floor of the House of Commons. If I remember rightly—I have not looked up the Debates—in the Housing Bill of 1923 we had a struggle to get a fixed bath. I remember that some of us who sat upon this side of the House then and many hon. Gentlemen who sat upon the opposite side fought against those who were very reluctant to admit the common right of mankind living in civilised dwellings to have a fixed bath. I did not agree with that view of the fixed bath at the time, and we know now that there are thousands of houses up and down the country where the fixed bath is put into the scullery or below the kitchen hearth, and, in some cases, even in an outhouse. In 1924 I remember that we kept the House very late one night, long after 11 o'clock, when an hon. Member, who is now a member of the House of Lords, fought the proposal that the fixed bath should be in a bathroom. A revolution! We kept the House for two hours debating the simple point as to whether the fixed bath should be in a bathroom. In 1924 we insisted upon getting rid of the abomination of a bathroom which was also a scullery, kitchen and a living room. It has been imposed since 1924 in the case of every house built under any kind of housing. Now we are to rely upon a guarantee. I suggest that this is not good enough. It is on record that the people who will build these houses and who will get the guarantees from the building societies—and I am bound to say that in this matter, as regards amenities, I do not trust either the building societies or the Minister, unless he gives us his word in writing in the Bill—will interfere with these amenities. I am bound to say that those things are now to go.

It is very reasonable to suggest that, if there is to be any shadow of a State or a municipal guarantee, or any kind of public recognition of the houses being built, they should conform to modern standards, one of the most elementary of them being the one-tenth of which the Parliamentary Secretary is in doubt. If there is any shadow of public responsibility the question, not merely of a fixed bath, but of a fixed bath in a bathroom, ought to be admitted in all houses. If that is not done, what will happen? The right hon. Gentleman has complained that he could not keep an eye on the rents of all the houses built for all tim Is he going to keep an eye at all on th houses which are to be built? Of cours he is not, unless there is some leg sanction which will establish quite de nitely that houses shall conform to definite standard. I hope that the Cor mittee will not agree to the propositi to leave to the whim of speculati builders, with company promoters in th background, through the Minister, th understandings and possible guarantee and will not allow the particular abus which the hon. Member for South Shiel (Mr. Johnstone) has mentioned to asse itself. A fixed bath—and I would sa in a bathroom—is an essential t civilised life. If the Amendment is r jected, however badly it may be worde the Committee will have missed the poi raised by the Parliamentary Secretary I cannot think that this House, afte the struggles in 1923 and 1924, even wit this reversion to private enterprise, i going back. What was fought for i 1923 and 1924 ought to be good enoug to-day and I hope that hon. Member will follow us into the Lobby in suppor of the Amendment.

Question put, "That those words b there inserted."

Clause 3 (Citation and extent), ordered to stand part of the Bill.

NEW CLAUSE.—(Applicants with families.)

Any proposal made by a local authority to the Minister for a guarantee under Section 2 of this Act shall provide that applicants with families shall have precedence in allocating houses, and no reimbursement shall be made under Section 2 of this Act unless such provision shall have been carried out.—[Sir P. Harris.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

12.22 a.m.

Sir P. HARRIS: I beg to move, "That the Clause be read a Second time."

This proposed New Clause embodies an important principle, especially when we have to deal with private enterprise. The real struggle in housing matters is to provide houses for families. Unfortunately, it very often happens that, because of the conditions imposed by a landlord, houses are let to households without children. Everybody knows that there is a tendency to give preference to the small family or to applicants with no families. I appreciate that there might be administrative difficulties, but I hope that it may be possible for the right hon. Gentleman to give us an assurance that he has already worked out the possibility of making regulations to carry out the purpose that I have in mind.

My trouble is that I do not see that the Minister, under the present wording of the Bill, has any way of "following up" the houses. After they have been constructed and the building societies have given the financial assistance, the houses, as far as I can see, pass out of the ken of the Ministry of Health and of the local authorities. There is certainly no security in the wording of the Bill that applicants with families should occupy the houses, and the proposed New Clause is an attempt to provide such security. If I can get a promise from the Minister that there will be some kind of machinery for securing this purpose I do not propose to press the Clause.

Sir H. YOUNG: I should like my fina gesture to-night to be one of assent and not of dissent, but I am afraid that in this case I can only try to make what must, fundamentally, be a gesture of dissent as much like a gesture of assent as I can. Every hon. Member will sympathise with the intention of the hon. Baronet, which is that the houses ought to be as fully occupied as can be. He asks what assurance I can give him. I think the practical assurance that will be satisfactory to the hon. Baronet is that, in considering the conditions of the demand, and the nature of the satisfaction of the demand as specified in the application for guarantee, the Minister will look to the fulfilment of the purpose that the houses shall be as fully occupied as possible and that accommodation shall be found for large families. Unless these useful purposes are served by the houses that it is proposed to build under the guarantee, the assistance contained in the guarantee will not be provided. That is as far as it is possible to go, within the structure of the present Bill.

The proposed clause itself might be amended because, as the hon. Baronet proposes it, it renders itself liable to some of those strictures already cited by the Noble Lord, the Member for Hastings (Lord E. Percy), and it could not amount to anything practical in administration. In our administration it has been found impossible to impose a condition in the manner in which this clause suggests. A fortiori, it would be impossible to impose it in the case of the present Bill. That is the practical assurance that I can give the hon. Baronet as to the spirit of the administration.

12.27 a.m.

Mr. GREENWOOD: I cannot accept the right hon. Gentleman's spirit and his ssurances. They are an indication to he Committee of the difference of priniple between the right hon. Gentleman nd his supporters, on the one hand, and ome of us on these benches. There must e a certain standard of public honour nd of public spirit in the building inerests. The right hon. Gentleman, aving to choose between housing being arried on under the eye of public uthorities, and by private enterprise, hooses private enterprise, and then de-ends his position by saying, "Well, in iew of the circumstances, I cannot uarantee that the houses will be let and ill conform to certain standards, or hat they shall be let to people of a par-icular kind." There is an adminisrative difficulty. Houses that were uilt by the local authorities under the cts of 1923 and 1924, except those that ere built for sale under the 1923 Act, emain under the public authority. It ay be that they are not able to live up o the standards of 1924, but where there s a sense of responsibility there is the ndeavour to do so.

The right hon. Gentleman is going to ive some guarantees at a small cost to is Department and to the Exchequer and s going to launch houses built by private nterprise. Once those houses are built, e is finished with them. It is that kind f thing that has been one of the causes f our difficulties to-day. Even if we gree that all the houses used to be built y private enterprise, it remains true that f they had been under effective public ontrol the housing problem to-day would ot be so serious as it is. The right hon.
entleman is going to let loose this unestricted private enterprise again, ithout any vestige of control. He tells he hon. Baronet that their intentions re the same. I cannot agree. Unless I isunderstood the hon. Baronet, he wants o see the houses fully occupied. One f the difficulties is that houses are much o fully occupied. There is no guarantee n this Bill that the houses are to be uilt in accordance with local requireents. You need a number of houses or aged persons; you need a number of mall houses for those who prefer non-arlour houses, and who would prefer to pend their money on other luxuries.
You need a number of houses for those who prefer parlour houses, and people with large families who desire a house of the maximum size allowed by the law. Under this Bill there is no guarantee that you are going to get any such thing at all.

Unless there is some kind of restriction, the chances are that the builders will build the smallest, cheapest and meanest type of house, knowing quite well that they will be able to let them to families much too large for houses of that kind. I know that there are difficulties in the way of administration, difficulties not created by those on this side of the House, but by the Minister who has sold the pass in this business. In spite of these difficulties, there ought to be some legislative provision that the smallest type of house is not going to be the standard type of house. There should be provision for houses of larger size. I hope that the hon. Baronet will stand by his Clause. The Minister having given away almost every vestige of control, we ought to stand by the principle of some kind of control by some public authority over the size and type of house.

Miss RATHBONE: It is common form to express surprise and regret when the Minister refuses to accept a proposal which we want him to accept. I feel that I cannot conform to that tradition, because nothing would have surprised me more than if the Minister had said that he intended to accept this Clause. Every time that we have asked him for any security, or certainty, that the houses, which are to be built out of public money by private enterprise, should be used for the purposes we desire—that they should be used to provide housing for the poorer working classes, he has provided us with good intentions. He has the good intention to see that the people who ask for his assistance have the good intention to let the houses to these people, but when we ask for something more than intention he always tells us he has no machinery. He has made it perfectly clear—if we ever had any doubt we have so no longer—that private enterprise can say it intends to let the houses to working-class persons, but it is not even asked if it intends to let the houses at a reasonable rent. Private enterprise is only asked to express an intention, and if it changes that intention five minutes later it will be quite all right. Is it likely, therefore, that the Minister would have taken the more difficult step of accepting the principle put forward in this Clause, that private enterprise, having built a house, shall proceed to allocate that house by preference to people with families?

As the last speaker has said, it will be a troublesome Clause to carry out. I wish it were possible to carry out the principle. Of course we know that the actual result will be just the opposite. It is quite certain that these houses, built under a guarantee and with the aid of public funds, will be let on a definite principle which will be the opposite to that laid down in this Clause. Preference will be given to the couple of elderly spinsters, because private enterprise prefers such as these to the man with three, five or seven children who has that number of reasons for not paying his rent when unemployed. Private enterprise will seek the highest possible return in working under an Act which puts up barriers against indulging in that desire which some of us have. I would have been surprised if the right hon. Gentleman had given way on this Clause, because he has been so out of consonance with the atmosphere of these Acts. I do not believe that the control would have been anything more than a kind of sham, but I will vote for the Clause to assert my belief in the principle. There is a sort of poetic consistency in the last Division which we shall take to-night, because it shows us the flaws in this most detestable Measure.

Mr. McENTEE: I agree with the new Clause, and I am surprised at the Minister rejecting it. I said at an earlier stage in the evening that the Bill is obviously an attempt to allow private enterprise to exploit the public, especially that section of the public least able to bear exploitation. Further, the rejection of this new Clause means that the Minister must know that the builders responsible for the letting of the houses will be able to choose their tenants and, naturally, they will choose those tenants best able to pay rent quite irrespective of whether they have families or not. The probability is, as has been said by the hon. Lady who has just spoken, that people who have large families—and the general rule is that people with large families are much more liable to be unable to pay their rents—will get little consideration from the owners of these new houses who are to receive public guarantees from the local authorities and His Majesty's Government.

The Minister has shown, in this regard and in all others, his keen desire to allow private enterprise to find a new field for making profit. Practically every vestige of public control, very essential for the welfare of the people, is to be lost. That means that all the efforts made by housing experts in recent years and all those who desire to see the people of this country reasonably well housed have been blocked. The Minister had driven us back to a state little in advance of that at the end of the War, when private enterprise gave us the slums which we possess to-day. Some time in the future, when we have other Rotherham elections and some more General Elections, the people will come back to their senses and discover that the mistake they made at the last General Election is finding expression in the Bills which we are now considering. They will unfortunately be compelled to submit to that exploitation until an opportunity occurs for housing authorities, housing experts, and housing enthusiasts to rebuild the housing position that has been destroyed by the Minister in this Bill. I think that this Bill is——

The DEPUTY-CHAIRMAN: The Clause only deals with the allotment of houses.

Mr. McENTEE: I am dealing with the allotment of houses under this Bill, and I regard it as one of its worst features. The Bill will prevent the people most in need of houses, those with large families, from getting houses, and it will enable the exploiters to exploit those people to a greater degree. At some future time those of us who have been serious in our attempt to get decent housing for the people to live in will be sorry that we have ever had a Minister and a Government that passed this Bill.

Question put, "That the Clause be read a Second time."

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

Portuguese Ports (Flag Discrimination).

3. Mr. LOUIS SMITH asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can expedite the settlement of the negotiations with Portugal respecting the discriminatory rates on British goods to Portugal in favour of vessels flying the Portuguese flag, and more especially because its continuance is hampering the development of trade between the two countries?

The SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir John Simon): Every effort is being made by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to bring these negotiations to a satisfactory conclusion. The prejudicial effect of flag discrimination upon Anglo-Portuguese trade is fully appreciated by His Majesty's Government.

Imperial Preference (Cotton Good

14. Mr. RANKIN asked the Secreta of State for the Colonies whether a special efforts and, if so, of what natu are now being made to secure increas preference for cotton goods within t Empire?

The SECRETARY of STATE for t COLONIES (Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister I would refer my hon. Friend to t answer given by my hon. Friend t right hon. the Secretary of State f Dominion Affairs yesterday to the san question.

Russia.

36. Sir BASIL PETO asked the Pres dent of the Board of Trade the tot balance of trade between this count and the Soviet Republic during the pa 11 years and also the correspondin figure for trade between the Unite States of America and the Sovi Republic; and whether, in making an fresh trade agreement, the Governme will limit our purchases from the Sovie Government selling agency to an amour which will correspond with their pu chases of goods produced in this country

Lieut. - Colonel JOHN COLVILL (Secretary, Overseas Trade Department) During the 11 years, 1922 to 1932, ther was an excess of imports over export of merchandise in the trade of the Unite Kingdom with the Soviet Union to th value of £136,500,000. In the case of th United States, exports to the Sovie Union during the same period exceede in value imports from that country b about 519,000,000 dollars. It is the ain of His Majesty's Government in th negotiations now in progress to secur an improvement in the balance of trade

Sir B. PETO: Can the hon. and gallan Gentleman say whether the figures he gave of trade between the United Kingdom and the Soviet Republic included re-exports, or did they relate only to the products of this country exchanged for the products of the Soviet?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: The figures are actually merchandise sent.

Sir B. PETO: Then they would include re-exports? What are the figures for re-exports?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: I could not say without notice.

37. Sir HERBERT SAMUEL asked the President of the Board of Trade if he will state on what date the notice given by the Government to terminate the present Anglo-Russian trade agreement expires; and what progress has been made in the negotiations for a new agreement?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: The present agreement will cease to be in force from the 17th April, 1933. Negotiations are continuing, but the right hon. Gentleman will not expect me to discuss the course of the negotiations while they are proceeding.

Glove Industry.

39. Sir B. PETO asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he can give any date by which an order may be expected, in accordance with the recommendations of the Import Duties Advisory Committee, on the application of the fabric glove industry; whether the commercial negotiations with foreign countries, which are delaying the decision, relate to the glove industry or other industries; and whether, in view of the depression in the fabric glove industry in this country, due to the dumping of surplus foreign produce at prices below cost of production, he will arrive at a decision at the earliest possible moment?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: I cannot give a date by which a decision will be reached on the Committee's recommendations but the hon. Member may rest assured that there will be no unnecessary delay. As regards the second part of the question, it would not be expedient to make detailed announcements as to the scope of negotiations while they are in progress.

Sir B. PETO: Owing to the unsatisfactory nature of the reply, I beg to give notice that I shall raise the question on the Adjournment.

GREEK GUARANTEED LOAN.

4. Sir NICHOLAS GRATTAN-DOYLE asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will explain the steps he is taking to recover the £512,187 4s. 9d. due from the Greek Government to Great Britain in respect of an old guarantee by the British Government; and whether he has brought the matter before those experts of the League of Nations who advised upon the recent Greek loans issued under the supervision of the League of Nations?

Sir J. SIMON: By a convention concluded in 1860 between the Greek Government and the Governments which had guaranteed the loan of 1832 the Greek Government are liable to pay £12,000 annually to His Majesty's Government to be applied in reduction of the capital sum outstanding. The instalment due on the 31st December, 1932, has not yet been received and correspondence is taking place with the Greek Government with regard thereto. The answer to the second part of the question is in the negative.

Sir N. GRATTAN-DOYLE: Since this question has been outstanding for such a long time will my right hon. Friend give me an assurance that all possible steps are being taken to hasten a conclusion?

Mr. HANNON: Can my right hon. Friend tell the House that he hopes that the whole loan will be discharged?

Sir J. SIMON: As regards the last question I cannot answer it. I have not examined the exact terms of the loan. The only instalment, I think, which has not been paid is this last one. My hon. Friends may be assured that the Treasury of this country is taking active steps to make representations to the authorities concerned in this matter.

FIGHTING SERVICES (FISH SUPPLIES).

6. Mr. BURNETT asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will issue instructions to the accountant officers in ships, etc., victualled on the general mess system, for the purchase of a reasonable quantity of British-caught fish?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Lord Stanley): Accountant officers of ships victualled on the general mess system are instructed to introduce as much variety into the dietary as possible, and fish appears frequently in the daily menus. The fish are bought on the open market, and in home waters there is no reason to suppose that they are other than British caught. As accountant officers of general mess ships are limited in their expenditure to a fixed daily allowance per man, it would not be expedient to introduce any rule of the kind suggested by the hon. Member.

Mr. BURNETT: Will the Noble Lord, as far as possible, impress upon those concerned the importance of the fishing industry to the nation and the nutritious quality of a fish diet?

43. Mr. BURNETT asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether, in the next tenders for Army rations, quotations will be invited for British-caught fish?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Mr. Duff Cooper): No, Sir. I am not prepared to substitute fish for meat in the soldier's standard ration. Fish is purchased by units out of the messing cash allowance which is issued with the object of enabling the messing authorities to provide a varied diet.

Mr. BOOTHBY: Why is not the hon. Gentleman prepared to include fish?

Mr. COOPER: I do not think that it would be popular to replace meat by fish as a standard ration.

MALAYA.

7. Mr. HICKS asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has ascertained from the Governor of the Straits Settlements and the High Commissioner of the Federated Malay States whether there is any obstacle against the putting into force of the Workmen's Compensation Act in both Colonies; and whether he can state when the administrative orders will be applied?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I consulted the Governor by despatch after the hon. Member put his question to me on 20th December last. There has not yet been time for me to receive the Governor's reply.

Mr. HICKS: Will the right hon. Gentleman pursue this matter; and can he indicate when I may repeat this question with the hope of getting an answer?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I can g an answer to the hon. Member whe have received the reply from Governor.

8. Mr. HICKS asked the Secretary State for the Colonies whether he give the names of the selection board the cadet services of Malaya; w qualifications are demanded of car dates; and whether there is any rac discrimination?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: T Malayan Civil Service is now part of t Colonial Administrative Service, and personnel will in future be selected unc the general system in force for that s vice. Selection is entrusted to t Colonial Appointments Board.

The members are:

His Majesty's Civil Service Comm
sioners for the time being;
Sir Horace A. Byatt;
Sir Walter Buchanan-Riddell;
Mr. Charles Goldschmidt;
Captain Philip Lonsdale; and Mr. C. W. B. Prescott.

The Chairman is the First Civil Servi Commissioner (Sir Roderick Meiklejoh I may add that it is my intention to ac to the board an experienced retir officer of the Eastern Cadet Servic Owing to the many-sided nature of th work of the Colonial Administrative Se vice, no rigid qualifications, other tha age, are of deliberate purpose, set dow The established rule, so far as concern personnel recruited in this country for th Colonial Administrative Service, is th "Candidates must be natural-bor British subjects of pure European desce on both sides." There are, howeve facilities in the Colonies themselves f the appointment of locally-recruited pe sonnel to the service.

9. Mr. HICKS asked the Secretary State for the Colonies whether he aware that recruitment of the Civil Se vice cadets of the Federated Mala States is by selection rather than b competitive examination; and what step he is taking to put this recruitment on competitive basis?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: Th reasons for my decision that recruitmen for the Malayan Civil Service should i future be carried out by the selectio system instead of by the competitiv examination previously in force were given in my reply to the hon. Member's question on 20th December, 1932. I have no intention whatever of returning to the system of competitive examination.

KENYA GOLDFIELD.

10. Mr. HOLDSWORTH asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is proposed to restore to the native councils of the Kenya Colony Reserves the right of consultation provided for in the original Ordinance before any particular piece of land is leased?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: No, Sir. As I explained in the Debate, the Native Council of the North Kavirondo Reserve consists of 64 members drawn from all parts of the Reserve and is clearly an inappropriate body for the purpose mentioned. The expression of native views in regard to the proposed excision, for leasing purposes, of any particular piece of land, is fully provided for by the statutory reference to the local land board, which will include for this purpose representatives of the location or section concerned, in addition to the permanent African member chosen from the local native council.

11. Mr. HOLDSWORTH asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether all rents accruing from any lease of lands for gold winning are to be credited to the native councils of Kenya Colony?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: No, Sir. Any land leased for mining will first be excluded from the Reserve in exchange either for alternative land or for a monetary payment to the local native council of the full capital value thereof.

12. Mr. GRAHAM WHITE asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, seeing that any land in the native Reserves in Kenya Colony which is not required for gold winning is to be restored to the natives, any provision is included in the lease for repairing any surface disturbance which has taken place on land formerly leased?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: No, Sir. As full compensation for the land will have already been made to the natives, I do not think it would be reasonable to impose this additional obligation on the lessee.

13. Mr. WHITE asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, seeing that large numbers of natives are to be employed in gold winning in Kenya Colony, it is his intention to instruct the Governor to prepare legislation providing for compensation for accidents and those diseases which usually accompany the work of winning gold?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: Statutory provision for compensation to natives in respect of death or serious injuries arising from mining accidents already exists in the Kenya Mining Ordinance of 1931. The Governor of Kenya has also under consideration a Workmen's Compensation Bill covering occupational diseases as well as the results of accidents.

PALESTINE (JEWISH WATCHMAN'S DEATH).

15. Colonel WEDGWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any information as to the killing of Joseph Benjamini, an ex-soldier of the British Army, in a raid by Bedouins against a Jewish settlement on this side of Jordan; and why the British police or the Transjordan force did not prevent the raid or protect the raided?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: As the answer is a long one I will, with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's permission, circulate it in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Colonel WEDGWOOD: May I ask whether the district commissioners are in charge of the police in their respective areas; and whether Mr. Samuel has been made a district commissioner?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I take a great interest in every detail of Colonial administration, but I could not be expected to answer those questions offhand.

Colonel WEDGWOOD: The right hon. Gentleman will realise, I hope, that the post of district commissioner is infinitely more important, if the commissioners have charge of law and order in their districts.

Following is the answer:

The telegraphic report on this incident which I have received from the High Commissioner is as follows:

There was no raid by Bedouin on the Wady Hawareth. A party of police, consisting of one British non-commissioned officer and three British constables under the Assistant District Superintendent of Police, Tulkarem, acting on orders of court, evicted a number of Arabs occupying 50 tents who were trespassing on Jewish property near Nathaniyza on the coast west of Tulkarem. The Arabs refused to leave voluntarily, claiming that they had no land to which to go. Forcible measures were taken, and the Arabs and their possessions were placed on the road between Nathaniyza and Ummkhalid. Some of the Arabs then asked permission to remove themselves to a neighbouring property owned by an Arab, who offered no objection, and the police gave permission. On their way to the Arab property this small party entered the land of a settlement of Jewish ex-soldiers. The deceased person, who was a Jewish watchman, spoke to the Arabs and the British corporal asked him to allow the Arabs to proceed, since, otherwise, the party, with their effects carried by hand, would be obliged to make a detour of more than two kilometres. The land of the settlement is not at this point cultivated. The British corporal then rejoined the main body on the road, 100 to 300 yards distant. Within the space of a few minutes the police engaged in moving the main body heard cries of "murder" from the land of the settlement, to which they immediately went. The Jewish watchman was on the ground. On being helped to rise, he pointed to an Arab who, he said, had struck him with a stick. Apart from a group of Arabs, there was no satisfactory eye-witness of the incident. The Jewish watchman died the same night about five hours after the assault. Three arrests have been made. The High Commissioner added that he was not yet in a position to offer observations. These will follow by despatch.

AVIATION.

LANDING GROUNDS.

17. Mr. McENTEE asked the Under-Secretary of State for Air if he will furnish a list of landing-grounds availal for aeroplanes in Britain; the numb that have been opened with assistar from the State; and whether any of tl landing-grounds of the Royal Air For are available for use by private aer planes, and the charge?

Sir FREDERICK THOMSO (Treasurer of the Household): I hav been asked to reply. As the answer long I will, with the hon. Member's pe mission circulate it in the OFFICI REPORT.

Following is the answer:

As regards the first and last parts the question, on 31st January last ther were 377 licensed civil aerodromes of a kinds in Great Britain and Norther Ireland. It should be borne in minc however, that the majority of these wer only licensed for short periods fo pleasure flying. I would refer the hon Member to the "Air Pilot," Volume 1 published by His Majesty's Stationer Office, for particulars of those in regula use and also for particulars, including charges, of some 50 Royal Air Force aerodromes, which are available in emergenc for use by civil aircraft. In addition there is a certain number of privately owned and unlicensed landing-grounds. As regards the second part of the question, five aerodromes and landing-grounds available for public use are owned and maintained by the State, and I understand that grants from the Unemployment Grants Committee have been made in resepect of eight municipal aerodromes. Assistance has also been given indirectly towards the establishment of aerodromes through the grants to Light Aeroplane Clubs.

IRISH FREE STATE.

18. Sir N. GRATTAN-DOYLE asked the Under-Secretary of State for Air whether he is aware that there is no direct communication between Great Britain and the Irish Free State by air; and whether he will consult with the appropriate authorities of the Irish Free State to remedy this inconvenience, which is a matter of concern to many people in this country?

Sir F. THOMSON: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. As regards the second part, the stablishment of an air service between Great Britain and the Irish Free State would be a matter for private enterprise and in these circumstances, though my Noble Friend is in full sympathy with the object in view, he does not consider there would be any advantage in consultation with His Majesty's Government in the Irish Free State.

Sir N. GRATTAN-DOYLE: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that anyone who wishes to proceed from Great Britain to Southern Ireland at the present time by air, finds it necessary to charter a special aeroplane to Dublin and then proceed from Dublin to his destination in Southern Ireland?

Sir F. THOMSON: I see the hon. Member's point quite clearly but, as I have stated, this would be a matter for private enterprise.

TRANSPORT.

OMNIBUS SERVICE, GLASGOW.

19. Mr. McGOVERN asked the Minister of Transport if, in view of the fact that the Glasgow Corporation has refused to put omnibuses on the Glasgow-Tollcross route and that a large number of persons are deprived of this means of transport, he will withdraw the prohibition on the Glasgow Omnibus Company to lift and lay passengers in the Tollcross area?

The MINISTER of TRANSPORT (Mr. Oliver Stanley): I have no jurisdiction over the conditions attached to a road service licence unless an appeal is made to me against a decision of the Traffic Commissioners, by a person entitled to do so, within one month of the date of the decision in question. I cannot trace the receipt of any appeal relating to this matter.

Mr. McGOVERN: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in this area people have to walk nearly half-a-mile from a large housing estate to get means of transport to and from Glasgow; and, if he has no jurisdiction in the matter, to whom am I entitled to put questions about it?

Mr. STANLEY: As my answer has indicated, if there is opposition on the part of the people in the neighbourhood, an appeal can be made against the decision of the Traffic Commissioner. I will gladly make further inquiries into the matter for the hon. Gentleman.

RAIL AND ROAD CONFERENCE (REPORT).

20. Mr. HEPWORTH asked the Minister of Transport whether, before intimating to the House the Government's proposals for implementing the Salter Report, he proposes to circulate them for criticism to the interests affected?

Mr. STANLEY: No, Sir. Full consideration has been given to the numerous written representations already submitted by representative organisations, and I see no sufficient reason for a further series of consultations prior to the introduction of a Bill in Parliament. Such a course would inevitably lead to considerable delay. I shall, however, be ready at any time to consider and discuss any suggestions that may be made to me in connection with the Government's scheme when it is before the House.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Will the hon. Gentleman be good enough to give Members of this House plenty of notice before his proposal is brought on the Floor of the House?

Mr. STANLEY: The introduction of the Bill will do that.

ROAD CONSTRUCTION, SCOTLAND.

21. Sir PATRICK FORD asked the Minister of Transport what is the total estimated cost of the new Glencoe road from Tyndrum through Glenorchy and Glencoe to Carnach, near Ballachulish; and why it was decided to spend so large a sum on an arterial road in this district instead of spreading over at least part of it on road construction of more economic value in other parts of Scotland?

Mr. STANLEY: The total estimated cost of constructing the 30 mile section of the Glasgow-Inverness trunk route lying between Tyndrum and Carnach is £512,000. The scheme was included in the trunk road reconstruction programme initiated in 1924-25 as part of the unemployment programme for that year. The importance of this route, in an area where communications are notably deficient, was held to afford good grounds for the expenditure. I would remind my hon. Friend that important schemes were also assisted in more populous parts of Scotland, as for example the new Edinburgh-Glasgow road, which was of greater magnitude than that to which he refers.

Sir P. FORD: Is it not a fact that a great deal of this, to my mind, unnecessary expense is due to too rigid an application of a rule regarding gradients, which is well worth while in England but in areas of the character of the Highlands causes unnecessary expense?

Mr. STANLEY: That appears to me to be quite a different question from the one on the Paper.

MOTOR DRIVERS (PHYSICAL FITNESS).

22. Mr. ROSS TAYLOR asked the Minister of Transport if, in view of the number of accidents on the roads, some of which are due to physical disability and, in particular, defective vision on the part of drivers, he will institute a system for testing the declarations in regard to physical fitness made by applicants for motor-driving licences?

Mr. STANLEY: Under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, every applicant for a licence to drive a motor vehicle is required to make a declaration in a prescribed form as to his physical fitness, including eyesight. Any person who knowingly makes a false statement is liable to severe penalties under the Act. I have no evidence to show that false declarations are frequent, and, in any case, I think it would be well to gain some rather longer experience of the operation of the provisions of the Act before coming to any conclusion as to the need for imposing further requirements in regard to physical fitness.

TRAFFIC NOISES.

23. Mr. LOVAT-FRASER asked the Minister of Transport if he is aware that the noise abatement committee of New York has done much to check transport noise in that city; and if he will take steps to have a similar body appointed here?

Mr. STANLEY: I have no information as to the steps taken by this Committee, but I am making inquiries and will then consider whether there is any further action which could usefully be taken.

24. Mr. LOVAT-FRASER asked t
Minister of Transport how many cases enforcement have taken place during 1 under the regulations forbidding t use of motor-cycles which are not fitt with silencers?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STAT for the HOME DEPARTMENT (M Douglas Hacking): I have been asked reply. I regret that I cannot give t information asked for, as the retur made by the police for purposes of t annual return of motoring offences do n distinguish between motor-cycles a other motor vehicles in respect of noi offences.

51. Mr. LOVAT-FRASER asked t
Secretary of State for the Home Depar ment if he is aware that, on the adjourn ment of the Committee on Traffic Nois sine die about three years ago, Sir Hen Maybury, the chairman, promised tha the Ministry would refer the question o evolving a standard motor-horn, whic should be at once effective and less i jurious to the health and nerves of th community, to the committee of re search; and whether anything has bee done with regard to this?

Mr. STANLEY: I have been asked t reply. Inquiries were made from th
National Physical Laboratory, and th conclusion was reached that further ex penditure on experiments directed to wards the production of a standard typ of motor-horn was not likely to be usefu in results.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

EDINBURGH.

25. Mr. SCRYMGEOUR-WEDDERBURN asked the First Commissioner of Works whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed immediately with the building of new Government offices in Edinburgh; and whether he can make any statement on this subject?

26. Sir SAMUEL CHAPMAN asked the First Commissioner of Works whether, in view of the many suggestions which have been made and discussions which have taken place during the last 10 years as to the advisability of concentrating in one building the numerous Government offices which are scattered all over Edinburgh, and in view of the present low cost of building, he will consult with the Secretary of State for Scotland for the purpose of taking action to effect this improvement in the interests of economy and efficiency?

The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS (Mr. Ormsby-Gore): The possibility of proceeding with the scheme for centralising Departmental staffs in one building in Edinburgh is at present under consideration by both the Secretary of State for Scotland and myself. As my hon. Friends are no doubt aware, there are certain site and architectural problems which must be resolved, before a decision whether to proceed with the projected scheme can be taken.

Mr. SCRYMGEOUR-WEDDERBURN: Can my right hon. Friend say whether Edinburgh will be given equality and similarity of treatment with Whitehall in any extension or reconstruction of Government offices that may be undertaken; and is he aware that great indignation is caused in Scotland by the delay in the erection of this building?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: I am agreeably surprised at the last part of my hon. Friend's question. Hitherto the whole matter has been held up by grave differences of opinion as to the site, style, and character of the building to be erected in Edinburgh, which has made the Government very shy of proceeding with it. The other question was, if I may say so, rather hypothetical, as there is no decision as yet to proceed with the Whitehall scheme.

Mr. BOOTHBY: Will my right hon. Friend consider the advisability of providing an official residence for the Secretary of State for Scotland in Edinburgh?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: I should like notice of that question.

Mr. McGOVERN: Have the Department considered any sites at all for these offices in Glasgow?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: The answer is in the negative. I understand that Edinburgh is regarded as the administrative capital of Scotland.

LONDON.

28. Mr. LEVY asked the First Commissioner of Works if any decision has yet been reached on the proposal to rehouse a number of the Departments under one roof in Whitehall?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: The answer is in the negative.

Mr. LEVY: Will my right hon. Friend press on with this scheme as a measure of economy and a source of employment in the building industry?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: I am glad the hon. Gentleman put the first supplementary question first. I am at this moment going into the question as to whether an economical scheme can be worked out, assuming that we accept the decision of Parliament that the original scheme cannot proceed, and that we cannot have all the land originally contemplated; and I am examining the question as to whether effective economies can be made by proceeding with a modified scheme.

Mr. LANSBURY: Before arriving at that decision, will the right hon. Gentleman put the case again to this House? Is he aware that it was only a committee, I think a Joint Committee, that reported, but it was not a unanimous decision, and that there is weighty opinion against the decision of that committee? I am only asking if the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider the whole question without settling for good and all that the site should not be entirely used?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: Since the committee advised against building over any of the open spaces by the Embankment, so far as I can gather public opinion in this country has grown against building over any grass or open spaces in London, and I think a reconsideration of that point might lead us into even further difficulties and delays before we could get the matter considered on its merits.

Mr. LANSBURY: Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind the fact that an open space in Whitehall would be preserved, and that it is only a question of a choice of open spaces?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: It is a question of the building line towards the Thames.

Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS: Would not the problem be solved entirely if my right hon. Friend's colleagues employed fewer people?

Ex-service Men (Pensions).

54. Mr. CLARRY asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to grant pensionable status to the P-class and temporary ex-service technical staff in the Civil Service who have attained the prescribed qualifying service for the clerical staffs; and if he will favourably consider the claim submitted by the Association of Ex-service Civil Servants on the 26th September last at an early date?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Hore-Belisha): Representations have been received from the association referred to, amongst other bodies, with regard to the position of certain technical staffs temporarily employed in the Government service. It is not yet possible to indicate what will be the outcome.

WESTMINSTER HALL (WARREN HASTINGS TABLET).

27. Major MILLS asked the First Commissioner of Works whether he will follow the precedent set by the tablet in Westminster Hall to Sir William Wallace, who is described thereon as the Scottish patriot, by adding the words First Governor-General of India after the name of Warren Hastings on the new tablet to be placed in Westminster Hall to commemorate the place, date, and issue of the latter's trial?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: I should hesitate to lengthen still further the revised inscription which has been agreed with the donor and the Royal Empire Society. The general public are, I think, aware of the fact that Warren Hastings was Governor-General of India.

Major MILLS: Will my right hon. Friend take a long view of the help that it would be to the Martians when they are excavating sites in ancient London about the year 7033 to have this additional information?

NAVAL AND MILITARY PENSIONS AND GRANTS.

29. Mr. SMEDLEY CROOKE asked the Minister of Pensions how many of the 361 cases recognised outside the seven years' limit during 1932 have actually been granted a pension?

The MINISTER of PENSIONS (Ma Tryon): Of the 361 cases referred to the question, 272 received monetary co pensation and 89 cases were found require no more than medical or surgi treatment.

AGRICULTURE.

Oats.

30. Mr. BOOTHBY asked the Secreta of State for Scotland whether he is awa that the average wholesale price of oa in Germany during the year 1932 w 10s. 2d. per cwt., and of oats consign from Germany and marketed in this cou try was 5s. 7½d.; whether he conside that the latter price is a remunerati one for Scottish farmers; and wheth he proposes to take any action in t matter?

The SECRETARY of STATE f SCOTLAND (Sir Godfrey Collins): T answer to the first part of the questi is in the affirmative, subject to the obse vation that 5s. 7½d. was not the averag price at which oats imported from Ge many were marketed in this country, b the average declared value on import tion which does not include import dut The average price of oats in certain r presentative Scottish markets during th year 1932 was 7s. per cwt. With regar to the second and third parts of the que tion, as I indicated yesterday in m answers to the hon. Member for Mora and Nairn (Mr. Stuart) I fully appreciat the seriousness of the situation wit regard to oat prices in Scotland.

Mr. BOOTHBY: Can my right hon Friend say when he will be in a positio to make some announcement with regar to the oat policy of the Government?

Sir G. COLLINS: I cannot say whe I shall be able to answer that question Credits (Scotland).

31. Mr. BOOTHBY asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the rate of interest charged to farmers by the corporation set up under the Agricultural Credits Act?

Sir G. COLLINS: I understand that the corporation has not yet announced the terms on which they are prepared to make loans under the Agricultural Credits (Scotland) Act.

Mr. BOOTHBY: Will my right hon. riend bring to the notice of the corporation the fact that, owing to the re- uction in interest charges on Govern- ent securities, the Government of orthern Ireland has made a reduction interest charges by the corporation, nd will he represent to the corporation hat it is desirable that it should keep s charges as low as possible?

Sir G. COLLINS: I will make repre- entations to the corporation.

WHEAT DEFICIENCY PAYMENT.

44. Mr. THORNE asked the Minister of griculture the date when the next heat subsidy is due to be paid to rmers by the Wheat Commission; and he total amount paid up to the nearest vailable date?

The MINISTER of AGRICULTURE Major Elliot): The Wheat Commission ave decided to make, on or about 25th arch, a payment on account of the de- ciency payment to which registered rowers are entitled under the Wheat ct, 1932, in respect of valid wheat certi- cates received by the commission during he period 1st December, 1932, to 28th ebruary, 1933 (inclusive). The hon. ember will recollect that the commis- ion have already made an advance pay- ent in respect of certificates received p to 30th November last, and I am in- ormed that the total amount paid to ate in respect of that advance is 1,283,535.

Mr. THORNE: Does the right hon. and allant Gentleman think that he is etting value for money?

Mr. BANFIELD: How much of this heat is used in the manufacture of our?

POST OFFICE.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE POLES.

35. Lieut.-Colonel ACLAND-TROYTE sked the Postmaster-General whether, view of the dislocation of the service aused by the breaking of telegraph and elephone poles during the recent severe eather, he will consider the gradual re- lacement of these foreign poles by nglish-made poles of steel or iron, which re not liable to be broken in this anner?

The ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Sir Ernest Bennett): Steel telegraph poles are much dearer than wooden poles of equal strength; and the substitution of steel for wooden poles would therefore result in greatly increased expenditure. The breakage of telegraph poles is very rare, and in the recent blizzard the main cause of the breakages was the weight and wind resistance of masses of snow and ice accumulated on the wires.

Lieut.-Colonel ACLAND-TROYTE: Would not steel poles have stood that weight better than wooden ones?

Sir E. BENNETT: Possibly, but they are more expensive and are not always reliable, because they corrode, not only externally, but internally. We can deal with external corrosion by frequent layers of paint, but the corrosion inside is another matter and the poles may snap at any moment.

Mr. T. GRIFFITHS: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that no damage whatever was caused to the wireless pillars and structures and the electricity structures in South Wales because they are made of steel, and will he consider the advisability of replacing wooden telegraph poles by steel poles as that will give employment in the steel trade and the mining industry?

Sir E. BENNETT: I have already stated the reason why we do not employ them at present. It is because we cannot afford it.

Captain HAROLD BALFOUR: In arriving at the cheapest method of putting up telegraph posts, has the hon. Gentleman considered the saving in unemployment benefit that will result from employing men to make steel poles instead of wooden poles?

STAMP-CANCELLING MACHINES.

33. Mr. MITCHESON asked the Postmaster-General if he is aware that many of the cancelling machines used by the Post Office with the stamp reading Buy British are made in America; and if he will take steps to obtain such appliances from British sources in future?

Sir E. BENNETT: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend to the hon. Member for Moseley (Mr. Hannon) on Monday, the 27th February.

[Sir E. Bennett.]

CHINA AND JAPAN (ARMAMENT CONTRACTS).

38. Mr. MORGAN JONES asked the President of the Board of Trade if he can inform the House as to the number of the contracts for armaments in existence on 27th February between British manufacturers and merchants and the Governments of China and Japan, respectively, for which his Department has issued licences?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: An immediate survey is being undertaken of export licences which are still valid with a view to securing this information. When I am in a position to give it I will communicate with the hon. Member so that he can put down the question again.

Mr. JONES: May I take it that the hon. and gallant Gentleman will expedite the inquiries as much as possible?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: There will be no unnecessary delay.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

LAND RECLAMATION (BLACK COUNTRY).

40. Mr. BANFIELD asked the Minister of Health whether he will consider the advisability of furthering schemes submitted to him by local authorities for the reclamation of waste and unsightly land in the Black Country, in order to alleviate unemployment and improve the amenities of the district?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of HEALTH (Mr. Shakespeare): My right hon. Friend is prepared to sanction a loan for any scheme within the powers of a local authority if it is remunerative or if good reason can be shown for proceeding with it at once. As the hon. Member is aware the Government do not regard the policy of relief works as likely to provide an effective remedy for unemployment and my right hon. Friend is accordingly not prepared to sanction loans for works undertaken primarily as relief works.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Has the Gentleman's Department or any Department any effective remedy fo employment?

TRANSITIONAL PAYMENTS, TYNESIDE A

55. Sir N. GRATTAN-DOYLE a the Minister of Labour whether h aware that the scale of transitional ments for single adults in lodging
15s. 3d. in Durham, as against 12s. 6
Newcastle; for adults living with par
10s. in Durham and 6s. in Newcastle children under 18, 3s. to 8s. in Dur and 2s. in Newcastle; and whethe will sympathetically consider making vision for avoiding such inequalitie the projected Unemployment Insur
Bill?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETA to the MINISTRY of LABOUR ( R. S. Hudson): I am aware that th are differences in the scales of tra tional payments in the Tyneside a based upon existing differences of pu assistance practice. My hon. Friend remember that a conference of lo authorities was called by the Minister Health a year ago to consider this po and I can assure him that it will be bo in mind in connection with future legis tion.

Sir N. GRATTAN-DOYLE: Will
hon. Friend undertake to impress on t Minister the desirability of bringi those inequalities to an end as soon possible?

Mr. McGOVERN: Will the ho
Gentleman bear in mind that in ma parts of the country a considerab number of house-breaking cases a directly attributable to the fact that u equal payments—inadequate payments have been given to a large number young men?

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Is it not the ca that the public assistance committee Newcastle are very largely responsib for this discrimination?

Mr. HUDSON: The public assistanc committee in Newcastle have the matte of the scales in their own hands. M right hon. Friend is not responsible fo the scales which they adopt.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT (OFFICER'S ARREST).

41. Mr. McENTEE asked the Financial ecretary to the War Office if his atten- on has been drawn to the fact that essrs. Foster, Wells, and Coggins, the licitors of Lieutenant Baillie Stewart, e an Aldershot firm; and whether to sist this officer in the preparation of his efence and to minimise the expense, he ill arrange for Lieutenant Stewart to be ansferred from the Tower to Aldershot?

Mr. COOPER: The answer to the first rt of the question is in the affirmative, t it is not considered that it would be the advantage of the accused officer re-transfer him to Aldershot.

Mr. McENTEE: Is it not a fact that the answer given to me last week the on. Gentleman said that one of the prin- pal reasons for transferring this officer om Aldershot to the Tower was to able him to prepare his defence; and, view of the fact that the solicitor ctually lives at Aldershot, how does that quare with the refusal to allow him to e near his solicitor, and will it not im- ose upon him the extra expense of ringing his solicitor to the Tower?

Mr. COOPER: While it is true that his olicitor is at Aldershot, his counsel is in ondon, and I should imagine that the xpense of his counsel going to Aldershot ould be higher than his solicitor coming London.

Mr. McENTEE: Is it not a fact that he consultations will be with the solicitor nd not with counsel, and, in view of hat, will not the hon. Gentleman give his officer the opportunity to consult his olicitor under reasonable conditions?

Mr. COOPER: Every opportunity is iven to him to consult with his solicitor, ut it is obvious that his solicitor and ounsel must keep in very close touch. hat necessitates the solicitor and ounsel meeting, and one of them must ravel between Aldershot and London, nd it is obviously to his advantage that he solicitor should travel to London, ather than that the counsel should travel Aldershot.

Mr. MAXTON: What is the idea of the xed bayonets business?

42. Mr. McENTEE asked the Financial ecretary to the War Office whether Lieutenant Baillie Stewart has yet been informed of the charges against him and, if not, when the information will be furnished; whether he is aware that this officer had to perform his toilet under the guard of soldiers with fixed bayonets; and that he was refused the opportunity of consulting his solicitors before leaving Aldershot for an unknown destination?

Mr. COOPER: Yes, Sir, Lieutenant Baillie-Stewart has been informed of the charges against him. I am aware that an officer is present when the accused is shaving and that a sentry was present during the first few days of his arrest. As regards the last part of the question, the accused has been in continuous communication with his solicitors, although there may not have been an opportunity for him to consult them immediately prior to his departure from Aldershot.

Mr. McENTEE: May I ask why it is considered necessary, before a man has been found guilty of anything, that, when he is shaving with an ordinary safety razor, two soldiers with fixed bayonets should be on either side of him?

Mr. COOPER: Two soldiers were not present. In the early days a private soldier was present carrying the ordinary weapons which he would be carrying at any time. The commanding officer has replaced him by having an officer present while this officer is shaving. He is under a very serious and grave charge, and the reason must be obvious to every hon. Member of the House why the closest supervision is necessary.

GREAT BRITAIN AND UNITED STATES (DISCUSSIONS).

45. Mr. LEVY asked the Prime Minister if he can yet make a statement on the personnel of the British delegation to Washington to discuss the debts settlement?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Ramsay MacDonald): I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave on the 22nd February in reply to a question by the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. T. Williams), to which at present I have nothing to add.

Mr. LEVY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether he proposes to go himself?

The PRIME MINISTER: That is covered by the answer I have just given.

WORLD ECONOMIC CONFERENCE.

46. Mr. LINDSAY asked the Prime Minister whether the question of the reduction of hours of labour will be considered by the World Economic Conference?

The PRIME MINISTER: As my hon. Friend is probably aware, this subject has been under consideration by the International Labour Organisation, and I cannot say at present whether or in what form it may come before the World Economic Conference. It is not included in the Draft Agenda prepared by the Preparatory Committee of Experts.

Mr. LINDSAY: Is it not the fact that the report of the International Labour Conference is not to be considered until July, and will the right hon. Gentleman not consider the inclusion of this very important question?

The PRIME MINISTER: It is not in my hands.

Mr. MAXTON: Having regard to the fact that world conditions have taken a very serious turn since the agenda was drafted, particularly in the United States of America and in Germany, do I understand from the Prime Minister that it will be impossible to add subjects to the agenda as now drafted?

The PRIME MINISTER: No, I do hope the House will not put that meaning on what I have said. It is not impossible to add subjects to those provided for by the Experts Committee, but, naturally, by the terms of the Conference, I am not going to invite all and sundry to overburden the agenda.

Mr. HICKS: In the event of it being possible to include the question of hours in the agenda, will the British Government give such a proposal their favourable consideration and sympathy?

The PRIME MINISTER: It is not merely the British Government which will have to decide on that matter. It will have to be decided in accordance with the ordinary rules of chairmanship.

Mr. HICKS: In view of the fac at the Preparatory Conference at C the British Government took up a tude which was an unenviable o my opinion, is it not possible fc British Government to adopt a fr attitude towards the question of t duction of the hours of labour?

The PRIME MINISTER: That i

LAW CASES (APPEALS).

47. Mr. TURTON asked the Atto
General how many persons appeale way of a case stated from courts of mary jurisdiction to the High Cour Justice during the year 1932; in many cases was the appeal allowed how many dismissed; and in how n was the case remitted to the cour summary jurisdiction?

The ATTORNEY - GENERAL
Thomas Inskip): During the pe mentioned there were 62 appeals; were allowed; 23 were dismissed five cases were remitted to courts of s mary jurisdiction.

49. Mr. TURTON asked the Ho
Secretary how many persons appea from courts of summary jurisdiction courts of quarter sessions during years 1931 and 1932, respectively; in h many cases the decisions of the court summary jurisdiction were quashed altered; and in how many cases th were affirmed?

Mr. HACKING: Statistics for 1932 a not yet available. In 1931, apart fr appeals in affiliation cases and th relating to rates and similar matters, persons appealed from decisions of cou of summary jurisdiction to quart sessions; in 117 cases the decision w affirmed without modification; in 96 cas it was affirmed with modification sentence; in 65 cases the conviction order was quashed, and in three cas the appeal was abandoned.

50. Mr. TURTON asked the Home ecretary how many persons appealed the Court of Criminal Appeal in the ears 1931 and 1932, respectively; in how any cases the conviction was quashed; nd in how many cases the sentence was uashed or altered?

Mr. HACKING: The statistics for 32 are not yet available. During the ear 1931 there were 513 applications to e Court of Criminal Appeal for leave appeal; in 30 cases the conviction was uashed, and in 35 cases the sentence was uashed or altered.

HOUSING.

LOAN INTEREST.

53. Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Chan-llor of the Exchequer whether, in view the high rate of interest now being id for loans under the Small Dwellings equisition Acts, he will consider the ssibility of floating a large conversion an to embrace either all such advances a portion of them, with the object of ducing the interest rate to the level of e interest on the late conversion loan?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I would refer y hon. Friend to the reply given to the on. Member for East Woolwich (Mr. icks) on the 10th November last, of hich I am sending him a copy.

SCOTLAND.

32. Mr. DUNCAN GRAHAM asked e Secretary of State for Scotland hether, having regard to the precedent 1928, when an extra year was granted r the completion of State-aided houses nder the 1924 Act in Scotland, and ving regard also to the desire that um-clearance schemes should be pro-cuted with the utmost vigour, he will prepared, in view of the anxiety of cal authorities to be informed of their sition after 1st October next, to make announcement now as to any extended te by which houses eligible for the esent rates of subsidy must be com-eted?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE r SCOTLAND (Mr. Skelton): My right n. Friend fully appreciates the anxiety local authorities in this matter which at present under his consideration.

Mr. HICKS: Do I take it that steps will be taken to communicate to the authorities the end of the period during which the subsidy will be paid, in order that there may not be a rush, with men working overtime and then becoming unemployed? Would it be possible to communicate the dates upon which the subsidies will finish, in order that the work may be spread over?

Mr. SKELTON: I cannot add more definitely to my answer at the moment further than to say that the precedents of the previous occasions in 1926 and 1928 are being kept in mind.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS (NEW BUILDINGS, GENEVA).

1. Mr. HALL-CAINE asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state how many contracts in connection with the new Palace of Nations at Geneva have been allocated to British firms; and what proportion of the total cost the value of these contracts will be?

Sir J. SIMON: The total estimated cost of the Palace of Nations at Geneva is 30 million gold francs, of which 4½ million francs have been generously given by Mr. Rockefeller to cover the cost of the new library. Up to date contracts amounting in all to approximately 15½ million francs have been allocated, and of these, two, amounting together to about 870,000 francs have been awarded to British firms. The proportion which the value of these two contracts bears to the total value of the contracts so far awarded is 5.6 per cent.

Mr. HALL-CAINE: Having regard to the large contribution made by this country towards the building of this house, does not the right hon. Gentleman think that Great Britain ought to have a greater share of the contract?

Sir J. SIMON: The matter, of course, is not one which can be decided by any one country. There is an international committee which considers tenders.

Sir PERCY HARRIS: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the tenders are competitive?

Sir J. SIMON: I cannot give a general answer to that question, but in the cases I have inquired into undoubtedly tenders were called for and examined one against another.

Captain CROOKSHANK: Does not the ight hon. Gentleman think this would e a very funny building if it were built n proportion to the contributions paid by ll the nations of the world?

ENTERTAINMENTS DUTY.

52. Mr. BUCHANAN asked the Chan-ellor of the Exchequer the total yield rom the taxation on entertainments up o and including 6d. admission; and the evenue derived from admission to inemas?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I am afraid hat the information desired cannot be iven, as detailed statistics of the Enter-ainments Duty at the various prices of dmission are not compiled, nor are any igures available showing the amounts of luty paid in respect of particular classes f entertainment.

Mr. MAXTON: How does that come bout? Are not the various stamps sold t their various prices, and should it not e possible for the Department to get he amounts of them?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: Yes, but a num-er of stamps of small denominations may e agglomerated to pay for seats of a igher class, and it is impossible to tell.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Could not the hon. Gentleman obtain the information asked or in the question, and also information s to the reduction in the number of ttendances since the 1d. duty was im-osed?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I am afraid hat it is impossible. Naturally, when he question was put down, I did try to btain that information, but it is quite mpossible.

GERMANY.

Mr. BOOTHBY (by Private Notice) sked the Secretary of State for Foreign ffairs whether his attention has been rawn to the serious situation in Germany; whether he can give the House ny information on the subject; whether e is satisfied with regard to the security f British lives and property in Germany; nd whether he proposes to make any epresentations to the German Govern-ent?

Sir J. SIMON: I receive, of course, frequent reports from His Majesty's Ambassador in Berlin on the situation in Germany. There is no specific fact to add to the matters of fact already reported in the Press. As regards the safety of British lives and property, I must assume that the German Government will continue to discharge their responsibility in reference to British subjects and interests in Germany, and I therefore have no ground for making any representations to the German Government.

Mr. BOOTHBY: May I ask whether the Minister has seen the report in to-day's Press that the German Government intend to carry out a purge of its political opponents, following upon the alleged attempt upon the life of the Chancellor, and will he make some inquiry as to whether there is any truth in those reports?

HON. MEMBERS: Why?

Sir J. SIMON: I have already said that I am in frequent communication with our own Ambassador. I would remind my hon. Friend that the question that he put to me by the leave of Mr. Speaker had to do with the security of British lives.

Mr. LANSBURY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, not whether he will make representations to the German Government, but whether, in view of the statements that are very widespread in the Press to-day, he will ask the British Ambassador in Berlin to give him a report on the subject? The right hon. Gentleman himself has called attention in his answer to the fact that the Press contains a good deal of very alarmist news, and people with relations in Berlin wish to be reassured on the subject.

Mr. MICHAEL BEAUMONT: Before the right hon. Gentleman replies, may I ask whether he will bear in mind the necessity of allowing the Germans to manage their own affairs?

Colonel WEDGWOOD: Will the right hon. Gentleman make known to the German people the feelings of British subjects on this matter?

Mr. ALBERY: May I ask whether it is not still quite possible for British people to telephone, telegraph or write letters to Germany, and to get adequate replies?

Mr. MAXTON: May I inquire, as to the number of men who are now bearing arms in Germany, and whether the peace treaties that are being infringed——

Mr. SPEAKER: This is going much too far beyond the original question.

Mr. LANSBURY: May we not have an answer from the right hon. Gentleman as to whether he will ask our Ambassador in Berlin to give him a report on the present situation?

Sir J. SIMON: I was waiting to answer the Leader of the Opposition, but a number of other questions were put to me. It is, of course, part of my duty, and part of the Ambassador's duty, that we should keep ourselves in constant communication. I shall not fail to do my duty in that regard, nor, I am sure, will he.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

CAPE-CAIRO AIR ROUTE.

Mr. DONNER asked the Under-Secretary of State for Air whether he is in a position to state when the report of Lieutenant G. B. Grylls with regard to the ground organisation of the Cape to Cairo air service is likely to be made available?

Sir P. SASSOON: Lieutenant Grylls's survey of the ground organisation of the Cape-Cairo air route was primarily undertaken with a view to advising the Tangankiya Administration as to the improvement of aerodromes in that territory and to make recommendations for the allocation of the Beit Trust Grant for the improvement of ground organisation in Rhodesia. Numerous separate reports were made during the course of the survey, and they have not been collated into a single document. On this ground, and in view of the considerable expense which would be involved, my Noble Friend does not contemplate their publication.

IMPERIAL PREFERENCE (PALESTINE).

Mr. JOEL asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is aware that the omission of Palestine from the benefits of Imperial fiscal preference so far as oranges are concerned is having an adverse repercussion on the prosperity of that British mandated territory; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: The question of granting Imperial Preference to Palestine products has received prolonged and careful consideration, but His Majesty's Government regret that, owing to serious juridical difficulties, it is not possible to grant preference.

ROYAL NAVY (SOUTH AFRICA).

Captain P. MACDONALD asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his Department was consulted by the South African Government before the South African Navy was recently reduced to less than a quarter of its former size; what is the annual amount now paid by South Africa towards the upkeep of the British Navy; and whether any alteration is to be made in the size of the squadrons of His Majesty's vessels now on the South African station?

Lord STANLEY: The Admiralty were consulted by the Government of the Union of South Africa before the recent reorganisation was determined. The Government of the Union of South Africa makes a small payment towards the maintenance of a staff officer at the Cape for liaison with the Naval Staff in London. The reply to the last part of the question is in the negative.

UNEMPLOYMENT (TRANSITIONAL PAYMENTS).

Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Labour how many unemployed persons are at present applicants for transitional payments; and what was the figure in January, 1932?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The number of applicants for transitional payments on the registers of Employment Exchanges in Great Britain at 23rd January, 1933, was 1,174,499. At 25th January, 1932, the number was 906,255.

AREA EXTENSION, CHEPPING WYCOMBE.

Sir A. KNOX asked the Minister of Health whether he has yet decided that the Corporation of Chepping Wycombe made out a prima facie case for the extension of the borough at the preliminary inquiry held at Aylesbury in September, 1932, and when the detailed inquiry will be held?

Sir H. YOUNG: I am not yet in a position to announce my decision, but it will be given as soon as practicable. If a prima facie case is made out, it will then be necessary for me to advertise proposals before a further inquiry is held.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE DEPARTMENT (STAFF).

Mr. HICKS asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (1) the number of Customs and Excise senior chief clerks, chief clerks, officers with reserved rights blocking departmental higher clerical officer posts, departmental higher clerical officers (men), departmental higher clerical officers (women), departmental clerical officers (men), departmental clerical officers (women), S-class clerks, P-class clerks, temporary clerks (men), temporary clerks (women, respective grades), casual clerks, writing assistants, and members of the typing grade employed in the Customs and Excise Department as at the most convenient latest date; and the allocation of such officers to each office or sub-office in London and in the provinces.

(2) the number of higher clerical officers (men), higher clerical officers (women), clerical officers (men), clerical officers (women), S-class clerks, P-class clerks, writing assistants, superintendents of typists, shorthand typists (permanent and temporary respectively), typists (permanent and temporary, respectively), temporary clerks (men), temporary clerks (women) (showing respective grades) employed in the Secretaries' office, Accountant and Controller General's office and Statistical office, respectively, of the Customs and Excise Department as at the most convenient latest date?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I am sending the particulars requested direct to the hon. Member.

CORONERS.

Lieut.-Colonel MOORE asked the Home Secretary whether he intends introducing legislation with a view to revising the powers of coroners?

Mr. HACKING: My right hon. Friend does not contemplate any such legislation.

INDIA (BUDGET).

Captain FULLER asked the Secretary of State for India on what heads there has been an increase of Government expenditure in India during the current financial year, by how much revenue has fallen short of estimate, and the total amount of economies imposed to meet the discrepancy?

Sir S. HOARE: I am sending my hon. and gallant Friend a copy of a telegraphic summary of the Budget statement of the Finance Member of the Government of India.

BRITISH BROADCASTING CORPORATION.

Mr. DORAN asked the Postmaster-General when he anticipates that the British Broadcasting Corporation will submit to him the general reports and statements of accounts for 1932; and when he expects to publish them?

Sir E. BENNETT: The annual report of the British Broadcasting Corporation for the year 1932 has been submitted to my right hon. Friend, and will be presented to Parliament at an early date.

RHINELAND (MRS. TEBBITT, CLAIM).

Sir J. WARDLAW-MILNE asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is now in a position to state what action, if any, has been taken in the case of Mrs. Tebbitt, who lost her property in the Rhineland during the period of British occupation?

Sir J. SIMON: I am at present in correspondence regarding the precise figures upon which a claim to compensation on behalf of Mrs. Tebbitt should be based, and any action on my part must necessarily await a reply on this point.

EXCESSIVE TAXATION.

3.35 p.m.

Mr. BOULTON: I beg to move:

"That this House views with anxiety the existing high level of taxation and diminishing revenues in this country, believes that this creates an intolerable burden on industry, and urges His Majesty's Government to consider means by which this burden may be lessened at the earliest possible moment."

It is in no mere spirit of carping criticism that I venture to draw attention to the matters mentioned in the Motion. I know how easy it is to air views and to level criticism on such a wide and absorbing subject, and how often the difficulties and the responsibilities of the Chancellor of the Exchequer are forgotten. A year or even six months ago, I should not have felt justified in making this Motion, but the position has materially altered, and now warrants consideration and examination, perhaps from a wider and different angle. The quickly changing circumstances of to-day do not leave very much room for the strictly orthodox. If we are to approach the present-day position with any hope of success, we have to do so with a wide outlook and an elasticity of mind to which we have hitherto been unaccustomed.

To the credit of the Government, three important things have taken place in our national life during the year, which have weighed with me in drawing attention to this question. The first is that financial stability has been restored and the conspicuous ability with which our finances have been handled by the Chancellor of the Exchequer has placed the credit of this country at a higher level than it has enjoyed for a very long time. The second factor is the reversal of our fiscal system, and the third is the Ottawa Agreements. These three factors have made for general stability. They have given us tremendous power, and solid ground as a jumping-off point for using that stability for constructive purposes. The limits of taxation have been reached and passed, as is shown by the declining Revenue and unemployment is at a terribly high figure, and, although the industrial outlook is brighter and there are definite indications of recovery, it is no use blinding our eyes to the fact that confidence is still lacking—the want of inducement t take business risks.

It has been pointed out that larg sums of money are lying at the bank waiting for investment and for industri development. That is true, but tha money constitutes the working capital o the country. What is to bring it int active use? Money, like everythin else, requires an inducement for use. I has to be given a fair opportunity t make a fair return for reasonable bus ness risk. It is beyond doubt that th heavy burden that is being placed upo our people and upon industry, especiall in high rates and taxes, is one of th main factors, if not the main factor, tha is stifling industry. It is an obstacle t creating the inducement to release tha great volume of working capital, whic is the lifeblood of industry. It is hardl necessary for me to remind the Hous of the distressing effects that high taxation is having on the many thousands o small investors who are living upon thei hard-earned savings, and have barel enough to keep a home together, bu who are bearing their hardships s quietly; but it is more particularly fron the industrial point of view and fron the point of view of the effects on unemployment that I want to draw attention to this matter to-day.

This country is taxed about one-thir higher than the next highest taxe nation in the world. What does tha mean to the competitive power of industry in the markets of the world? I reply to a question in this House as t what it would cost the Exchequer if al company reserves were released fron Income Tax, it was stated that in a normal year, at the standard rate of 5s in the £, it would cost the Excheque £60,000,000 a year. Think what tha means. With £60,000,000 in cash, yo could command £600,000,000 of credit That is some indication of what industry is up against. When we realise the conditions under which our industries ar working, and particularly the basi industries upon which we rely and upon which we shall have to depend for ou future existence, and the struggle tha they are engaged in against worl barriers, I would ask the House, can w afford to continue to allow the risk whicl industry in compelled to take at th present high level of taxation, or is i better to shift the risk and lighten some of the burdens that it now carries?

It is with the broader and more general effects of taxation that I am particularly concerned, but, if the House will bear with me for a few minutes, I would like to give one instance, even at the risk of covering ground which may have been fully covered previously but which I believe is typical of the manner in which excessive taxation is affecting trade, and, consequently, revenue returns. It has been the tradition of our Chancellors, up to quite recent times at any rate, to see that the distribution of taxation should be as fair and just as was possible. Can we claim that for the brewing and allied trades. So long as we are allowed to eat and drink, of course in moderation, what we wish, these trades have a right to receive as fair treatment as any other trades. I do not wish to bore the House with figures, but I should like to give one or two in support of my contention. I do not propose to give many, because they have been so recently published in connection with the deputation which visited the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I would remind the House that in 1914 the Beer Duty was 7s. 9d. per standard barrel, and in 1932 it was 114s. 8d. In 1914, the net standard barrelage was 35,178,000. It fell in 1932 to 15,576,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking in this House on the 21st April, 1932, said:

> "I see in beer one of the great sources of revenue to the State, which has been for some considerable time declining, and which suffered a severe acceleration of that process by reason of the increase in the duty last September. I do not wish to see such a source of revenue permanently undermined."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 21st April, 1932; col. 1762, Vol. 264.]

Let us see how this increased duty has affected the revenue of this country. In 1931, when the duty was 103s., the Chancellor collected from it, including Customs, £75,700,000. The estimate for the year ending April, 1933, the first full year of the increased duty of 114s. was £80,000,000. I am advised on very reliable authority that it is thought that the Chancellor will collect for the year —and this figure includes only two months for which the yield is estimated— £73,602,000. That shows a loss of £2,000,000 as compared with the amount that he collected in 1931, when the duty was 103s., and is down by £6,000,000 on the estimate of 1932. At the present rate of loss, what is the year 1933-34 going to show? If it were a question of a decrease of £6,000,000 only, it might, perhaps, not be so perturbing, but how much additional loss is my right hon. Friend going to suffer in Income Tax and Surtax, on farmers' profits—if there are any—on maltsters' profits, which have fallen by 77 per cent., and on the profits of allied trades, in Death Duties on lower values, and in Schedule A licence duties in respect of public houses and buildings. Moreover, what is he losing in unemployment payments? Taken together, these losses must represent a very large total.

It is difficult to estimate the number of those who have been thrown out of employment, but I think a very reliable indication is given by the wages bill, which shows a fall of 10 per cent. in the actual wages paid on the manufacturing side of the brewing industry, not including the allied trades. If we take all these into account, it must represent a very serious number of persons who are unemployed. I do not wish to labour the point further, for these figures speak only too clearly for themselves. I have only selected this trade because it has always been the most fruitful source of revenue. I hold no special brief for the brewing trade, but I do for justice. I think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has the sympathy of the large majority of Members of this House, for he inherited this legacy from his predecessor, but I sometimes wonder what Lord Snowden's thoughts must be when he reflects on one of the greatest Budget miscalculation that, I suppose, has ever been made. He may, of course, have had other motives; I do not know; but I am always inclined to think, much as I sympathise with the temperance reformer, that he usually destroys his own case by being too intolerant.

What of the future? How are we going to replace these diminishing revenues? The present high level of taxation is ceasing to perform its natural function. What is going to be done? Unfortunately, my right hon. Friend who is going to reply will not tell me. But this April is the crucial time, and will decide and set the seal on what we can hope to achieve in the lifetime of this Parliament. It is the situation that I have outlined that brings me to the definite conclusion that, however heterodox it may appear at the moment, my right hon. Friend might deflect the course of the financial ship a little with a view to escaping still fouler weather. The Government favours a long-term policy. I have no quarrel with that, but why not apply that policy when reviewing the whole field of taxation? The balancing of the Budget requires no stressing, but I suggest that the Government might take a three years' view of taxation. I may be thought bold, but I suggest that they might reduce the Income Tax by, say, 1s. 6d. in the £. I believe it would have an immediate and beneficial effect, but close observation of the result of that relief for a few months would quickly gauge the effect. Suppose we were down by £50,000,000 or £60,000,000, and a lesser amount in the second year, that surely need not perturb us. You still have ways and means to correct that.

If my calculations are correct—and I do not think they are very far out—there will this year be added some £40,000,000 to the National Debt. Who can doubt that it would have been fatal if the Chancellor had produced a Supplementary Budget to meet the prospective deficit by imposing taxation? Cannot we apply the same method and precedent in the event of there being a deficit in the first or second year? But the third year I believe you would get a rich reward. Although the conditions are different, I do not see why history should not repeat itself. I am not alone in that belief, for there are many men with far greater experience than I have, better qualified to speak than I am, and whose views are worthy of consideration, who hold the belief that I am expressing. I believe that the bold treatment of the disease of taxation by such means as I have suggested would do more to restore confidence and put heart into our people and into enterprise than anything else. The patient requires a changed treatment. I do not think there will be very much disagreement with that. Our Chancellors up to late years have kept the patient in splints, and have bound them ever tighter as each April came round. The circulation of the patient's blood has been somewhat overlooked. Relax the taxation bandages and strip some of them off, and see how the improved circulation of the blood will go far to invigorate the whole body politic. Increased purchasing power in the hands of the people will create demand, which will be reflected in every trade, and in our export trade, and will remove the greatest obstacle to greater employment.

It will be said, of course, that it is easy enough to suggest a reduction of taxation, but how can it be met, and what of the risk? The risk of the reduction of taxation is incomparably less than that of maintaining it at its present high level and maintaining 3,000,000 people in enforced idleness at a cost of £130,000,000 a year. At any rate, in present conditions I contend that at least it would be a sound and legitimate risk which the Government would be justified in taking and would be well advised to take. Such a risk is lightened by our restored stability, good credit and the increased power that we have in our hands from our tariff policy and the Ottawa Agreements, which have given us an entirely new outlook. We have also had the great Conversion Loans carried through with dexterous management and truly worthy of this country's financial reputation. That has given us some £30,000,000. There are two sources which my right hon. Friend might call to his aid to meet any problematical risk. If we have to borrow for the Sinking Fund, I would waive the Sinking Fund and reduce taxation. A real surplus is simply a surplus of revenue over expenditure. If there is no surplus, what is the use of borrowing to replace one form of debt for another? I, therefore, say suspend the Sinking Fund if necessary until better days. I will not trouble the House by quoting precedent or authority but I cannot do better than recall a letter recently written to the "Times" by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hillhead (Sir R. Horne) which, no doubt, will still be fresh in many of our minds.

But the most fruitful source from which my right hon. Friend can draw, and one that I particularly wish to stress, is the reduction of unnecessary and wasteful expenditure. Ever since the War, Governments and local authorities have spent on a colossal scale, and much of this has been expenditure of an unproductive nature which should properly be deerred to a time of greater prosperity. n a word, we must cut our coat ccording to our cloth and the fact that ve have not carried out that practice is think the cause of much of our difficulies in taxation. We are advised to pend wisely, and I entirely agree, but et us see to it that we discontinue and ut out now all expenditure which has een found to be unproductive. There an be little doubt by anyone who has aken the trouble to study the expendiure on some of our services that for nuch of it we are getting insufficient alue. It is wise and intelligent rerenchment that I advocate and not imply shifting the burden from one ection and harming another.

Since I put this Motion down I have een inundated with correspondence and uggestions from all parts of the country. shudder to think what my right hon. riend's postbag must be, but I do want o remind him, in case he should have verlooked them, of the official and unfficial economy reports. The conclusions nd recommendations of those reports esemble each other in a very marked egree. I had myself the privilege of erving, as a very humble Member, on he latter Committee. It has never een suggested that any individual ember could be expected to agree with ll the recommendations made in that eport, but I do say that those reports hould be a guide and a value in showing he road to very substantial savings, and will be interesting in due course to earn how far our labours have been ppreciated.

The right hon. Gentleman the Member or Darwen (Sir H. Samuel), if I undertood him correctly, has given us to nderstand that the objects for which His ajesty's Government were returned to ower may be said to have been achieved. submit that the first object may be said o have been achieved, but the second, nd no less important, has yet to be aced. Retrenchment falls within that ategory, and is not the least urgent, as e have been sharply reminded by the ery disagreeable shock we have had in he publication of the Civil Estimates. I efuse to believe that the Civil Estimates, s issued, are the last word of the Govrnment in the matter of national conomy. It would be contrary to everyhing that my right hon. Friend has told s, that is, that the limits of economy have not yet been reached. But it shows how vitally necessary the question of retrenchment is, and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Darwen would not think me offensive or impertinent if I were to say that the attitude of himself and his followers has puzzled me a good deal, as, indeed, it does puzzle a very large number of their former supporters in the country, for, after spending a long summer's day with our Nationals, now in the wintry weather they are experiencing they appear to be finding an excuse for contemplating seeking warmer quarters. I say with all sincerity, is not their spiritual home standing side by side with the Government in pressing forward and supporting their own well-established principle and as a barrier against the peril as represented by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite? I feel sure that I shall have the support of the right hon. Gentleman and his followers for this Motion, for, after all, it embraces one of the oldest and most cherished Liberal principles—retrenchment and reform.

I wonder if it is any use my appealing to those who sit on the opposite benches? [AN HON. MEMBER: "Not an earthly."] I would, however, like to remind them, if I may be allowed to repeat what I ventured to say in this House when speaking some short time ago, that the question of Income Tax is not a class question. It is an industrial question, for every point of taxation imposed adversely affects, either directly or indirectly, the very poorest. Our social services are founded on a sound and prosperous industry. Destroy the foundation, and what becomes of your social services? Surely this question is worthy of their reconsideration, if for no other reason than in the interest of that great mass of unemployed persons who are expecting and waiting, not without hope, for some relief from their distress. It is with that object in view, and with that in view primarily, that I have ventured to move this Motion.

I must apologise to the House for having detained it longer than I intended, because I know there are many Members who wish to speak. In conclusion, I would say that to-day we have got to view these problems with a broad mind, with common sense and courage, boldness with prudence, the nation expects.

[Mr. Boulton.]

Timidity it will not tolerate. What I have ventured to advocate I can assure my right hon. Friend is in no lighthearted spirit, but from deep conviction, and it is with all humility that I do submit and stress that the time has now come when the Government should seriously consider the reversal of its taxation policy. I can well imagine and appreciate what such a change must mean to anyone who is responsible for the nation's finances, but I, for one, trust and believe, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend will face this issue with his accustomed, traditional family courage.

4.8 p.m.

Sir JOHN WARDLAW-MILNE: I beg to second the Motion.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Central Sheffield (Mr. Boulton) on having secured first place in the Ballot, and I may tell him that there are a large number of Members who have spent a good many years in this House who have never been so fortunate. I also congratulate him on his perspicacity and judgment in bringing forward a Motion so timely and important when the House is pressed on all sides and from all parts of the country to take its courage in both hands, to reduce taxation and at the same time to incur a good deal of new expenditure. It is one of the difficulties of a discussion of this sort that one is apt to be accused, perhaps naturally, of putting forward contradictory ideas in one speech. I am quite certain that what I have to say this afternoon will certainly lay me open to a charge of that kind, but I think that the extraordinary conditions which we are passing through at the present time justify any departure from precedent in these matters, and, in fact, our difficulties cannot be got over so far as the remedies are under our control here at home, except by both expenditure and economy.

I well remember, and many other hon. Members will also recollect, the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he introduced his Budget about a year ago. At that time he said that the path of financial stability was hard and stony, and the road long and weary, and he added that the whole country was crying out for relief from taxation. At that time my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, perhaps naturally, did not feel able to give that relief for which the country was crying so bitterly. I do not quarrel with that, but I think it is clear that what may not have been possible a year ago may certainly be possible to-day. The position is not whether you can produce a complete and an accurate balance sheet which will enable you to reduce taxation. These are not the conditions under which this country to-day can look at this matter. It is not a question only of justice. Everyone will agree that the taxpayer, to whose self-sacrifice eloquent tributes were paid a year ago, is well deserving of relief, but it is not only a question of justice, it is a question purely of economic accountancy. In our own interests, we cannot go on without industry being relieved of the burden of taxation which is bearing upon it. It is a truism, but it possibly bears continual repetition, that not only, as my hon. Friend has said, does all taxation come out of industry, but that everything we have, every emolument, every salary, whatever our occupation, primarily comes out of productive industry, and unless we can keep that industry prosperous and enable it to expand, there is no other economic subject that is worth discussion in the country, because on that all depends.

Therefore, if we are to spread the immense burden which this country is bearing over larger tracts of the production area, it can only be done by making industry prosperous. For that reason alone, quite apart from any question of justice, it is to our interest to see what relief will give an impetus to enterprise and will put new life into existing industry. I think there are three causes which prevent that expansion of industry which we all want to see. The first of these is concerned with conditions all over the world. Industry, above all other things, wants industrial world peace, which means political peace. It wants, if possible, to be assured that the ordinary political conditions of the world are not likely to be violently upset, as, unfortunately, there is every sign they are going to be, in the East at any rate, at the present moment. In that regard the Government can do no more than it is doing at the present time. It means international agreement and international negotiation. It means support for the objects of the League of Nations whether the League gives all the result we would all like to see at once or not. I do not suggest that the Government can do more in that direction than it is doing to-day, but international agreements in regard to War Debts and other matters are fundamental.

The second cause is the uncertainty of our own financial policy. In that connection I venture to say that there is a great deal we can do, and, much as I admire what has been done by the National Government, in many directions, it is, to my mind, the one direction in which they have not advanced as they might have done. I have great hopes of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose recent speeches in the country together with the answer that was given in the Chamber this afternoon, show quite clearly that he, at any rate, is convinced that there can be no return to the Gold Standard until the conditions which made such a standard possible in the past are re-established in the world.

I wish I could feel quite certain that those who have the daily management of our currency matters were as convinced of that as is the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am afraid that there is still grave doubt about the views still held by those who are responsible for the timid and vacillating policy in currency matters imposed upon us immediately after we were forced off gold. That policy, apparently, was based upon the idea that there would be some violent upheaval and that the people of this country would rush away from their own money, and as a consequence the policy of an unnecessarily high bank rate was followed for months. I do not want to labour that fact—it has passed—but I hope that those who are responsible for our currency policy to-day are as convinced as the Chancellor of the Exchequer evidently is, judging from his recent speeches, that there is no chance whatever of the return of this country to any Gold Standard until the conditions which make that standard possible can again be set up. Fortunately, to back up any opinion that may be expressed in this House, we have now the views of the experts of the nations and of those responsible for drawing up the Agenda of the World Economic Conference. If anybody has any doubt as to the certainty that you cannot return to gold in the near future he has only to read the conditions which they set out as being fundamental before any such restoration can take place.

I do not know whether these matters will be discussed at the World Economic Conference or not. I fear very much, in spite of the conditions laid down, efforts will be made to try and drag this country back to gold before those conditions are fulfilled. We were forced off gold with great and unnecessary expense to the taxpayer when we should have gone off ourselves months before. Leaving that aside, I would say that in this second difficulty—the question of our financial policy—I desire to congratulate the Government upon what they have done, and particularly upon the working of the Exchange Equalisation Account, which, I think, has been of immense benefit to trade in this country. The whole country has benefited since we went on to sterling and our trade has expanded directly as a cause of it. The Government, however, should make clearer than they have done up to now what their financial policy in future is to be, and how they propose and intend to raise wholesale prices. It is the goal to which they have referred over and over again, and quite rightly, as being the principal aim they have in view, in keeping with the rest of the world, but I think they should make it plainer than they have so far done how they propose to set about it, and, above all things, they should make it clear that we intend to stick to sterling and that sterling is to be our money as far ahead as we can see at the present time. Since that period to which I have referred—the period of weakness in policy on the part of the Bank of England and the Treasury—I think you have to combine them—we have had a period of cheap money.

One extraordinary thing is to be found in the speeches of many of the great bankers in this country. I think that it is only right to put these things quite plainly. At the annual meetings of some of these banks I read that it is a matter for congratulation that the balances on deposit in the great banks have gone up £200,000,000, and, presumably, equally a matter of congratulation that the advances to industry and trade have gone down £130,000,000. It is not a matter for congratulation at all. To stand at a table and express satisfaction that the deposits in the banks have grown and to refer to that as being a sign of prosperity appears to me to be only possible on the part of those who have never had anything to do with trade or industry at all. Cheap money has been offered. The reason why the trader does not take that cheap money, and will not accept it, is, first of all, the difficulty of the international situation and the uncertainty in that connection; secondly, owing to the want of a quite definite statement regarding financial and Government policy; and thirdly, because he is absolutely tired of having the Government as a 25 per cent. partner in his industry, taking that share, or a larger one, of his profits but bearing no share of his losses. We are told constantly by Government speakers, bankers, economists and all kinds of people that we are suffering from a lack of confidence. It is true, but the lack of confidence is not something you cannot explain or understand. It is not a psychological phenomenon. It is not something which is going to come right by itself. It is something which we can do a great deal to ensure that it will pass away without very much delay. We can do that, as I have said, in three ways.

I may be told that I have not suggested any definite way in which the Government can set about raising prices. It is hardly usual to expect private Members in this House to put forward definite proposals, but I intend doing so to-day, although I am perfectly well aware that they will not meet with universal acceptance. I say quite frankly, having declared that sterling is not a makeshift but is going to be our money for a long time to come, and making the best progress we can in the settlement of international affairs, such as War Debts and the like, our definite aim should be to consolidate within the Sterling Union, and particularly within the Empire, the exchange rates of the countries concerned on as close a basis as possible. The whole world, and particularly the Sterling Union, is waiting for a lead in this matter. It can be done, and the World Conference should then devote itself to fixing as closely as practicable the basis of exchange between the sterling and gold countries.

Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS: On point of Order. I do not want to spo the speech of the hon. Member. It very interesting, but it seems to be ver remote from the Motion, and there wi be no opportunity on the part of hon Members to reply to arguments fro which they dissent.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not, as a rul like to interfere with Debates on private Member's day, but I was jus reading the Motion when my attentio was called to it. I am bound to say tha I do not think that the speech of th hon. Member has anything to do with i

Sir J. WARDLAW-MILNE: May draw your attention to the fact, M Speaker, that I am endeavouring to ex plain the measures which, in my view will enable the Government to reduce th burden of taxation. May I further poin out that the Motion distinctly urges th Government to consider means by whic this burden may be lessened. I ventur to suggest to you, Sir, that it is useles making statements merely declaring tha a reduction in the burden upon industr is essential. Everybody knows that.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. Membe leads up to it, it will be all right, bu he is taking a long time in doing it.

Sir J. WARDLAW-MILNE: I thin that the hon. Member for South Croydo (Mr. H. Williams) should permit me—an I have not taken very long—to develo my argument in my own way, nor do ask the House for its indulgence as ofte as he does. I get back, perhaps in roundabout way from his particular vie of the subject, to the means by whic this burden may be lightened. I wa saying that there are these three cause which directly bear upon the difficultie of carrying on prosperous industry an make it essential that that burden o taxation should be reduced. I have lai stress upon the financial action which th Government should take, because I d not think that you will get any expan sion in industry until the points wit which I have dealt are dealt with an until traders have some security as t the future in that regard. If anyon suggests any form of reflation in thi country we immediately hear talk of th dangers of inflation. We hear tha everywhere when any body suggests tha prices should be raised by monetar action. It is true, however, that while retail prices have only dropped half-way down the hill, wholesale prices have dropped to the bottom. Therefore, before any rise should take place in the level of retail prices there is a long way up the hill for wholesale prices to go.

I should have liked to have dealt further with these matters if the occasion had been appropriate, but in view of the anxiety of my hon. Friend to speak on the burden of taxation, he will perhaps allow me to do something which I would rather not have done, and that is, to give him some little idea of what that burden is and of the difficulties with which industry is faced. On the figures which were ascertained for 1913 it was estimated that the total wealth in this country amounted to something like £16,000,000,000 on the gold basis figure of that date. To-day gold prices are very much the same as they were in 1913, a little lower, and consequently probably that figure is not very far out to-day. Just think of the position of the industrialists in this country if that is our total wealth and the country, that is productive industry, is bearing a burden of mortgage debt equal to 50 per cent. almost of its total wealth. There is no other country in the world bearing such a load. Our total National Debt is greater than that of the United States, France and Belgium put together. It is true that if the conditions under which we were working previous to the War had continued it might even have been possible for this country to bear that debt load, but it is certainly one to-day which makes it almost impossible for industry to prosper.

If we are, therefore, in the position that it is impossible for any Government to reduce its taxation, industry must be very prosperous to carry it. That prosperity could be assisted by inflation which I definitely and clearly recommend. I believe that the country has suffered far more than is fully realised from a long period of deflation and that it is high time we reversed the process. We are told that inflation does not help industry at all. It would raise wholesale prices and by so doing would benefit, not only this country, but the whole world. It is so very easy to talk of the dangers of inflation but that talk has been overdone.

The second way is by economy. Like my hon. Friend I recommend to the Government the official and unofficial reports on possible economies. Those economies, however, cannot immediately meet the situation, and I believe that you could make certain economies by further expenditure in the right direction. Economies are badly needed where we are wasting money. That is the real economy. But there are certain economies which you can make by spending money. For example, you have the case of unemployment pay alone—the enormous payment of £100,000,000 a year for the benefit of those who are unemployed. Anything which could be done to employ them would mean at once that you were making economies by spending money.

I want to give to the House something which, at first sight, hon. Members may say is entirely fantastic, but I will give it to them as an instance of what is in my mind. Why do we not scrap the Navy altogether, and rebuild it, of course within the limits of the most recent agreements with other nations? Why not scrap the Navy? All your battleships are 16 or more years old. They will be out of date any way, if they are not so already, before you can replace them. Scrap the Navy gradually and replace these ships by up-to-date vessels, even by a smaller number if you like. You would spend less on upkeep and it would give employment, not only in building, but throughout the heavy trades of this country. It is not so fantastic as it seems at a first glace. I am not suggesting that it should be done out of current revenue, but I do suggest that a loan of a hundred millions for that purpose would enable the Government to save a very large amount of money in other ways. We have two or three capital ships only which are less than 16 years old. I do not pretend to be an export on the Navy, but one does not need to be an expert to know that your battleships which are 16 years old and your cruisers which are 10 years old are getting out of date, and it is doubtful whether it is good economy to go on paying money for the upkeep of vessels so nearly obsolete. It is better to raise a definite loan for the rebuilding of the Navy within such limits as have been laid down in the various international agreements and set aside £7,000,000 or £8,000,000 a year for interest and sinking fund.

I hope that in the equipment of the railways, of which we hear so much, the necessity will be considered of providing a big supply of larger capacity wagons and of transferable wagons from road to rail. I think the right hon. Member for Tamworth (Sir A. Steel-Maitland) wrote or spoke about that matter the other day. That is a development in regard to which other parts of the world are setting a very good example to us. There is a great deal that might be done in that direction. In these matters the Government may require to act, but when one comes to consider the question of private enterprise, one is faced with the fact that it does not matter how cheap you make money in the banks the trader will not avail himself of it so long as these immense taxation burdens are upon him, and so long as the State takes such a large share of his profits.

I agree with my hon. Friend who moved the Motion as to the necessity for a reduction in the taxation of beer. There, again, it is not a question of the justice of the case. I do not say that because some hundreds of people, it may be that some of them are ladies, have sent me postcards on the subject. Other hon. Members have also received postcards. If anything would make me disinclined to propose a reduction in the taxation on beer it is the receipt of these postcards. Some of the writing runs from one line into another and it would appear that the subject was a very vital one at the time in the minds of those who wrote them. From the point of view of mere economic accountancy it is not paying us to tax beer as we do at the present time. I entirely agree that a reduction in this form of taxation is desirable from the working man's point of view, although I do not consider him the only person worth consideration in this connection. The postcards that I have received would lead one to believe that only the working man drinks beer. A great many other people I can assure the writers are interested in the taxation of beer, besides the so-called working man. The increased taxation of beer is not bringing in the expected revenue. It is causing unemployment, it is causing los of rates, it is driving a large number of retail traders out of business and it is not doing any good to the State or anyone else. Leaving aside the question of justice and the question of the rights and pleasures of the working man, this is a question that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will no doubt consider very seriously in connection with future Budgets.

I understand that my right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council is going to reply. I hope that he will forgive me if I say that the bulk of Members of this House—I say this with no disrespect to the Prime Minister or to any other Member of the Government—are looking to him more than anyone else to give us a lead in putting things in order and in measures to give industry a new opportunity of prosperous working. No one understands and appreciates the position of the traders of this country better than my right hon. Friend, and no Member of the Government understands these problems better than he. Many of us remember the time in 192 when he took his political courage in his hands in order to bring about a new order of things he considered essential and which is now accepted. His proposals were refused by the people then but they have now been accepted. Just as the tariffs for which he fought then are forming the backbone of our return to prosperity to-day—[Laughter]—There is no doubt about it. If hon. Members have the slightest doubt about that statement, they will be able to put their case if not to-day on some other day and we shall be glad to prove our statements. There is not the slightest doubt, however, that the real proof of success—perhaps this will please some hon. Members better—of our tariff policy will be the bringing about of free trade throughout the world. The extension of fair and freer trade throughout the world will be, I repeat, the greatest proof of the success of that policy.

I want to echo what was said by my hon. Friend who moved the Resolution, that the House has waited very patiently and the country has waited very patiently for action to relieve our present distress. Much I agree has been done but more is wanted. The House will accept almost anything from this Government except weakness and timidity. It will attempt almost any new scheme that can be brought forward, and will admire and support I believe any proposals, however drastic, if they really deal with the situation. Every one of us, wherever we may sit in the House, wants industry to be restored to prosperity, but that cannot be done except by bold measures, by the Government saying: "We are dealing with exceptional times, times just as exceptional as in the days of war, and these times require exceptional methods. We care nothing about what may be the ordinary practice in normal days."

The idea of suspending the Sinking Fund may appear to those who live in the past as something too horrible to be considered seriously. We must wipe out that idea altogether. Suspend the Sinking Fund, raise the loan of which I have spoken—which, no doubt, will be described later as fantastic—and rebuild the Navy. That cost would be a mere bagatelle. Some £5,000,000, £8,000,000 or £10,000,000 a year would give you your interest and Sinking Fund, and you would save more than that in regard to unemployment benefit. The Government may not accept that idea. I press nothing in detail upon them to-day but I say that the whole country is waiting for a lead from the Government, and in the end it will be judged by what it has done for industry and unemployment and by that test alone.

Mr. COVE: I beg to move, in line 1, to leave out from the word "House," to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof the words:

"realises that the existing level of taxation is largely due to expenditure on unproductive services, views with anxiety the growing burden of indirect taxation upon the working classes, and will resist any attempt to reduce direct taxation by further economies in the social services."

I should like to congratulate the Mover of the Resolution on the selection of the subject matter and the manner in which he presented his case. I am very much interested in what he said and I am sure the whole House appreciated his argument. I am glad that this subject has been raised, because it gives me an opportunity of stating, perhaps in an imperfect way, the position of the party to which I belong. We believe that it is impossible within the confines of the capitalist system to give a high standard of living to our people. We believe that out of the present system, in spite of the fact that we have enormous productive capacity, we have not the machinery to distribute that produce amongst the people. The Seconder of the Resolution said that the whole of his party were looking to the Lord President of the Council more than to any other Member of the Government to see that the trade of the country had fair play. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to remember the position of the industrialists and the traders of the country.

I want to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman on another score and to ask him to tell us to-night, and also the many thousands of people outside, whether the Government are still maintaining the principle of equality of sacrifice which they evoked during the crisis. At that time the Government stated that the country was in a crisis and all the citizens must make sacrifices towards the recovery of the nation. There were cuts in the pay of the police, the Army, the Navy, and the teachers of round about 10 per cent. The benefit of the unemployed was also cut 10 per cent. I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can reassure me and reassure the unemployed and all the other classes that there will be no relief of direct taxation unless there is also relief of the cut classes, that if the addition to the Income Tax that was put on during the crisis is to be removed then, at the same time, the Government will also remove the cuts that were put upon various people. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to reassure not only industrialists and traders, but the cut classes who were involved in the principle of equality of sacrifice.

I was much interested in some of the arguments of the Mover and Seconder of the Motion, but I do not think they established their case. I do not think they made it clear that taxation is a burden on industry. It was not made clear to my satisfaction that if we were to remove taxation there would inevitably flow from that fact a revival of trade. As a matter of fact, all the economic opinion that I have been able to consult, including the most exhaustive inquiry that was made in 1925, 1926, and 1927 by the Colwyn Committee, is in the opposite direction. The Colwyn

[Mr. Cove.]

Committee came to the conclusion that taxation was not a burden upon industry, that direct taxation did not enter into prices, that the producer did not, for instance, charge a price higher because there was a 5s. Income Tax than when there was a 4s. Income Tax.

I remember the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Snowden, before he became Chancellor of the Exchequer, making a statement on this subject when he sat on the Opposition benches. He said that taxation was levied after profits had been made. That fact establishes the point that taxation is not a burden on industry, does not enter into prices and does not rob us of our competitive power or interfere with the necessary capital needed for the development of British industry. It was abundantly proved by the Colwyn Committee, in the conditions which then existed, that there was sufficient capital not only to finance industry but to finance a substantial increase in trade, and what was true then is doubly true to-day. If the prosperity of British trade depended on the supply of capital British trade would be prosperous at this moment. The seconder of the Motion pointed out that there were millions of pounds lying idle, rotting. You have this condition to-day, on the one side, you have human labour and human beings rotting under our present system of society and, on the other, capital rotting, wasting, lying idle. There is plenty of capital available for effective investment in industry, and there need be no concern on that point. The Colwyn Committee directed special attention to the fact that public companies were largely financing their own industry out of their own reserves and savings; that the great bulk of the new capital needed was being provided by the companies themselves.

Let me draw attention to this important point. If the case put forward by the hon. member in this Motion has any truth in it, if hon. Members opposite really mean business, there is only one way in which they can relieve the burden of taxation effectively and that is by examining the figures of the Budget and tackling those items which really are costing money. What is the main item of cost in the Budget for 1932-33? It is the gigantic item of the unproductive Debt. Look at it. We have an estimated expenditure of about £760,000,000, and out of that over £300,000,000 is raised for the purpose of paying interest on the National Debt, that is to say, that about 45 per cent. of the taxation raised in the Budget goes to pay the interest on the National Debt. That is just a shifting over from one set of people to another, a re-distribution of the national income of this country. I remember Lord Snowden saying—I am sure he will be accepted by hon. Members opposite except when he talks about tariffs—that the rich classes of this country were not paying for the Army, the Navy or the Social Services, that the wealthier sections of the community were making little or no contribution to the maintenance of the Navy and Army or the Social Services, that their contributions through direct taxation went back into their own pockets in the form of interest on their investments in the National Debt. As a matter of fact, the direct Income-tax payer to-day is not even paying a sum sufficient to pay for the interest which that class is drawing from the War Debt.

The whole burden of the Social Services and the maintenance of the Navy and Army rests upon the shoulders of the working classes, through the medium of indirect taxation; and I say that if you are going to tackle this problem at all you cannot escape the National Debt. You must cut it down, and not merely by conversion loans, for we shall never get rid of it in that way. Let me refer to that famous report which lowered British prestige so much and helped to create the panic and crisis through which we passed last year—the May report. The figures were evidently got out by one of the Departments. An exhaustive and detailed analysis of national expenditure is given in that report, on page 235. They give the total figures of the increase of budgetary expenditure for 1931-32 over 1913-14, and say:

> "From the foregoing table, it will be seen that out of a total increase of £633,318,000, no less than £318,498,000, or 60.24 per cent. is on account of Debt, War Pensions, etc., and if there be added the increase in respect of Defence Services £33,334,000 as being generally related to like purposes, the increase is £414,832,000—namely, 65.50 per cent. of the total increase.

These are staggering figures. They show that 65 per cent. of the budgetary increase in expenditure for 1931-32 over pre-War is due to the Debt and Defence Services. They go on to say:

" Next in order of increase are the Social Services. To the sum of £99,945,000 there has to be added £12,324,000 increase under grants to local revenues that is £38,324,000 ess £26,000,000 for de-rating) showing a otal increase of £112,269,000—namely, 7.73 per cent."

Therefore, 65 per cent. of the increase n expenditure in the Budget is due to Debt and War Services and 17 per cent. o Social Services. If the principle of equality of sacrifice is to be applied; f there is to be any equity at all, if you are going to deal with this on principles f sound economy, you must cut down hat 65 per cent. burden before you touch he 17 per cent. burden. A reference has been made to the burden of local rates; but in that case there are assets for loans, ocal authorities have millions of pounds worth of productive assets, houses, electrical works and tramcars, all of them roducing wealth now and will produce wealth in the future. But here is an unroductive burden, and a burden behind hich there are no real assets at all. his is one of those curious things, an nreal, intangible thing to the extent of £400,000,000 with no assets behind it; waste. It is only real in the sense that t brings in dividends to those who own t. That is the only reality behind it, xcept of course the reality of the terrible onsequences which resulted from the xpenditure of the money during the War eriod.

A reference has already been made to wo reports, the Rentoul Report and the ay Report, and it is suggested that in ese reports we have the lines of policy hich the Government should follow. hat does that mean? It does not mean onomy on war Debt but economy on e Social Services. The Mover and econder of the Motion did not go into y detail, they sheltered themselves hind these Reports, but I am sure that e Lord President of the Council will t be much frightened by the Rentoul eport. Everybody ran away from it, d I see a consequence of it sitting on e bench behind the Government. The pression I got was that some people re prepared to say, " We do not mean at; we do not subscribe to every item; e do not want it to be known too oroughly by the public, but what we are subscribing to is the cutting down of the services of education and the health services, and, generally speaking, curtailing and crippling the Social Services."

I do not understand finance and currency, but it appears to me that the Mover and Seconder of this Motion put forward two entirely contradictory propositions. They pleaded for inflation, high prices, but at the same time advocated a thorough-going policy of deflation, which is absolutely contradictory, because an economic policy is a policy of deflation, of the curtailment of spending power. It was said that everything depends on a productive industry. No one disagrees with that, but the health and well-being of productive industry does not begin and end with the production of the commodity. It goes into the realm of selling the commodity. Productive industry must have purchasers; there must be spending power. The health of productive industry depends much more upon the ability of our people to spend than on the need of capital. There are millions of capital lying idle and there are millions of unemployed. No one can say that 15s. 3d. a week will keep a man decently, that it will provide a decent standard of life.

The amazing thing, the tragic thing is that some hon. Members opposite think that 6d. in a rich man's pocket is far more economic for the nation than 6d. in a working man's pocket. There have been demands for 1s. 6d. off the Income Tax. What for? To rot in the banks? What are you going to do with it when you have it? It may be £30,000,000 or £60,000,000. There are those who say, " It does not matter. Let us have the money, even if it means an unbalanced Budget." The sanctity of a balanced Budget has gone. I ask hon. Members opposite to tell us how that money, if it is saved, can be productively employed. It would weaken our opposition to the Motion if hon. Members could tell us that. The fact of the matter is that they know full well that what they are pleading for to-day is the financial easement of a class of people in the nation at the expense of the health and the physical and mental development of the vast masses of the people. Only 6.35 per cent. of the increase in expenditure is due to education. Education has been cut down. I have here other figures which to me are extremely important in relation to this Debate. On page 237 of the famous May Committee's Report we have an analysis of the amount that the Budget has taken out of the national income pre-War and 1931-32. The report gives tables in detail and makes this comment:

> "It will be seen that the proportion of expenditure to national income has risen from 7.4 per cent. in 1913-14 to 18.93 per cent. in 1929-30, an increase of 11.53 per cent."

So that you have now in the Budget an increased expenditure out of the national income of 11 per cent. over pre-War. See how it is made up. What are the items that cause it? You have gone up from 7 per cent. pre-War to 18 per cent. in 1929-30. Here are some figures:

Debt interest and management, 7.06 per cent.; Sinking Fund, .87 per cent.; War Pensions, 1.36 per cent.; Social Services, 1.41 per cent. The first three items together account for 9.29 per cent. You have had an increase of expenditure in relation to national income of 11 per cent. Of that 11 per cent., 9 per cent. is due to War debt in the main, and 2 per cent. is due to the social services. Take the subject of education. You are spending a lower percentage of the national income on education to-day than you spent pre-War. It is quite evident that if you are going to deal with this question you cannot avoid dealing with the War debt.

I want now to come to one or two other points. I have been interested in finding some figures which would show the relationship of direct Income Tax to unemployment. It has been stated here to-day that a high level of taxation results in a high number of unemployed. There are no facts in existence to bear out that assertion; there is no correlation at all. I have figures here from 1922 up to the present time. Income Tax for a number of years was 4s. Take the years 1926 to 1930. During those years you had a 4s. Income Tax. Look at the unemployment figures. They have varied from quarter to quarter and from year to year. They have changed while Income Tax remained exactly at the same level. Unemployment figures have fluctuated between 19 per cent. and 9 per cent. I agree that there is one relationship between the expenditure of the Budget and unemployment, but it is not the relationship mentioned on the other side to-day. The relationship is this: If you have millions of unemployed you have to tax in order to try to keep them somehow. High taxation is not the direct cause of unemployment, but unemployment is a cause of higher taxation. If you can solve the problem of unemployment you will relieve your budgetary expenditure to that extent.

We believe that it would be a monstrous injustice to relieve the direct taxpayers and forget the "cut" classes. It would be a monstrous injustice to take 6d. off the Income Tax and not put that 10 per cent. back for the unemployed. I do not believe that the public conscience of this country would stand it. What you want at the moment is not more capital. That is lying rotting and idle in the banks by millions. What you want to do is to increase the purchasing power of the people. Instead of blowing up the Navy and putting it back, digging a hole and filling it up again, and all that sort of thing, why not scrap your slums? It would be a good thing if you gave enough money to the unemployed to scrap their old clothes and to buy new suits. It would be a sound economic proposition to give money to the children in my division and other divisions so that they could buy the boots they want. That would set the boot factories going. Industry to-day wants greater purchasing power among the people. The party to which I belong has the right policy. It says that the economic health of the nation and the social stability of the people depend in the long run on the standard of remuneration, on the rate of wages they receive, and that employment can be provided only when a higher purchasing power is put into the people's hands.

Mr. LOGAN: I beg formally to second the Amendment.

5.14 p.m.

Sir SAMUEL ROBERTS: I wish first of all heartily to congratulate my colleague in the representation of Sheffield on his good fortune in selecting this subject, and on making a speech of such a calibre as to interest the House and the country—a speech that will be of particular interest to his constituents in heffield when they have an opportunity f reading it to-morrow. The subject of he Motion is one which at the moment rouses the intensest interest. Every-ne, except possibly hon. Members oppoite, will agree that taxation in any form s bad, but that taxation in some form s necessary. If we agree that taxation n all forms is bad, we can test the arious forms of taxation in order to scertain whether they are excessive or ot. There are two tests. Taxation is xcessive when it ceases to achieve its urpose and results in a reduction of he revenue produced, and it is bad when he tax is not borne by the people who re intended to be taxed but by the eople who produce the commodity that taxed.

There is, for instance, the case of the obacco Duty. That is a tax borne by he consumers of tobacco. As far as we now it is not borne to any grievous xtent by those who make or distribute bacco. On the other hand, the Beer uty seems at the present time to have ll the evils of bad taxation. The evenue from it is going down, and it is ot being borne mainly by the people ho drink beer but by the people who ake and distribute the various com-odities from which beer is produced.
gain, the Entertainments Duty. It ight appear to be perfectly fair, in a ay, to tax the person who goes to enrtainments. It may be found, for in-ance, in the case of greyhound tracks at the Entertainments Duty is being aid by people who go there to get ntertainment. But it is a bad tax when u come to certain classes of seats in nemas and certain other classes of en-rtainment, where it can be definitely roved that the tax is not paid by the eople who enjoy the entertainment.
he burden in those cases falls upon ose who provide the entertainment be-use the tax becomes a charge upon eir gross profits. I think we can get that way a touchstone whereby it is ssible to judge whether or not taxa-on is excessive and evil.

I do not wish to deal with any of the bjects which have been dealt with ready except one mentioned by the over of the Amendment. He used the t-repeated statement of the purist that rect taxation, as such, has no evil effect on industry, in that it is a tax upon ofits, after the profits have been ascertained and therefore does not appear as a charge upon the particular commodity concerned before that commodity is sold. I agree that Income Tax is better from the point of view of industry than rates, because rates are definitely a prior charge on production. But to say that direct taxation is no injury to industry is very far from true. In order to build up a sound business it is necessary to put aside money year by year and accumulate a reserve. Those businesses which have prospered chiefly in the past and which are now able to weather the storm are those which have been able to put aside large sums for development and for meeting the storm when the storm came. At a time when taxation is very high the tax is borne first by the industry before it comes on to the actual taxpayer. It has to be paid out of the company's profits before those who are running the business can see what they will pay in dividends and what they will put to reserve. Those who are conducting a business look to see what they will pay in dividends after they ascertained what is to be paid in taxation. It may be said that you deduct the taxation when you pay the dividend, yet, from the practical point of view, when profits are small you are naturally inclined, first, to pay a reasonable dividend before you put to reserve——

Mr. ANEURIN BEVAN: Is it not the case that before any taxation is paid, the Inland Revenue authorities make allowances in respect of extensions and replacements and matters of that kind?

Sir S. ROBERTS: The Inland Revenue authorities allow a certain amount for depreciation. They do not allow for any depreciation in value on buildings and nothing for extension, nothing for development and nothing for improvement. It is very difficult to get what is called obsolescence allowance.

Mr. COVE: Surely not?

Sir S. ROBERTS: It is very difficult indeed to get any adequate allowance under that head. But hon. Members opposite appear to be trying—though I do not say that they are doing it wilfully—to divert me from pursuing a rather complicated argument and I must try to get back to that argument. As I was saying, when profits are lean and when the question arises as between reserves and dividends, the natural inclination is to pay a reasonable dividend, taking into account the taxation that will be deducted from what goes into the pockets of the shareholders. The natural inclination is to pay that reasonable dividend before putting anything into reserve. That is one point. Another point is that at the present time when reserves are taxed so heavily, necessarily much less goes to reserve than would be the case if taxation were lower. If only 15s. goes to reserve where 20s. went formerly, then, consequently, the amount of reserves are considerably less than they would otherwise have been and these are the reserves from which all industry must refit and from which all new industrial developments must be produced.

These facts are obvious to anyone with a knowledge of business management, but there is another point which is not quite so obvious. There is the question, not merely of the effect of taxation on profits, but of the effect of taxation on the psychology of the man who is thinking of new developments. That consideration is most important. I mention one instance of which I have heard, and, while I do not know of the case myself, and am not prepared to say that it is true, yet it is a case which sounds likely, because it is in accordance with human nature. It is the case of a dentist who, when the Income Tax was increased at a certain period, ceased to work on Saturdays. He said that he was being taxed so heavily that he was going to enjoy one more half-day off in the week. That is human nature and we all have our human instincts—on this side of the House just as on the other side.

Then consider the case of a man who has thoughts of investing a large sum in a new enterprise. He gets out his plans, specifications and figures and he sees that if he invests that sum in that enterprise it is likely to bring him in 10 per cent. There is of course the risk of the enterprise going wrong. There is no enterprise devoid of risk. He calculates that out of the 10 per cent., 2½ per cent. is going to be taken for Income Tax and possibly another 2½ per cent. for Surtax, leaving him a return of only 5 per cent. Such a man will then consider that if he invests that sum of money in some established business—and at the present time, outside of trustee securities, any wise investor can easily find a safe investment at 5 per cent.—he will get a return, after deducting taxation, of 2½ per cent. on his money. Thus the only margin between taking the risk of the new enterprise and investing outside his business at 5 per cent., is a margin of 2½ per cent. In those circumstances a great many people would prefer not to have the worry, work, anxiety and risk of going in for some big development for such a small margin. This, I may say, is not an entirely imaginary case. I say nothing more than that.

I have to offer one concrete suggestion. I think we ought to try from our own experience to suggest anything which we think might be helpful, and the matter which I wish to mention deals directly with taxation, because it deals with the question of reserves. I suggest that the Lord President of the Council might consider issuing a bold prospectus to the nation—if you like to call it so—to say that anyone who was willing to start some capital reproductive enterprise and start it now would get certain facilities. Proposals would have to be passed by a committee—which ought not to take too long—and if a scheme is found definitely to be a capital reproductive enterprise, then let it be registered with the Inland Revenue authorities who would allow that man or that firm, out of the profits of that enterprise or other profits of the same concern, to set aside the capital value of that enterprise during the next 10 years over and above ordinary depreciation. I believe there would be such a flood of people coming forward with new enterprises as would very quickly cause a substantial deflation in the numbers of unemployed, and by reducing the number of unemployed as quickly as possible you would be reducing the enormous amount which is now being paid week by week for unemployment benefit. The one main way to keep down future taxation is to reduce the vast expenditure of this country. At the present time our taxation is a grievous burden upon all classes, and we confidently look to the Government to take some steps in regard to it. We are grateful for this opportunity of bringing the matter before the Government and of showing, as humble private Members, how strongly some of us feel on this question. We appreciate the opportunity and we hope for results from it.

5.27 p.m.

Mr. LAMBERT: The speeches delivered for and against this Motion have been of a very high order. I desire to join in the Debate because this is an old subject of mine and I remember some 10 or 12 years ago from the opposite side of the House moving a Motion in favour of rationing Government Departments. I would first offer some observations on the speech of the hon. Member for Aberavon (Mr. Cove). He advocated a policy of equality of sacrifice. He represents, I understand, the National Union of Teachers.

Mr. ANEURIN BEVAN: He represents his constituency.

Mr. LAMBERT: I make no suggestion whatever against the hon. Member, but I understand that he has some special connection with the National Union of Teachers, and he complained about the cut of 10 per cent. made in the teachers' salaries a year ago. Let him come to my constituency among the cultivators of the land and he will find cuts, not of 10 per cent. but of 50 per cent., and if there is to be equality of sacrifice the cultivators of the land are entitled to as much consideration as the teachers. The hon. Member spoke of increased purchasing power. What does that mean? It means that the Government are to enable the people to buy more commodities. A very large percentage of those commodities will come from abroad. How can those commodities come from abroad unless something is produced here to pay for them? If you increase purchasing power without increasing production surely hon. Members realise what must be the result.

Then the hon. Member referred to unemployment and said that taxation had nothing to do with unemployment. That theory cannot be maintained in these days. We have got in the world now the highest taxation since the War. We have never had taxation so high as it is in this country now, and we have never had unemployment at so high a level. I do not understand the hon. and learned Member for East Bristol (Sir S. Cripps) smiling. I understand that he is appearing in a case in another place, and if he presents a sound argument like mine there, as I suspect he does in his legal capacity, quite different from what he does in his political capacity, I am not surprised at his having the admirable record that I understand he has.

I am very glad that this Motion has been moved. I do not wish to condemn the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Government, because, after all, the Government succeeded to a terrible heritage. It is an appalling problem that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has had to face, and there is no doubt that the Government have restored the credit of the country to such an extent that money is coming here from abroad to be invested. But I do say that unless there is a rise in prices or a reduction of taxation, there must be a default on many of our fixed public charges. The hon. Member said that taxation does not matter at all. I was brought up in the school of Mr. Gladstone, and I am not ashamed of it. In fact, I am an ardent Gladstonian to-day, though I do not know whether there are many of us left. This is what Mr. Gladstone said about taxation:

> "It is a characteristic of the mischiefs that arise from financial prodigality that they creep onwards with a noiseless and stealthy step; that they commonly remain unseen and unfelt, until they have reached a magnitude absolutely overwhelming."

That was Mr. Gladstone's dictum, and he was a greater financier than any man in this House, especially any man on the Front Opposition Bench. Under that system of rigorous economy the wage-earning classes increased their prosperity amazingly.

Mr. LANSBURY indicated dissent.

Mr. LAMBERT: My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition shakes his head. I remember, and he does as well as I do, the days in London when there were soup kitchens and all sorts of things, children without boots or shoes, and so on. You do not see that to-day, and the standard of life in this country has increased enormously, but it will go down if taxation continues to be piled up as it is to-day. I feel quite convinced of that.

Mr. LANSBURY: I dissented in regard to wages. Under Mr. Gladstone's great Budgets the wage of an able-bodied workman, with a wife and family, in East London was 17s. or 18s. a week.

Mr. LAMBERT: My right hon. Friend will agree with me that the standard of life as a whole has increased.

Mr. LANSBURY: The right hon. Gentleman was backing up Mr. Gladstone's greatness.

Mr. LAMBERT: Certainly, because I think Mr. Gladstone was the greatest financier this country has ever produced.

Mr. LANSBURY: He was the greatest —well, never mind.

Mr. LAMBERT: I am very glad to have the Lord President of the Council here, because I am glad that the Conservative party is taking up this question of economy. I always think they have been devoting too much attention to tariffs and too little to taxes. I remember in this House Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, who was a great Conservative statesman, and he was the last man to follow Gladstonian finance. They called him "Black Michael." I believe he had a considerable vocabulary for his colleagues, but I do not suppose that 30 years hence my right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer will be called "Black Neville"; I do not think he is quite so stern. For the past 30 years we have always been spending money to overcome political difficulties. This has got to cease. I have said it here before, and I shall keep on saying it. We had it on Irish land, and I was a Member of the Government that spent a great deal of money on social services and £1,000,000 was voted for the Welsh Church. Then came the War, and since the War we have had an orgy of expenditure.

I have come to the conclusion, which has been fortified by the Debate to-day, that the extension of the franchise in this country has made it impossible for this House to be the guardian of the public purse. The whole system since 1918 has been one of bribing the electors at the taxpayers' expense. I am sorry to say it, but there it is, and no longer is the House of Commons the guardian of the public purse. It is always raiding the public purse, and everything which is done here now and demanded in the way of social services, and so on, always means spending more of the taxpayers' money. I think it is a fatal policy. What I am going to suggest may sound strange, coming from an old Liberal, but I am quite convinced that we ought to have a revising Chamber for these questions of finance. It cannot be the present Upper Chamber—it must be non-hereditary—but there should be some check upon a Government spending money, particularly at the behest of the House of Commons.

Especially do I say this when I hear the arguments from the other side, which are very powerful, and were put very powerfully, I have no doubt, at Rotherham the other day. There must be a greater check on expenditure. We know that, in this House especially, whatever the Cabinet proposes, we carry. The Cabinet has enormous power. We had an example of it the other day on the Austrian loan, when everyone spoke against it, but it was carried. We know, too, that in the last Parliament, owing to the fear of a Dissolution, we had Land Taxes passed by a combination of Liberals and Socialists. I did not join in that combination, but there it was, and there certainly should be some revision of such combinations and such expenditure.

I have thought this over very carefully, and after a long experience of this House, I have really come to the conclusion that it is essential, if we are to get a reduction of taxation in this country, that there shall be some revising Chamber, in order that Governments of the day shall not have an unlimited right to spend money. There is also such an enormous power in the hands of the Prime Minister. He can always threaten a Dissolution of Parliament. I remember Sir William Harcourt once saying to me here, "There is nothing that the House of Commons dislikes so much as a General Election." Therefore, naturally, Members of Parliament will vote under pressure for many things for which they would not vote if they were not in fear of a General Election. I do not propose to occupy more of the attention of the House. I have said my say. I think that what I have suggested would be of great advantage, and I press it on the Lord President of the Council, who, after all, is the master of the great legions in this House. The Conservative majority is enormous. Do let him think of this question of a revising Chamber, not only for legislation, but also for finance.

5.40 p.m.

Mr. J. P. MORRIS: The hon. Member for Aberavon (Mr. Cove), who moved e official Opposition Amendment, in e course of a very informative speech, on which, from his point of view, I ngratulate him, stated what, to my nd, is a new viewpoint of political ilosophy. He stated that the people ho pay Income Tax and Super-tax in ect do not pay it at all, in that the erest on the War debt services is rerned to them. All that I can say to n is that, among many of my friends, know it is a fact that on the occasion their payment of Income Tax last onth, and on the two occasions last ar, they did not think they were not ying Income Tax, because in many ses they had to have recourse to their nks for an overdraft to meet the deand. The hon. Member also stated that would be difficult to visualise how, and here, the money could be spent that ould be saved by a reduction of 1s. 6d.

the pound in the Income Tax. My ply to that question is that, if such a racle were possible, the industry of the untry would welcome at once all the vings that would be caused by such a duction, owing to the increased con-ence created in industry. Confidence gets confidence, and that added con-ence brings out in the English characr that innate quality, the spirit of venture. The spirit of adventure opens t many avenues wherein risk and specu-tion may play a part and employment found for our people.

Of all the subjects that one could oose for the purpose of a private Memr's Motion, none, in my opinion, is so rthy as that of excessive taxation. No bject compares in importance or avity with that of the intolerable rden of excessive taxation which we ve in this country at the moment. It a subject which should command the divided attention of this House, and I ust that this House will send a message such terms and with such an over-elming vote that at last His Majesty's overnment will realise that something al and effective must be done to reduce is intolerable burden of taxation which crippling our industries to-day. Let be frank and honest. Let me ask:
as not every Conservative Minister in e National Government promised a rection of taxation and economy? Was t the word Retrenchment in the battle y of the old Liberal party? The right
n. Member for South Molton (Mr.
Lambert) proudly said that he was an ardent Gladstonian. It was always a Gladstonian dictum to reduce taxation to the lowest possible limit. I hope, therefore, that the Liberal Members will support this Motion.

All those who supported the National Government at the last election advocated a reduction of taxation. In fact, the party to which I have the honour to belong put the reduction of taxation and economy as a corner-stone of their programme. Did we not buoy up the hopes of the business community that if we were returned to power we would make an effective reduction in taxation and have real economy? I am not unmindful of what the National Government have achieved so far. I know that by the Debt Conversion scheme £23,000,000 has been saved and that in the Budget of last year economies to the extent of £79,000,000 were effected, but still Income Tax is 5s. in the £ and more taxes were imposed in the last Budget. This ogre of taxation is destroying the enterprise and confidence of our people. I ask myself why it is that the competitive power of industry has become so impaired since the War. Why is it that from occupying the first place among the nations of the world in the matter of exports we have fallen to third place up to a few months ago? There is only one answer—costs which have been swollen by taxation. Statesmen of a generation ago advocated the lowest possible taxation as the keystone of the archway of industrial prosperity. This country to-day is taxed double and treble compared with its chief competitors. No matter where we look we discover that we are in an unfair competitive position, and never in the history of the world was there such an example as in this country of the dead weight of taxation.

This question is undoubtedly the most important and urgent one before the people of the country. Every economist, industrialist and banker has issued warnings and continues to issue warnings of the dangers confronting us. The leaders of commerce and industry, who have their fingers on the economic pulse of the country, issue similar warnings. I make bold to say that until we effect a real and substantial reduction in taxation there is no possible hope for an improvement in trade or employment.

[Mr. Morris.]

We must recognise the cardinal fact that excessive taxation impoverishes the home markets and deprives industry and enterprise of the capital which is essential to successful development, the capital which is the life blood of industry, without which it is impossible for it ever to achieve its former prosperity. I am only a back bencher, and I do not wish to be presumptuous, but I would like to warn the House not to be lulled into a false sense of contentment and complacency that all is well. Prosperity is not just round the corner, and it is futile to talk of prosperity while the tax gatherers of the country are draining dry the resources of individuals and of industry. I know that it is all very well talking in this strain and not advocating a remedy, but in the short time at my disposal it is not possible to develop the points that I would like to put before the House.

I do suggest, however, that the Government Departments should be rationed. Lord Oxford, who spent many years at the Treasury, said in 1924 that in his opinion the only possible way of dealing with this question was by rationing the Departments. If it is right to ration the spending departments of a business house, is not that policy worthy of consideration for the spending Departments of the Government? Before the War we had 15 Ministries; now we have 19. The number of employés has increased from 11,000 to 43,000, and the cost of administration from £6,000,000 to £22,000,000. I know that a reduction there would be only a small saving compared with the amount that would be desirable to effect any real improvement, but still it would be a march in the right direction.

The Beer Duty has been referred to to-day. Last year I voted for the Government in the retention of the Beer Duty, because, in my opinion, at that time there was no certainty that we would not have a supplementary Budget, and I did not feel disposed to support legislation for the remission of taxation until it was known for a certainty whether or not the country was out of the wood. To-day, however, the position is very different. From the figures supplied, I find that the revenue from beer is estimated to be £2,000,000 less than in 1931 and over £6,000,000 less than the forecast of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in presenting his Budget. On top o that, of course, there is the loss to th country caused by increased unemployment and the reduced Income Tax du to the reduction in profits of the farmer and malsters. That is a point whic the Government ought seriously to consider.

The Government have been placed i possession of the reports of the unofficia and official committees on economy, an I am certain that by a close scrutiny o those reports the Government would fin plenty of ways in which to reduce taxation. I appeal to my right hon. Frien the Lord President of the Council to ac firmly and courageously, and to reduc taxation to reasonable limits. The on thing that industry needs to-day is room to breathe, and nothing would give mor life to it than the knowledge that excessive taxation was to be reduced to reasonable limits. It would restore confidence to industry, and that confidence by increasing employment, would bring to the Treasury an increased revenue An increased confidence in industry would bring to the people who are unemployed hope and a better outlook. I appeal to the Government to proceed fearlessly with this reform. I am certain that along the line of reduced taxation they will earn for themselves a place in the annals of this country which centuries will never efface, and that they will attract themselves more favour than any of their predecessors have done.

5.56 p.m.

Mr. McENTEE: I would summarise the speech of the hon. Member who moved the Motion in this way:

> "Eighteen pence off Income Tax and a > penny off beer;
> Accept these two suggestions and the > dole will disappear."

The hon. Member tolds us that taxation was excessive and that, as a consequence, industry was suffering keenly. He went on to say that not only were the owners of industry suffering but that it affected the poorest of the poor. Then he told the Government how in his opinion taxation ought to be reduced, and his only suggestion seemed to be 1s. 6d. off Income Tax and a reduction in the Beer Duty. The only suggestion which I heard from the hon. Member who seconded the Motion was that we should smash up the ships of the Navy and immediately start -building. All the arguments of the over and Seconder and of those who pported the Motion were for a duction of direct taxation. No sug-estion of any kind has been made that ere should be any reduction in indirect xation. I have tried to find out the asons for these suggestions and the urce from which they emanate.

I find that the Federation of British dustries have been sending annually the Government for some years eir views as to what ought be done by the Government. ey said that what was needed was a bstantial reduction in direct taxation, d in a book, a copy of which every ember received, I have no doubt, they ent rather carefully into the question the social and other services and their st, and put forward suggestions as to w those services should be dealt with d how taxation generally should be ndled. A table of figures prepared by e Federation of British Industries in gard to the unemployed is very teresting to me. They stated that in 31 the rate of benefit for a man and ife and three children was 33s. a week d the rate of benefit for a single man as 17s., and suggested that if those enefits were reduced to correspond to e fall in the cost of living from the ak point to the percentage existing at at time—it was about a year or so go and I believe the percentage was 23 the figure of 33s. would be reduced by per cent. and the figure of 17s. reduced y 33⅓ per cent. They suggested that e following allowances would be dequate, apparently, or at least all that e country could afford—for a single nemployed man, 11s. 4d., and for a arried man with a wife and three ildren, 17s. 4d.

Those industrialists were asking, and a large extent they succeeded in ducing, the Government to give them nsiderable reductions in taxes and in tes. I have in mind arguments dvanced by the Federation of British ndustries in connection with the De-ting Act. We were told that if the oncession of de-rating were made an crease in prosperity would undoubtedly llow. They got the concession, and I ave figures here which show that very nsiderable reductions were made in tes—which would benefit them to xactly the same extent as the reductions in taxation which they are now advocating. The figures are an estimate, it is true, but they are as accurate as such estimates can be. The engineering trades, including marine engineering, benefited by de-rating to the extent of more than £2,000,000, shipbuilding by £400,000, the chemical trades by £600,000, the coal industry by £3,100,000, and the cotton and spinning trade by £1,500,000.

Some 11 or 12 industries, the principal ones in the country, got relief approximating to £17,000,000. That ought to have been a very considerable help to industry, but will anybody dare to say that there is any evidence of prosperity having come to industry in consequence? Everyone who knows anything about it will agree that all those payments to the owners of industry have simply been used to enable them to live a more luxurious life. No Member of this House can show me any evidence of any increase in prosperity in any industry as a consequence of the derating proposals. The main proposal of the Mover of the Motion is a reduction of 1s. 6d. in the Income Tax. The Mover of the Amendment, in an effective and brilliant speech, put a question to the Government which I would like to reinforce: "What can be done by the people who benefit as a consequence of a reduction of the Income Tax by 1s. 6d. or any other sum which can in any way lead to greater prosperity? No answer has been given to that question, and I venture to say no answer will be given. As the Mover of the Amendment said, "Is there really any shortage of capital in industry?" If there were, it might be a legitimate argument to say that a reduction of Income Tax would enable capital to be provided, but every hon. Member knows that so far from there being a shortage of capital there is a surplus.

Mr. HOWARD: What about the Cunarder?

Mr. McENTEE: The hon. Member had better ask those who are on the Treasury Bench. That is hardly a question to be put to me. There is plenty of money for a dozen Cunarders, for 100 Cunarders, in fact, for 1,000 Cunarders. I am not exaggerating when I say there is sufficient idle capital in this country to build 1,000 Cunarders. The seconder of the Motion suggested that the Navy should be scrapped. He said every ship in it should be broken up and rebuilt. It will take a good few Cunarders to equal the Royal Navy, and I think the hon. Member who interrupted me had better meet the seconder of the Motion, in the Library or somewhere else, and settle whether the scrapping of the Navy or the building of two Cunarders is of the more importance to the unemployed and industry. I have been pointing out that there has been no sign of increased prosperity having followed derating, although it was a considerable financial concession to industry. When they were advocating derating the industrial magnates of the Federation of British Industries told us that it would lead to a great increase in prosperity. In reality that has not been brought about; derating has been followed by a far greater depression in industry than existed previously. But the causes are very much deeper.

I would like to say a word or two with regard to direct and indirect taxation, because, in view of the statistics we have, it is interesting to note that we should be asked still further to reduce direct taxation. It could only be done—other things remaining the same, as they are likely to do—by a further increase in indirect taxation. In one year the proportions between direct and indirect taxation have undergone a very remarkable change. In 1931-32 indirect taxation represented 34.12 per cent. and direct taxation 65.88 per cent. Between 1931-32 and 1932-33 the percentage of indirect taxation rose from 34.12 to 39.06, and the percentage of direct taxation fell from 65.88 to 60.94. In that one year the people who paid direct taxation, who are generally the people represented by hon. Members opposite, did very well indeed in their efforts to shift the burden of taxation from their own shoulders on to the shoulders of the people who, in the main, pay indirect taxation. How have they done it? I do not want to weary the House with a statement of how it has been done, because everyone knows that it is not an easy explanation to give, and it would take more time than the House would like to give me in which to deal with it, but these figures have occurred to me in connection with the figures I have just given. In 1931-32 indirect taxation represented, roughly speaking, £1 and direct taxation £2—broadly speaking, one was double the amount of the other—whereas in 1932-33 £1 of indirect taxation is represented by £1 10s.

How is that change reflected in the every-day life of the people? The social services have been ruthlessly cut down, taxes have been increased on almost everything that the average poor citizen uses. Hundreds of things have been scheduled for taxation, and as a result the poor are more heavily taxed and the rich are more lightly taxed. Now we are being asked for further relief for industry, though not one word has been said by any speaker who is in favour of this Motion to show how industry could be relieved to the benefit of the people generally. It is true that the Mover of the Motion said the poor would benefit, but he gave no evidence in support of that assertion; he just made the statement and expected us to accept it on his assertion. All the evidence is against it, because de-rating which was a reduction in local taxation—but, all the same, taxation—did not lead to greater prosperity but to a greater lack of prosperity.

In regard to the Beer Duty, let me say frankly that if we were considering the taxes which have to be imposed on different industries it would be my personal view, though I am speaking as a total abstainer, and as one who has no interest in and no great love for the beer industry, that there is a measure of injustice in the tax imposed on that industry at the present time. The beer industry is doing very well, in spite of all that may be said to the contrary. I have a set of figures with me taken from the "Economist" dealing with the beer industry, among other trades. I do not know that it matters about reading all the figures, but I notice that the dividends paid in the industry as a whole, during the past seven or eight years, have varied between 17 per cent. and 14.7 per cent.

If those figures are right they prove, I suggest, that the industry is well able to stand a good deal in the way of a reduction of beer prices before the workman, who is generally supposed by hon. Members in this House to be in want of beer—[Interruption]—well, it is not general, but fairly general—the industry would stand a reduction of beer prices, if such a reduction were necessary, and till would be able to pay fairly good ividends. I am not very much conerned about that, because it is a matter f minor importance. I am concerned hat any reduction made in taxation hould be made in a way that will benet the indirect taxpayer, and that if here is any increase in taxation, the irect taxpayer ought to pay and not he indirect taxpayer. The indirect taxayer has been compelled during the ast year, and for a number of years, to ay taxation very much in excess of his apacity to pay.

If a vote is taken to-night on this Motion, I have not a shadow of doubt hat we shall be beaten by people with nterests to serve. Many of them are dvocating here the policy of the Federation of British Industries, from whose requests to the Government I have quotation. The Financial Secretary to he Treasury will know all about that.
have no doubt that he has had an pportunity of reading these communica-ions as they have from time to time een sent to the Government. The Govrnment are fairly subservient to that et of interests, which are able to dicate policy to the Government. The Govrnment pay far more attention to those nterests than to the majority of the eople who vote for them at General Elections or at any other elections. They re far more influenced by the class of eople who form the Federation of British Industries.

No argument has been put forward—one could be put forward, because there s no such argument—to prove that a reluction of taxation would benefit in-lustry to the extent of increasing trade r of increasing the number of workers ngaged in any trade. As a matter of act, it was stated by the Mover of the Amendment that the arguments and the igures are against it. The reports of ommittees and commissions set up by he Government are also against it.
There is no possible argument that you ould put forward that could induce anybody, except an interested party, to vote n favour of a further reduction in taxa-ion that would in no way benefit in-lustry but would benefit industrialists personally, enabling them to live a more comfortable life and to enjoy more of he luxuries, which many of them enjoy almost to superfluity to-day. There is not a shadow of proof that any such reduction as is advocated in the Motion would be of the slightest benefit to the great mass of the people, to whom I adhere, for whom I speak and whose opinions I desire to voice in this House.

6.20 p.m.

Mr. NALL-CAIN: Before discussing the Motion, I would like to say a word or two about the speech made by the hon. Member for West Walthamstow (Mr. McEntee). He said that a reduction of taxation would not benefit industry. If one starts from the idea that there is only a certain amount of money in the country, if the Government take that money the individual cannot spend it on a great many things. If the individual spends it on extra boots, it is obvious that that must help the boot industry. If there is more money in circulation, industry is helped and more people are put into employment and made better off. We are all in favour of doing anything that will help industry and help more people to get employment and wages. When wages are better, there is more money in circulation, and this country is more prosperous.

I would now like to turn to the subject of the Death Duties. I expect that the Opposition will agree with me, not on the subject of Death Duties, but on the subject of spending capital as income. If a Budget takes £80,000,000 a year as capital and spends it as income, that is not a good thing. Signor Mussolini can be taken as an example of a man who has made his country more prosperous. One of the first things that he did was to do away with Death Duties. All Death Duties are very bad. Some people think that if the money from Death Duties is used to reduce the capital Debt of the country that is all right. I have heard it said this afternoon that the Sinking Fund ought to be done away with; if that is so, the Death Duties ought to be done away with also. I do not think that the use of Death Duties to pay the capital Debt of the country makes any difference to the people who pay those Duties. Money goes out of the country, and gets spent as income, and that is bad.

I want to say a few words about Death Duties upon agricultural land. It may sound like an Irishism to say that agriculture is the greatest industry in this country. When Death Duties are imposed upon agricultural land, that industry is deprived of capital which is more necessary at this time than it ever was. Agricultural properties have to pay, perhaps 20 per cent. or 30 per cent. in Death Duties. The land is being sold, and the farmer is having to buy his own farm. He therefore uses up capital which he ought to employ on his farm. If he cannot find capital, he has to borrow it and to pay a much larger sum in mortgage interest than he did in rent. The Opposition will probably agree with us that the best system of farming is that of a tenant under a landlord, but the Opposition think that the landlord should be the nation, while we think that the landlord should be an individual. It is bad for the farmers in this country to have to buy their own land. Death Duties on land are paid on what might be called the amenity or market value. The assessment is not the same as it is in the case of shares. I know estates that produce no income, or even an annual liability, and yet Death Duties are paid on those estates. The duties are very often considerable.

It is of no use expecting the Government this year, unless they are to unbalance the Budget, to make very large reductions in taxation, but I think that the Mover of this Motion was right when he said that he would take a risk. The risk would be justified. If the Government treated the budgetary position by looking at it in relation to a period of three years, which is until the life of the present Government is over, they would do much better than merely looking at each year as a sort of water-tight compartment. If they took a risk this year I think that they would be repaid. The yield of Death Duties on agricultural land at the present time is not very big; I think it is about £1,700,000, and I suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that if he could see his way to do away with that tax, to reduce the rate of it, or to alter the method of assessment and assess land in the same way as shares, he would be doing a very great thing for the agriculture of this country.

I want to talk about another matter, especially as the hon. Member for West Walthamstow has said that it is a pity that hon. Members who were interested in certain matters talked about them in this House. Some of my personal friends are aware that I happen to be interested in brewing. I am not ashamed of i except for the reason that the brewi trade is not paying as well as it did. Th hon. Member gave a few figures, in th course of which he said that the intere on capital in the brewing industry 17 per cent., or 14 per cent. He may n have gone into the question that befor the War the capital of certain breweri was £1 per share, and that thos breweries have reduced their capital t 9d. per share. If 14 per cent. is pai upon ninepenny shares I think the hon Member might find that the return upo the capital is not very much. Befor dogmatising on the capital of any industry, one should look right into th matter and find out what the origina capital was and what the losses were and every other point connected with th matter.

Let me say five things about the brewing trade, not from the point of view either of the industry or of the consumer but from the point of view of th Revenue. In the last seven years, up to the end of this year, the estimates fo the Revenue from beer had been £29,000,000 more than was received. am not in any way blaming the Treasury because it is a fact that consumption had been going down. This year the estimate is £80,000,000, and it looks as if the result will be £6,000,000 down on that. It is only fair to say that the reason for the decrease is that most of the beer sold is not good enough. Another reason is that it is not value for money. You cannot expect a workman or anyone else to go on buying something which is not good value. Taxation being as high as it is, it is good policy for the Government to look into the situation and to try to preserve what Revenue they get now, and what Revenue they may get in the course of a few years. When a patient is bad, a stimulant is needed. I am certain if the Government take that course that they will be repaid. Let the Government inspire the people with faith in the future, and in the years to come historians will look back and say that the Budget of Great Britain for 1933 was a turning point in the prosperity of the world.

6.30 p.m.

Mr. DINGLE FOOT: This Motion is couched in terms to which very few of us would take any exception, but, during the ort time that I have been a Member of e House, I have discovered that what atters about a private Member's Motion this kind is not so much what is said it as what it implies, and that very ten a Resolution couched in the mildest d most non-controversial terms is used the Mover as a peg on which to hang ost controversial proposals. That is at has happened in the Debate this ternoon. May I briefly remind the ouse of the proposals which the Mover the Motion made? He suggested that e Sinking Fund should be suspended, d he calculated that that would give us 2,000,000. He then said that it would t matter if in the first year we were wn on our national accounts by 0,000,000 or £60,000,000—that that need t perturb us too much; and, as far as ould follow his argument, his suggesn was that we should use the money ined in this way for two purposes, and two purposes only—firstly, for some mission of the Beer Duty, and, condly, and far more important, for a mission of Income Tax in the neighurhood of 1s. 6d. in the pound.

I want to join with the hon. Member Aberavon (Mr. Cove) and others who ve spoken—most of them from the Opsition benches—in protesting against y proposal of that kind. It is a prosal which did not emanate in the first ce from the hon. Member for Central effield (Mr. Boulton), but was adnced a few days ago by the right hon. ntleman the Member for Hillhead (Sir Horne) in a letter to the "Times," and had some support, I think, in a ding article in the "Times." We have velled a very long way since the t General Election if we are going to ten to proposals of that kind in this use. May I remind the House of what ppened in the period August-October, 31? We were told that heavy sacrifices st be required from every section of e community, and heavy sacrifices were, fact, exacted from every section of the mmunity. There was the increase in e standard rate of Income Tax; there re the cuts in the pay of the Services, e teachers and the police; but, in my w—personally, I have never used the pression "equality of sacrifice"—atively much the heaviest sacrifice was manded from the unemployed. The tional Government imposed those rdens and made those cuts before the General Election, and then it went to the country and asked for an endorsement of them. It won the most remarkable victory, as I think, in modern political history, because, of all the millions of people who voted for the National Government, practically every one was going to be poorer as a result of the policy which that Government had already introduced and carried through. As I have said, it was, perhaps, the most remarkable verdict in our political history.

Why were those sacrifices made? Why was it that even the unemployed themselves in large numbers consented to the cut that was made in the very small amount that they received from week to week? They consented to it because of the argument put forward that above all things, if we were to retain our financial stability, we must have a balanced Budget, and the central argument on which the National Government was returned at the last General Election was the argument of the supreme necessity of balancing the national accounts. The unemployed and the others accepted the cuts on the basis that the Budget had to be balanced. Now the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hillhead and the hon. Member who moved this Motion come along and say, "Undo what was done in 1931; unbalance your Budget; it does not matter any longer about having a balanced Budget; unbalance your national accounts, not in order to restore those cuts, but for the sole and exclusive benefit of the direct taxpayer."

HON. MEMBERS: No!

Mr. BOULTON: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. Member, but he is misconstruing, perhaps unintentionally, what I said. My words were: "The balancing of the Budget requires no stressing."

Mr. FOOT: It will be within the recollection of the House that the hon. Member went on to say that, even if in the first year of his scheme the national accounts were down by some £50,000,000 or £60,000,000, that need not perturb us too much; and, if that does not mean unbalancing the Budget, I personally do not understand what it does mean. I say that the whole trend of the hon. Member's remarks in moving the Motion was that it was worth while to take a risk—I think that that was his phrase—and, temporarily at any rate, to unbalance the Budget. No one disputes the burden of indirect taxation. I myself speak an an Income Tax payer, at any rate in a small way, and none of us in this House is likely to dispute how heavy a burden direct taxation is. But if it is possible—I do not know if it will be possible, but if by any means it is possible—in the Budget of this year, to give any form of relief, I feel that the first claim on that relief should go, not to the direct taxpayer, however heavy his burden may be, and not even to those other classes who suffered very severe cuts, but that the first claim on any relief that it may be possible to give should be the claim of the unemployed.

Supposing that it were possible to spare even some £5,000,000 or £6,000,000, that, at a rough estimate would enable the standard rate of unemployment benefit to be raised from 15s. 3d. to something in the neighbourhood of 16s. The Mover of the Motion said that we needed an increased circulation of blood in the body politic, and that we needed increased purchasing power in the hands of the people. The remission of direct taxation may or may not increase purchasing power. The money may be put into the bank; some direct taxpayers may even spend it abroad; but, if it is possible to give relief, to however small an extent, to the unemployed, it is quite certain that every penny of that relief will go in increased purchasing power, and that every penny of it will be spent to the very best advantage. I am not for a moment opposing the idea of diminishing, when it is possible to do so, the burden of direct taxation. I think that all of us, even hon. Members on the Opposition Benches, realise how heavy that burden has become. But I feel that, even though most of us in this House may be direct taxpayers, we realise that the heaviest sacrifice of all was demanded from the unemployed, and I think that, if and when it is possible for any relief to be given from the arduous burdens imposed in 1931, the claim of the unemployed should be paramount.

Viscount CRANBORNE: We have before us this afternoon a Motion in favour of reduced expenditure, and an Amendment has been moved, with very great ability, if I may say so, by t hon. Member for Aberavon (Mr. Cov repudiating that proposal. It is on t Amendment that I should like to spea The hon. Member was not mere destructive in what he said; he had remedy; and his remedy, as I understo it, was that we should maintain Gover ment expenditure and, if possible, i crease it, raising taxation, if that we required, in order to put more purcha ing power in the hands of the unem ployed. That is what I took the ho Member to say, and I think it is a fa account of what he said.

This is not a new remedy. I have on had the honour of being in this Hous for two years, but I have heard the sam remedy put forward by hon. Membe opposite a great many times, and, i deed, they put it into force during t two years for which they were in offic They spent, if I remember rightly, abou £100,000,000 on relief schemes for t unemployed. They did that with t very best intentions, but, as the Cha cellor of the Exchequer pointed out las week, the only result was to raise t number of people unemployed b 1,600,000. I do not want to ove state the case. It is obvious that tha was not the only cause, but we on thi side of the House believe that it was material cause. I believe that a mai cause of that increase was that increas ing expenditure and taxation struck very great blow at confidence. The hon Member for Aberavon said that he ha never heard any direct evidence tha taxation influenced employment. would like to quote a few words from the Final Report of the Balfour Com mittee on Trade and Industry. Th report states, on page 248, that:

> "While the Income Tax, being a charg on profits, is not in the main a burden o industrial costs, nevertheless a high rat of taxation has very serious effects on com petitive power, both by diminishing th fund out of which the bulk of the nationa savings are accumulated, and extension and improvements of industrial plant pro vided, and also by discouraging enterpris and initiative."

I know that hon. Members opposite do not hold that view. One of the first speeches that I heard after I came into this House was a speech by a right hon. Gentleman who was at that time their Leader, and who is now Lord Snowden. I remember that he said at that time that saving was a question of individual abit; and he went on to explain that his opinion, once a man had got the abit, nothing would make him alter it. f course, that is perfectly true with reard to an individual. We all know that here are people who are more apt to ave, and people who are more apt to pend. But, nationally, there is bviously a great deal more in it than hat. Saving on the part of the nation undoubtedly dependent on another ondition, and that is the condition of ecurity. People put by money for a ainy day, as we say, and they only put by because they feel that it will be here when the rainy day comes. That why there is very much more investment in civilised countries than there is n uncivilised countries, because in the ormer the security is greater. Decrease he security, and you decrease the incentive to save and produce. I know that on. Members opposite do not hold that iew. I remember that when I heard ord Snowden's speech it reminded me f a very old fable about a man who said hat he could teach his horse to live pon nothing. Every day he gave it just little less and less food, until at last ne day came when he was to give it othing at all. On that day, however, y an unfortunate accident the horse ied, and, therefore, as he explained to is friends, he would never know whether e had been right or wrong. If you ubstitute the word "enterprise" for horse," and "profits" for "food," you will get a very near analogy. Hon. Genemen opposite thought two years ago hat they could get industry and enterprise to live upon nothing. But the orse, willing though it was, pined away nd died. That is one of the main auses why we have reached the situation in which we are to-day.

The principle underlying the policy put orward by the hon. Member for beravon is, as I understand it, that he roposes to re-distribute wealth by means of taxation, and increase the consuming power of the poor. All that one an say is that that policy has been ried, and has disastrously failed. The money has been spent, taxation has been increased, and the umber of people unemployed is far reater to-day than it was before. t is really impossible for hon. Gentlemen opposite to argue any more that, when taxation is imposed upon a rich man, he alone pays it. What happens in practice, when an employer is very heavily taxed? He knows that, if he makes a profit, the vast proportion of it will go to the State and, if he makes a loss, he will have to bear it himself. Therefore, if he is making a loss, he limits it in the only way he can, and that is by closing his works. Who suffers? It may be said that he suffers because he does not make a profit; but the only persons who really suffer are his workpeople, because they are reduced from good wages of 40s. or 50s. or 60s. to the dole. I am certain that hon. Members opposite put their policy forward with the highest motives. But it is not really a policy of economy. It is a sentimental policy. From the point of view of the social services themselves I believe a reduction in taxation is desirable. For the Government has no money of its own. All the money it has comes from productive industry. And, if industry cannot produce at a profit, there will be no social services at all or, at least, they will have to be very greatly reduced. The hon. Member who spoke last said that relief ought to be given first of all to the unemployed. I believe that first of all relief ought to be given to the country and, if the country gets relief, everyone in the country will benefit.

6.46 p.m.

Mr. DENMAN: I should like to put a rather different point of view from those which have hitherto been put before the House because, unlike most Members, I do not really endorse either the Motion or the Amendment. It seems to me that they both stress points which are not of real importance and call attention to rather secondary things. The Motion itself is one of gloom and despondency. Both the Mover and the Seconder implored the Government to show courage, and not timidity. I think their Motion shows a lack of courage. The sort of Motion that I should have liked the House to accept would be:

> "The House views with satisfaction the financial strength of the country, will support the Government in maintaining a balanced Budget, and looks to the Government to assist in lightening the burden of industry by a policy of gradual and limited price raising."

The House surely ought to realise and feel immense pleasure in what the Government have achieved and the amazing financial strength that we have attained. We have had this combined position of high taxation coupled with the maintenance of social services, though not at the height or the standard that we should have liked—straitened but not strangled. We are maintaining them at the cost of high taxation, and at the same time we have a financial position of unrivalled strength throughout the world. I would ask anybody in the House who has any responsibility for running a business concern, Is there any country in the world to which he would prefer to transfer his business? There are plenty of countries with lower taxation, if he wants lower taxation. What he will not find anywhere in the world is a country which has succeeded, by imposing high taxation, in maintaining the level of social services and maintaining a position of confidence and financial strength. Industries have been strengthened enormously by the appreciation of reserves which has resulted from the Chancellor's Conversion scheme. Company after company has almost been pulled out of the mire by having its reserves so strengthened. Is not that a thing for which to be grateful? When we get these rather airy and light-hearted suggestions for dreamy and speculative finance, casting away big blocks of our revenue, I submit that we ought to reject those alluring schemes and be content to accept such taxation as is necessary to maintain the financial stability of the country. The whole basis of our industrial prosperity depends on the knowledge of the whole world that we are essentially financially sound. That gives a basis of confidence, and on that basis alone we shall rise in time to prosperity.

The LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL (Mr. Baldwin): It is not without interest to reflect that a very well-known Member of Parliament of the name of Hume, 111 years ago, moved as an Amendment to the Address:

> "That we cannot but express most respectfully to His Majesty our opinion, that an excessive taxation, disproportionate to the reduced value of all property, is a principal cause of those distresses; and humbly to intreat that he will be graciously pleased immediately to direct such reductions in every branch of our expenditure, from the highest to the lowest department, as shall enable us forthwith to relieve H Majesty's faithful people from a larg portion of that burthen of taxation, which in their present impoverished condition presses so heavily upon all classes."

History repeats itself and, as this coun try extricated itself from the difficultie that existed at the time when Hum moved that Amendment, so I trust an believe that with perseverance we shall extricate ourselves from the difficulty i which we find ourselves to-day. I mus apologise to the House for taking th place of the Chancellor of the Ex chequer, who is the proper Minister t deal with a Debate of this kind. He ha an old engagement to speak to-night i the country, and the House knows how difficult it is to get out of those engagements when once made. But perhaps i is a little easier for me, not being Chancellor, to speak on this subject, because it really is impossible for a Chancellor to speak with any freedom on a question of this kind when the shadow of the Budget is already hanging over his head. I have had some experience in taking part in these Debates, now many years ago, and though there is little that one can say, for the same reason that the Chancellor himself would be found rather fettered, I hope I may be able, by commenting on and perhaps criticising some of the observations which have been made, to make my contribution before we decide whether or not we will adopt the Motion before the House.

I should like to begin by congratulating most warmly the Members of my own party who, at great sacrifice to themselves, have put in so much work on that most difficult subject of examining what economies were and were not possible in the expenditure of the country. Their investigation has been of great service and on one or two points the Government have already adopted their suggestions —the abolition of the housing subsidy, for instance—and I can assure them that the Chancellor is examining with sympathy and with care the suggestions that have been put forward. I do not know whether there is any truth in it—all kinds of rumours reach me in my position as Lord President—but I have heard that some of those who have advocated various economies were a little less enthusiastic in desiring to see them pursued than they have been when they first advocated them.

First of all, let me say a word about e speech of my hon. Friend who moved e Motion. I thought both the quality d the temper of his speech were admir- le, and I listened with much interest what he had to say. He began by ying he wanted to see on the part of e Government a wide outlook and asticity of mind. Those are two quali- es which I have always flattered myself am not without. He spoke of one sub- ct the idea of which has been advo- ted in many quarters, that is, a anned Budget over a term of years. I ve no doubt that, when my right hon. riend considers his Budget, he will not il to give his attention to every sug- estion that has been made to make his sk less difficult than it would naturally e. My hon. Friend went on to speak of e way in which Income Tax affects the mpetitive power of this country. That ing a subject which interests me very uch, as having been at the Treasury at e time when the Income Tax was raised rom what we used to consider a normal gure to the height at which it stands to- ay, there are one or two observations at I should like to make, first of all erhaps in the way of comfort. It is ite impossible, I believe, to calculate y any process open to us what the real lative weight of direct taxation is on e industry of one country and another, ecause we have no reliable data of the roportion of the total taxation in this untry to the total wealth and total in- me of this country—those are very rele- ant factors—or, indeed, to the compara- ve distribution of both wealth and in- me in other countries. You have also reckon as permanent factors the eneral character of the industries in ch country.

Remember that we are the first country apply our direct taxation, at enormous gures, to the balancing of our Budget. o other country has approached us in hat we have done in that direction, but is certain that other countries will have follow us in some form of taxation or ave their Budgets unbalanced, and nbalanced Budgets over a term of years ean bankruptcy. Until the time comes at we are all on a level in that work nd have balanced Budgets, we have nother reason for knowing that we annot really assess the real relative osition of ourselves and other countries with regard to the incidence of Income Tax. It does not in the least follow that Income Tax is not, in the words of the Motion, an intolerable burden. So much has been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself. I know, as every Member of this House knows, that, theoretically, Income Tax is not a charge on industry, but I heard an interesting quotation given by my Noble Friend the Member for Dorsetshire (Viscount Cranborne) which he took from the Report of the Balfour Committee. I agree entirely with what was said there. There is no doubt very high Income Tax, plus Surtax and Death Duties, all at exorbitant rates, does lower the level of the pool of savings for investment of the country. There is also the psychological effect when trade is bad. The collection of so large a part of income, for the purposes of the Government, depresses very heavily—and far more than would be the case if trade were good—all those on whose skill, brain and energy the satisfactory conduct of business depends. I think anyone who has experience, or knowledge, will agree that, theoretically, whatever may be said about the incidence of Income Tax, there is no doubt that, except in the best of times, it does act as a great burden on the industry of the country.

My hon. Friend mentioned one subject, which was mentioned by a great many other Members, namely, beer. I should like to pay tribute to the altruistic question, propounded by that warm heart we all know he has, of the hon. Member for West Ham (Mr. Thorne), who was so worried because at Streatham it was impossible to get a half-pint measure. No half-pint measure would have any interest to him. I sympathise very deeply with what has been said about beer, but I think that, in the rather judicial view I am trying to give in this Debate, I ought perhaps just to put one consideration which is sometimes overlooked. I know the argument about the Beer Duty with regard to unemployment—unemployment both in the industry and in agriculture. They are weighty arguments undoubtedly, and must be considered. But there is one argument which is used—that lowering of the tax would be necessarily followed by such a large increase of consumption that the loss to the revenue would be negligible. We have had many disappointments in similar respects. There is no doubt that the habit of beer drinking, for good or evil—very likely caused in the first instance by high war taxation—has changed in this country. The money which used to be spent on beer is now largely spent on other things.

I said there were similar cases. I look back a few years to the last time when I was in the Government. We brought in, just as the close of our term, a Measure which we all hoped would be of great benefit to the country—the Measure for rating relief. We hoped, and believed, that it would have a really stimulating effect on the railway services of this country. It may be that we did not realise the way in which the railway habit has been changing in this country. People are taking themselves, and their goods, more and more to the roads. Of course, the result was a terrible falling off and depression in traffic. The fact remains that a most substantial help, which was meant to be a stimulus, failed completely to save this falling traffic which is now causing such anxiety to so many people in this country. This point might be borne in mind. I do not commit myself either way, and it would be most unfair to give any views of my own at this moment, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer has that most difficult task, envied by no one in this House, of getting his Budget ready in the next few weeks.

The question which has been raised in many quarters was also raised by an hon. Member—the suspension of the Sinking Fund. That again is a subject which, of course, will be examined and every relevant factor will be borne in mind. I would like to say something in this connection, which I can do without betraying any secrets. Everyone seems to speak as though there was going to be a large surplus. There may be; I do not know. I know just as well, no better and no worse, than every other Member. Every Member who has an income of any kind from invested funds whether small, medium, or large, will agree that, never has he known so many cases where his income has been reduced, or where dividends have failed to be paid at all as in this last year. He knows perfectly well that that will be reflected directly in terms of Inland Revenue. I have, purposely, not looked at any figures, bu I cannot see how, until there is a rea improvement in trade, you are going t get any improvement in the figures o what has been for so long, and is to-day the real standby of the Inland Revenu returns.

My hon. Friend who sits for a constituency adjoining my own—he had th satisfaction of winning a seat which was unable to win many years ago—wa much bolder. He began what looke like being a very interesting discussio on the raising of prices, but I think i dawned on him that that is a subject o discussion next Wednesday. Then h spoke of three measures which migh help the Budget. One was inflation, o which I certainly do not propose to embark to-day. The second was economy with which we all agree. The third wa useful work. He mentioned wagons which I remember being mentioned som time ago. It is very interesting to know that the Great Western Railway have placed, or are on the point of placing, very large order for 20-ton wagons, and if that be successful, as I hope and believe it will, then we may see that example followed in many parts of the country. I think he put his finger on a very practical spot there. I think that large-wagon building for commercial purposes is one of the directions in which we may look with some moderate hopes. Frankly, although I do not wish to betray any confidence, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not yet considered the rebuilding of the Navy. If he returns in safety from Derby, I will tell him of the scheme, and I have no doubt he will give it his most careful consideration.

The hon. Member for Aberavon (Mr. Cove) has a gift which has been denied to me. He can whip himself in two or three minutes into a fervent enthusiasm about anything. I listened with much interest to what he said, but I was rather puzzled by some of the figures he gave about percentages. I do not want to deal with figures, and I do not want to give more than one minute to this matter. I only wish to refer to the matter, because, unintentionally on his part, for a short time he misled me, and he may have misled other Members of the House. The figures he quoted were taken from the Minority report on National Expenditure and the percentages were the percentages of increase.

Mr. COVE: That is what I said.

Mr. BALDWIN: It was difficult to llow. When you are told that the in- ease since the War was only 15 per nt. for the social services, it does not ake you realise the actual fact that the cial services have risen since 1913 from out £14,000,000 a year to £100,000,000 year. I just wanted to mention that case other hon. Members had been sled. I was very much surprised at the rcentage, and did not at first realise was the percentage difference between 13 and now. Of course, it is perfectly vious that when you have a war, and r debts, that the percentage of these bts is an enormous volume of the total crease.

Mr. COVE: I read the exact words.

Mr. BALDWIN: I make no accusation ainst the hon. Member. I wanted to plain to my friends. The hon. Member ust recollect that we have a reputation being slow thinkers. I was very glad hear my hon. Friend the Member Ecclesall (Sir S. Roberts). He, turally, coming from Sheffield, was very terested in new productive enterprise. think the suggestion he made was very teresting and well worthy of considera- n. The most amazing suggestion was m my old Friend the Member for South lton (Mr. Lambert). I remember many ars ago Mr. Asquith saying to me: "I ve long ceased to be either surprised, disgusted, at anything that can hap- n." In this matter the question of dis- st does not come in, and I have ceased be surprised at anything. While at st sight it seemed a very plausible sug- stion we cannot forget what has been the blood of this House for many cen- ries. The House has fought for premacy in finance and whether another dy was co-equal, or superior, whatever rty was in power in this House, I think ere would be a continuous fight until s House either went under or came t on top.

The hon. Member for North Salford r. J. P. Morris) also made an interest- speech. He spoke about rationing Departments. What does one mean actly by rationing? You may say that one way the Departments are rationed w. Their expenditure is carefully ecked, and certain things are allowed d certain things are disallowed. By that rationing he means that when a Department has put in a figure, and when you have more or less got an agreement what that figure shall be, you say: "Then you are going to have 75 per cent. of that." The difficulty with that is that you cannot apply rationing to War pensions or to any Department where any large portion, or the whole portion, of its expenditure is statutory or contractual. I can assure my hon. Friends, as having had some experience both of Government Departments and of "axes," because I was alive when the Geddes axe was wielded, there are immense practical difficulties in the way of rationing. If you attempted to carry out rationing, even on a Department where the bulk of its expenditure was not a statutory or contractual obligation, you would in fact create great anomalies and great hardships, and you would probably do some very grave injustices. It is really too much like the unjust steward rendering his accounts.

I have dealt with a number of the speeches, and I am sure that everyone will feel that we have had a most useful Debate. These Debates on Wednesdays are of the greatest value for ventilating opinions. They are not, and cannot be, Debates in which Ministerial policy is set forth at any length. I was myself for so many years a private Member that I am always very jealous of these days for the private Members, and I am very glad to think that to-day has been a private Member's day, and that we have had no speech from any Front Bench except the one which, as a matter of courtesy, I am delivering to the House at this moment.

I should like to make one or two general observations before I sit down. The burden of this Debate has been the urging upon the Government not to relax for one moment the pressure for economy. Not much has been said directly to-day as to the direction in which economy is to be sought, but it is clear that in the minds of every Member is that desire, even if we cannot repeat—and no one expects us to repeat—the phenomenal reductions which were made between 1931 and 1932, yet they do want to feel that the Government will not relax their pressure, Departmental pressure all the time. They want to feel that the Government fully realise the pressure and the burdens of taxation. Anyone who has read the recent speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will recognise freely that he regards the present burden as excessive. He also said the other day that to increase that burden would be disastrous, and he has given very definite pledges about economy. He said in a speech delivered about a month ago—

> "While we cannot expect to save tens of millions of pounds by economy, there are economies which individually may not be of a very striking character, but put together they make up a substantial sum, and it will be the duty of the Government to show the House of Commons and the country that they will not tolerate unnecessary expenditure until it is possible again to reduce taxation."

The scrutiny, I can assure the House, is always going on, and in the aggregate the savings are important. Out of this year's Estimates, excluding some 11 mainly token votes which show no change, well over half show a reduction, which is no mean performance after what was done last year, and of those that show increases three of them are increased solely by reason of the absence of receipts from Ireland, quite a number solely by reason of the fall in receipts from fees of different kinds, and a few have been increased by the growth of contractual charges. The watch is constant on expenditure, and I can assure the House that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Financial Secretary—a very important person in these days—and the whole of that most efficient staff at the Treasury are as alive to their responsibilities as any Member of this House would like to see them.

I want to say a word on the reduction of taxation. I want to tell the House how I regard it. I am not going to give my views of what ought to be done, because here again I should be impinging on the prerogative of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am not the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I do not see, as he has said in that speech, from where reductions of tens of millions are to come. I believe that you will never get them unless some course were pursued, as has been advised in some quarters today, of gambling with the future. I believe that the real reduction of taxation will come when you are able to get an increase of revenue. That sounds a platitude, but until you can get the yield of the revenue, and especially those great Inland Revenue duties, unless you get an increase there, I do not see very much prospect of getting substantial reliefs apart from that. Those can only come by an improvement in trade.

I come back to the question of the employment of our people. There is nothing which has exercised my mind during the last 11 years more than that. Allusion was made to the election into which I led my party in 1923. I led them to it because I believed that there was nothing else at that time which would help us to fight the unemployment which was beginning and which I saw coming, and which I had little hope at that time of seeing remedied. I do not regret to-day what I did then. I think that we were perfectly right, but the whole situation to-day is still more difficult because now the prosperity of our industry is so wrapped up with the international situation. That makes the great importance of the World Conference, and there is no doubt, as has been said over and over again, we have to do all we can to get reduced tariffs in the world and to get the exchanges set in order. I hope that something in that last respect may be done in the negotiations we are having with our friends in the Argentine, but until world causes are set in order we cannot advance beyond a certain point.

Our situation to-day, I believe, bad as it is, is more favourable than that in any other country in the world, and I take hope from that fact. But I want the House to remember that there is one method of reducing taxation, and that is by reducing it at the expense of the social services, and this Government will not do that. It is perfectly true that many sacrifices were made and made in all classes. I hope that sometimes the party opposite, when they expatiate, and quite rightly, on the sufferings of the very poor, will not forget the real sacrifices which have been made by many poor in their glad consent for the sake of the country to knock 40 per cent. off their incomes from the funds. Our people made great sacrifices there, and, more remarkable, it was made a year after the great sacrifices were made by all the rest of the people. But naturally, when a year or 15 months have gone by after you have made your sacrifice, and you can yet see little that helps, not realising the nder condition of the country and the re favourable environment for its pansion, but seeing only that work does come, there is no wonder men's rts fail them.

What we have to try and do in this use is to keep up our courage, and the rage in the country, with the certain pe that if we keep on courageously we ll do better. I have great hopes of World Conference. I have great pes of the position in which we find selves. I think that we are ready to e advantage now of what may come, l, while I do not like to use the exssion of the Chancellor of the Ex-quer, "Pegging away," because ryone interpreted it wrongly the other
, I would rather say: "Let us go ward with high courage and with hope ctising those very virtues which the House would have us do—economy and thrift—and we shall see better times." I would say, on behalf of the Government, that we accept the Motion. There is only one thing I will say about it. I want it to be clear the sense in which I accept the word "intolerable." I do not accept it in its literal meaning. I accept it in its meaning in good, classical English.

> But one half-pennyworth of bread to this intolerable deal of sack!

Perhaps that intolerable voice is speaking. If I may take the word "intolerable" in that sense, I accept that Motion on behalf of the Government.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out" stand part of the Question.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
Mr. G. Macdonald and Mr. Groves.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved,

"That this House views with anxiety the existing high level of taxation and diminishing revenues in this country, believes that this creates an intolerable burden on industry, and urges His Majesty's Government to consider means by which this burden may be lessened at the earliest possible moment."

MINING INDUSTRY.

7.38 p.m.

Mr. DICKIE: I beg to move,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is essential in the national interest and the interests of the coal-mining industry that the coal export trade should be freed as speedily as possible from the restrictions imposed by Part I of the Coal Mines Act, 1930."

It is safe to say that no industry has occupied a greater share of the attention of this House than the mining industry. Commission after Commission has been appointed to inquire into the state of the industry, Act after Act has been placed upon the Statute Book, to regulate and control it, and even in the brief lifetime of this Parliament the subject has been debated on several occasions. In every Vote of Censure moved from the er side of the House a great deal of e has been devoted to what I might the tottering throne of old King Coal. spite these facts, I and my friends who re associated with me, who represent ning constituencies, who are very vely concerned as to the position in se constituencies and who view the ure with general alarm, make no logy for directing the attention of the use once again to the steady decline our export trade in coal, to the posi-n which is created by that steady dene and the manner in which it affects national interests.

ext to agriculture the mining indusremains still our greatest industry.
is the foundation of all our heavy in-tries. In the domain of domestic in-tries it is perfectly safe to say that, matter what may be the scientific deopment in the utilisation of other forms fuel, for us for many years coal must nain the foundation on which the ble structure of our industrial edifice st rest. It is equally true to say that we are to maintain our position as greatest exporting nation in the rld it is vital that we should maintain exports of coal. In bulk they are the atest of our exports. The shipowners end on the outward freight to apen the inward freight and thereby ble us to purchase more cheaply the d and raw material that we need for sustenance, the raw material of our ustry, a matter of primary importance a country which must draw its supplies m the ends of the earth, and upon ich it depends as a competitive nation maintaining its position in the markets the world.

he coal industry must, therefore, rein as a fundamental factor in our nomic life. Its effect upon our ional life is not to be judged by the te of prosperity or depression in the ing industry alone. The prosperity ch is derived from the mining indusfinds its way into the broad stream of national life. It percolates into the usand channels of the national life enriches and benefits the whole.
ilarly, the severe depression in the l exporting areas, which reduces them, they have been reduced during the few years, to a state of beggarly oralisation, with its consequent loss purchasing power, due to the poverty those producers of wealth, is reflected in every industry catering for the home market, apart altogether from its effect upon our international trade. I bring forward the Motion in the hope that it will appeal not only to those who represent mining constituencies, and who are directly interested in the industry, but to the general body of hon. Members, and that the Government will accept it and proceed at once to implement it, for the situation in those areas is becoming really desperate.

Every time that I am asked what are my objections to the Mines Act in its application to the export trade, I am reminded of an episode in the life of the great Dr. Johnson. It is said that on one occasion when he was on one of his trips to Scotland he stayed for dinner at Oxford, celebrated then for its learning, famous since for its Union, and now notorious for its patriots. On that occasion he dined on chicken. The dinner does not appear to have been a remarkable success, for when he was asked about it afterwards he said that the chicken was badly hatched, badly reared, badly killed, badly dressed, badly cooked and badly served, otherwise it appears to have been quite a good chicken. So it is with the Act of 1930 and its application to the export trade. Whatever may be said of that Act as far as inland trade is concerned, I submit that it is impossible to bring forward any valid arguments for a continuance of that part of the Act which inflicts a stranglehold on the export section of the industry by regulating the output and imposing the fixation of prices.

The disastrous effect of the application of the provisions of the Act to the export industry was foreseen by hon. Members who opposed it during its passage through this House, and by many people outside who were well qualified to speak on behalf of the industry. Almost every one of the Ministers of the present National Government opposed this Act during its passage through this House, including the two hon. Members who have been Secretary for Mines, and they opposed it particularly in its application to the export section of the industry. I will not weary the House with long quotations from speeches, they can be found in the records of the House and hon. Members can read them for themselves; but I say quite frankly that I am astonished that members of the present Government should have allowed this Act to remain on the Statute Book unamended for 18 months, when month after month was clearly revealing that their own fears were well founded and their own phophecies well justified. As far as outside opinion is concerned I could quote many authorities as to the effect of the application of its provisions to the export trade, but I will content myself with one from a colliery in my own constituency. The relevant portion of the letter is this:

> "The present Government has definitely stated that if any district fails to produce a scheme the Government would force one upon them, and it was undoubtedly this threat which intimidated many into voting in favour of a so-called voluntary scheme of their own making, although they had little or no confidence that it would work without inflicting serious loss both on owners and workmen throughout the county, as, owing to the fact that the Durham coal trade lives largely by its exports, any control, with its resultant restriction of output, will increase costs, while price fixing will almost inevitably lead to the loss of orders in foreign markets."

That is a letter from the chairman of a colliery in my own constituency—Mr. Sydney Wilson.

Mr. BATEY: That is a tin-pot place.

Mr. DICKIE: The hon. Member, as on a previous occasion when I was speaking, is a little premature. He will hear something about the bigger concerns before I have finished. But the same thing runs right through the exporting districts. The hon. Member for Spennymoor (Mr. Batey) knows the county of Durham as well as I do, and he knows the disastrous state of things prevailing there partly as a result of the 1930 Act. That Act came into operation on the 1st January, 1931, and it was not long before the dismal forebodings of those who had foretold what was likely to happen were fully justified. The matter was raised in this House and on the 19th March, 1931, the present Secretary for Mines expressed grave apprehension as to the effect of the Act upon our export trade. He concluded his speech on that occasion with these words:

> "Those who attribute the fall in shipments to the quota system say that the quota system is the worst that could possibly be adopted, for it takes no account of the varying classes of coal nor of the fluctuating demand which has always existed and always will exist in the coal trade. It is also held by some of the shippers that the coal market can only be maintained by full production and low costs, and it is the opinion of some coal traders that this particular system has meant higher costs. I hope the Minister will believe me when I say that evidence comes to us from all parts of the country that there is grave disquiet at the working of the quota."

There is even greater disquiet to-day. The hon. Member for Leith (Mr. E. Brown) concluded by saying:

> "I beg him not to take merely the departmental view that the Act is all right and must be all right for everybody, merely because some central committee says so."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 19th March, 1931; col. 2241, Vol. 249.]

That speech was made by the Secretary for Mines when he was a private Member of the House. He is now Secretary for Mines and I am a private Member; and I am making the same appeal to him as he made then to the then Secretary for Mines. This Act is not all right. As far as the export trade is concerned it is all wrong, and its effects must be remedied at once unless we are prepared to face a still further decline in our sales to foreign countries, with disastrous results to our industries, our shipping, to the balance of trade and to the nation as a whole. Before I deal with the question of minimum prices may I remind hon. Members of the figures relating to production and export? In 1913 we produced 287,000,000 tons of coal, and of that we exported as cargo 73,000,000 tons, and as bunkers 24,000,000 tons; making a total of 97,000,000 tons. That 97,000,000 tons—and this is the point to which I want to draw special attention—represented 33.8 per cent. of our total production. In 1932 our total production had fallen to 209,000,000 tons, our exports of cargo coal to 39,000,000 tons and our exports of coal in bunkers to 14,000,000 tons, a total of 53,000,000 tons. But that 53,000,000 tons represented only 25 per cent. of our production. We have lost in 1932 as compared with 1913 no less than 44,000,000 tons of coal; and we are actually exporting 8.8 per cent. less of the diminished production.

It must be remembered that a million tons of coal represents employment for 4,000 men. We have lost 44,000,000 tons of coal, and that represents a loss in employment of 176,000 miners. That is something which should give every hon.

Member cause for deep thought. But that is not all the loss in employment, because it must be remembered that there is a loss of employment to those engaged in shipping, on the railways, in our docks and harbours; and all the ancillary trades. In addition there is the value of these 44,000,000 tons of coal which we have lost, and the House will realise the serious effect which this has upon the balance of trade. I do not quote these figures as evidence against the Coal Mines Act of 1930, but merely to draw the attention of the House to the importance of our export trade in coal. Coming to the position during the last few years I want to point out that by 1929 we were recovering steadily from the effects of the long drawn-out stoppage of 1926. Our exports, I am speaking of cargo alone, had risen again to the substantial total of 60,000,000 tons.

Mr. CURRY: Can the hon. Member give us the percentage which the figure of 60,000,000 tons bears to the total production in 1929?

Mr. DICKIE: I brought a mass of figures with me but I cannot put everything into terms of percentages. If I did I should occupy too much of the time of the House. The point I want hon. Members to remember is that when the Act came into force in January, 1931, there were no quotas or exchange restrictions, or licensing regulations, in operation against our coal, but the very moment it came into force our exports began to fall, and to fall heavily indeed. Whereas in 1930 we only lost 5,000,000 tons in 1931 we lost no less than 12,000,000 tons, and in 1932 we lost another 4,000,000 tons, so that our exports now stand at the phenomenally low figure of only 39,000,000 tons, or little more than half of our exports in 1913. This tremendous decline was no doubt due to a number of causes, not entirely to the Coal Mines Act of 1930, but it is difficult to determine how much of the decline to attribute to each. There is the world depression and the greater use of other forms of fuel, oil, electricity, white coal, tariffs, licensing systems, quota restrictions and, of course, the Act of 1930, all of which played their part.

Some of these things are imponderable, but two of them we can at least weigh roughly, the restrictions imposed by other nations and those which we have imposed upon ourselves. I ask the House to look at foreign restrictions, for it is no part of my case that the whole of this decline is due to the Act of 1930. The countries where the quota system is in operation are France, Germany and Belgium. Take France. The quota was imposed by the French Government in July, 1931; that was the first evidence of a quota restriction by foreign countries. In two years, from 1930 to 1932, the imports into France declined by 7,000,000 tons, from 25,000,000 to 18,000,000 tons, and our share of that decline was from 14,000,000 tons to 9,000,000 tons. That is to say, out of a total reduction of 7,000,000 tons in the imports into France our share of that loss was no less than 5,000,000 tons. Expressed in terms of percentage, as far as total losses are concerned our reduction was 6 per cent., whilst every other country, Germany, Poland, Holland and Belgium, showed an increase of imports into France. That is something which gives cause for thought and should give the Government cause for grave concern.

Mr. GODFREY NICHOLSON: Is it not a fact that we always exported to France up to the full amount that the French allowed up to export, and that their system of licensing has caused that discrepancy?

Mr. DICKIE: There was then no system of licences. That system did not come in until later. The case which is sometimes attempted to be made against the National Government, that the decline in our export of coal is due to tariffs and retaliation, is a case which will not bear a moment's examination. [HON. MEMBERS: "But it is true."] I hope that the hon. Member for Chester-le-Street (Mr. Lawson) will prove that it is true, and I shall be very much surprised to see how it is done. Then look at Germany. In Germany the quota was not imposed until February, 1932. We were not even considering tariffs in this country at that time. It is idle and foolish to say that a restriction of this kind was a form of retaliation when we had no tariffs of any kind and were only beginning to consider the use of that particular weapon. We had to share the brunt of the loss as far as Germany was concerned. We lost 2,564,000 tons. France and Holland increased their exports to Germany, while the Saar and Czechoslovakia decreased only very slightly. Belgium did not impose a quota until October, 1931. In the same two years the imports into Belgium declined by 3,600,000 tons. We lost 1,340,000 tons—not so bad in total, but in percentage we actually suffered a loss of over 50 per cent. in the quantity supplied to Belgium.

[Mr. Dickie.]

These are quota countries. The restrictions that they imposed have undoubtedly restricted our exports to those countries, but I do not believe that they account for the whole of the reduction. Restrictions imposed by foreign countries make trading somewhat difficult for coalowners and exporters. I cannot see that that is any reason why this House should add to their difficulties by legislative enactments which are almost impossible of application to a difficult and complex business like the export of coal, and only hinder and hamper our exporters and coalowners in their endeavour to secure business. Over the first we have no control, but the second, the combination of quota and price restrictions, I regard as a double-headed Frankenstein of our own creation, which is threatening to destroy our export trade. If we do not destroy it, it will destroy us so far as that particular section of the industry is concerned. I have always found it exceedingly difficult to understand why these restrictions were imposed on the export trade.

We have had an extremely interesting speech from the Lord President of the Council. As I listened to him I wondered whether the Cabinet was embarking upon an experiment based on the theory which the right hon. Gentleman propounded a year or two ago, that the solution of our industrial problems was to be found in a restriction of our exports. I could never see how it was to be done. Why these restrictions should be imposed by ourselves on one of our vital industries I am really at a loss to understand. I believe in freedom from these restrictions. But part at least of this lost business is recoverable, despite the quotas and the licensing system. Part of it has been lost on account of a feeling of resentment against the fixation of prices, and that despite the well-known fact that a very large quantity of coal is being purchased below the minimum price and also because of the uncertainty of being able to obtain supplies, owing to the quota.

There is a very powerful opposition in every one of these countries to the system of licensing and quotas which has been established there, and if we remove the objectionable features over which we have control we could immeasurably strengthen the opposition in those countries and perhaps succeed in having these things swept away altogether. We are not holding our own. That is the main feature that we have to visualise. The whole of the other big exporting countries, grouped together in those three particular years of which I have spoken, lost in their export trade in coal only 28 per cent. This little country lost 35 per cent. The total loss of the quota countries is something like 9,000,000 tons. A fair proportion of that is recoverable, and I regard it as pure defeatism to regard those orders as an irrecoverable loss. They can be regained, but the only way to regain them is to give our coalowners freedom to produce and our exporters freedom to go out into the markets of the world and seek orders.

Mr. MARTIN: What does the figure of 9,000,000 tons represent?

Mr. DICKIE: The 9,000,000 tons is the total which we have lost in those three years, in what I call the quota countries. These restrictions of the minimum price and a quota have made it very much more difficult to get business. As orders became scarcer production decreased, naturally, and as production decreased the cost per ton increased. Irregularity of working always leads to an increase of cost. In the case of the average pit producing 500 to 1,000 tons a day one single day lost during a fortnight will put up the cost for the whole of that period to anything ranging from 7d. or 8d. to 1s. a ton—a very serious charge on the industry, and more serious than the royalty charge of which we hear so much from hon. Members opposite. Output and production costs are very closely related. But our coal can only sell at world prices. That is one of the things of which we are losing sight. We are deliberately choosing to pursue a policy of handicapping ourselves in our attempt to meet competition in the markets of the world. If persisted in it can only lead to a still further decline, to a point where the purchaser will buy only from us those classes of coal which he cannot obtain elsewhere.

Despite the world depression and the diminished demand, I consider that there is still a very wide field in which we can recapture lost trade. It must also be remembered that when you have greater freedom and keener prices you will open up new avenues to business. There are still new avenues. But the objections to the quota and the minimum price have been reiterated so often that I do not want to go into them in detail. So far as the quota is concerned, I regard it as altogether an evil. In the way it works it is a premium on inefficiency. The call everywhere to-day is for efficiency in industry, as in every other walk of life, yet here in this important industry we are actually keeping alive pits which ought to be closed, many of which ought to have been closed years ago, and in some of which no miner ought to be allowed to work at all to-day. These pits are being kept alive at the expense of the economic pits and at the expense of the miners' wages, for that is how it works out.

Let me say a few words about the method of allocating a quota. It is both cumbersome and slow, and in the export trade it is a positive hindrance to business. The very existence of the quota prevents the making of long-term contracts, and the uncertainty as to what quota it will get deprives the whole industry of anything in the way of security or stability. In the districts the quota is allotted on the standard tonnage of 1929. That was a good year for some pits, but a bad one for others, and a moderate one for still others. No allowance is made for the change in circumstances since. The allocations are made, and every pit which was allotted a standard tonnage in 1929 can claim its share of the allocation now. The quota falls like the gentle rain from heaven upon the efficient and upon the inefficient alike. A demand may arise for some particular class of coal, as in the case of Northumberland steam coal some time ago. The demand cannot be met unless the collieries which are actually supplying that coal are prepared to face the possibility of having to pay a fine of 2s. 6d. for every extra ton of coal that they produce, or unless they are prepared to pay, not what was intended under the Act, but an exorbitant figure, 1s. 6d., 1s. 9d. or even in some cases as much as 2s. 6d.

The colliery which pays the best wages is thus penalised. The collieries which run uneconomic pits are allowed to continue, and some of them in June of last year, though actually bankrupt were living upon the quota. In an age when we have pleading in every direction for efficiency, that is an outrage and a scandal. It is something that in my judgment ought to be abolished altogether. A very important point is this: What happens when this transfer of quota takes place? The efficient colliery which has exhausted its quota has need of additional quota. It seeks to buy from its neighbour which may have quota to dispose of. The owner of the neighbouring colliery knows that the other fellow is in a tight corner. Accordingly, he puts up his price and asks for an additional 1s. 6d. or 1s. 9d. per ton. In order to keep his pit going in the national interests, and keep his men employed, rather than be fined 2s. for overproducing, the owner of the efficient colliery which has exhausted its quota consents to pay the additional 1s. 6d. or 1s. 9d. That is a charge against his production costs. It enters into his ascertainment and affects wages. What happens at the other end? A man sitting in his office drops the telephone, lights a cigar, touches a bell, tells a junior clerk to make an entry in his ledger and he makes a clear profit of 1s. 6d. or 1s. 9d. per ton. That is the condition of things in the mining industry to-day and I tell the Secretary for Mines that it is high time it was stopped. In some cases the sale of quota has been refused altogether or has only been made under pressure.

Now I come to the question of the minimum price. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about the minimum wage?"] I am prepared to deal with that subject also on the proper occasion. At the moment I want to deal with the minimum price, which, I may remind hon. Members opposite, affects the wages of the miner. That is a fact too often forgotten on the other side of the House. There is far too great a tendency for hon. Gentlemen opposite to talk as though nobody but themselves knew anything about the mining industry or had any interest in the miners. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] I am very glad to hear that approval from the hon. Member for Chester-le-Street (Mr. Lawson). He at any rate knows that it is not right——

Mr. BATEY: That your statement is not true?

Mr. DICKIE: The hon. Member knows perfectly well what I mean. He knows as well as I do that many of us here have the interests of the miners at heart as much as any hon. Member opposite. Many of us have lived among the miners and know all about their daily difficulties and the troubles which they have to face and the hunger and the privation which both miners and miners' wives are suffering. We know these things as well as any man who calls himself a miner's Member, and we are anxious to do something practical here and now to help them to better conditions. In my judgment the minimum price is worse than the quota. It may be possible to make out a case for the fixation of prices in the inland trade, but it is utterly impossible to make out any case at all for the fixation of prices in the export trade. The House should remember that we are only one seller. We are trying to sell and to make world prices. We are trying to compel the buyer to buy at onr figure although there are other willing sellers in a free market. That is what is happening under the minimum price. The principle is so unsound that I wonder how on earth it was ever accepted.

It is quite impossible to keep these prices secret. They are known to our foreign competitors. The moment the executive board in any district settles prices, the wires are busy and the prices are known in Hamburg, Antwerp, Oslo, Berlin, and everywhere else, in some cases, before they are known to the owners in the district itself. That is a state of things which would be tolerated in no other industry and which no other industry could survive. Under this Act, too, we deny the privilege which is always accorded to the buyer who places a large order. If the minimum price is observed—I say if it is—the seller must quote to the purchaser the same price per ton for 1,000 tons as for 100,000 tons. It is little wonder that the large buyers on the Continent should look elsewhere for supplies. What would happen in the engineering industry, for example, if some of our big engineering firms were asked to tender through the Overseas Trade Department, let us say, for locomotives for a foreign Government, and were told that they had to tender at the same rate for 10 locomotives as for 100 locomotives; and if, as soon as the tender had been received, the prices were forwarded to their Belgium, Japanese, American and other competitors. Yet that is the actual position in the coal export trade. It is sheer folly to advertise the prices to the world in this fashion.

During the debates on this subject at the end of May and beginning of June last year, I touched on the question of evasion. I said then that it was a subject which had to be treated with great delicacy. At the present time it needs to be touched upon with even greater delicacy. The hope expressed by the President of the Board of Trade that the longer this went on the stronger would be the power of the owners and the better they would be able to deal with that sort of thing, has not been justified. Evasion has grown steadily worse, until, to-day, it is not too much to say that the export section of the industry is in a state of utter and absolute demoralisation. This Act of Parliament is undermining British commercial morality and driving honourable business men to do things which they loathe and detest. In a difficult technical and complex business of this character—and this disposes of the Amendment which I see on the Order Paper—neither the Commons House of Parliament nor any other form of tribunal can stop these evasions. Those who are evading the Act know that perfectly well. The hon. and learned Member for East Bristol (Sir S. Cripps) knows that however strong a law may be there is always a means of evading it. This law is being evaded every day and there is no power in the House of Commons or the owners to stop the evasion. The only way to stop it is to uproot the causes which have led to it.

Separately, I contend, that these two things to which I have referred are bad. Jointly they form an unholy combination which is having a terrible effect upon our export trade and our export trade will never recover until we get rid of them. I wish to deal with some of the arguments which have been used in favour of the retention of the quota. The most illogical is one which has been used, both from the Government Front Bench and from the other side of the House. That is the argument "Oh, you have not exhausted your quota for the last quarter." What is the position? You impose a quota on a district and on the individual collieries in that district which definitely restricts their output, which prevents them under penalty from producing more. This restriction causes irregularity of working and irregularity increases the cost of production. They cannot get a higher price and you debar them from taking a lower price, which they could do if they were working at full capacity. When they complain you say, "But you have not exhausted your quota for the quarter just concluded." That is the most illogical argument that could be used.

Another argument is that our potential capacity is 300,000,000 tons, that last year we produced 210,000,000 tons, and that we ought to be content with our share of the world's production. I do not agree with that. Our potentioal capacity may be 350,000,000 or 400,000,000 tons and the actual output ought to be regulated only by the amount of coal that we are able to sell in the markets of the world. I ask is that principle to be applied in other industries such as the iron and steel industry, the cotton industry and the motor car industry? Their potential capacity for production is greater than the demand at the moment. Is that to be made a reason for Government interference and for imposing regulations which hinder and hamper their efforts to secure orders?

The third argument which I have heard is that if there is a repeal of Part I prices will slump. I do not believe it. I remember that when the Act was passing through this House people, both inside and outside the House, said that as soon as it was placed on the Statute Book it would have the effect of increasing prices enormously. Nothing of the sort happened. It was pure speculation then, and it is pure speculation now. There is nothing to show that there is likely to be any slump in the price of coal, even if Part I of the Act is repealed. I would remind the House that as far back as the 2nd June the ex-Secretary of Mines promised that he would give this matter his immediate consideration. In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Curry), who asked if some assurance could be given that immediate steps would be taken to inquire into and amend the operation of Part I, the Minister said:

> "I need not dwell upon it now, but I gave a definite and categorical assurance on that point. I said that we were awaiting from the Mining Association the amendments that they had under consideration, and that, as soon as those amendments had been notified to us, they would be correlated with the amendments that we had in our own minds, and the Government would decide what Amendments would then be brought forward.—[Official Report, 2nd June, 1932; col. 1376, Vol. 266.]

A little later in the Debate he gave me a similar categorical and definite assurance which wound up with this:

> "It is our business to do all that is humanly possible to recover those markets, upon which our export trade depends."—[Official Report, 2nd June, 1932; col. 1465, Vol. 266.]

Now we are in the position that things have been going from bad to worse, and nothing has been done. I suggest that the only cure for this sort of thing is either to amend the Act so drastically as to give complete freedom to the export areas, or, failing that, to repeal Part I of the Act altogether. It may involve legislation and setting up some scheme of co-ordination of prices between districts and co-operation within the districts, particularly in the inland section of the trade, but, so far as we in the export areas are concerned, we are not prepared to be debarred from those markets which we have built up and which we enjoy to-day. We are a maritime nation, and we have a very big coasting trade. The first coal that was borne to London or to the South of England came from Newcastle, and that is why it was called sea coal. We have captured these markets because the freight from the North of England to the South is only 4s., while the railway rate is 19s. Does anyone contend that the proposition of the ex-Minister of Mines that we should pay 15s. extra for coal in order to bolster up the railway transport is a serious business proposition? It is a question of transport, and all that we ask for in those markets is that we shall have a fair field and no favour.

A few weeks ago the Minister of Mines opened some estates on the River Tyne. We have been very badly hit there, but we have not lost our courage. We have spent £120,000 in building those estates, and they are to-day in all probability the most modern in this country. The Minister then gave us some good advice, which was that we should throw away despair. We are throwing it away, and we ask him to help us to get rid of it entirely. I will not say anything about bunkers, but I hope the Minister will consider that important aspect of the mining problem, as we are losing in that direction as well. In so far as the export trade is concerned, the Government and the Minister of Mines should do everything they can to give us back our freedom, in order that we may fight in the markets of the world for the orders on which the industry depends. This matter was placed before the House very much more eloquently than I can place it by the present President of the Board of Trade in March, 1930. What he said hits the situation exactly now, as it did then, because the position is precisely the same except that it has got a great deal worse. The right hon. Gentleman then said:

> "It seems to me that, the more one looks into the question of the export trade, the more essential it is that it should be given the utmost elasticity, that no checks should be placed upon it in the interests of all concerned, but that it should have complete freedom to meet the demand as and when it arises. Do not let it be imagined for one moment that those who control the coalfields of foreign countries are going to be so merciful to us. They want to get business, and so do we, and it is our duty to capture it for the sake of the national trade and of the miners employed in it. Anything that we do to take away our freedom in the foreign export trade to capture those contracts, will be throwing away much of our present organisation for the sale of coal."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 11th March, 1930; col. 1167, Vol. 236.]

The position is getting steadily worse, and last week was the worst week the Tyne Improvement Commission has known since the general stoppage of 1926. On Saturday last one of the pits in my district closed down, and over 200 men were dismissed. On the same day another colliery issued notices involving the dismissal of another 700 men, and only yesterday in my constituency, the largest producing concern, owning a large number of collieries and employing 6,000 men—each and every one of those collieries was idle, and may be idle to-day, on account of the loss of trade. I submit that this is a very important matter, and I would——

The SECRETARY for MINES (Mr. Ernest Brown): Do I gather that the hon. Member attributes all that to the operation of Part I of the Act?

Mr. DICKIE: No, and I think the House will agree that I have been perfectly clear in saying that I do not attribute all this to the Act. I am calling attention to the very serious and grave position, and I put this Motion on the Paper because I want to see something done in the interests of these miners and their wives and families. I have dealt throughout with this matter as a business proposition primarily, but I know perfectly well that it is not entirely a business proposition, that there is a human side to it; and a very tragic human side it is. I know something about the sufferings which have been caused by unemployment, by irregular employment, and by low wages. This problem of the export of coal is one of the problems of the devastated areas, which are nearly all in the districts where we export coal, and I ask the Government to consider this matter, because it arises not only in our constituencies; in the very constituency of the Prime Minister himself the pits are working most irregularly, little more, I am told, than half-time, and I ask the Government to consider the matter, not only as a business matter, but to visualise the great mass of suffering in those areas and, by prompt and effective action, to do something to alleviate the situation.

8.34 p.m.

Mr. CLARRY: I beg to second the Motion.

I think the thanks of the House are due to my hon. Friend the Member for Consett (Mr. Dickie) for bringing this vital matter forward for discussion, and we very much appreciate the detailed and forceful manner in which he has put his case. I do not propose to speak at any great length, but I would like to crystallise the position and the seriousness of it. Coming from one of the largest exporting areas in the country, South Wales and Monmouthshire, and representing Newport, which is the port of shipment of the Monmouthshire coalfield, it is a matter of very vital and urgent importance to us, and representations have been made to me which, in passing on to the Minister, I cannot urge with too much forcefulness. When Part I of the Act was originally discussed, its purpose was stated to be to adjust the supply of coal to the current effective demand and to deal with the dead weight of from 60,000,000 to 80,000,000 tons excessive capacity available in the country. At the same time, the Minister made it clear on the subject of prices that, in granting to the coal industry the power to impose minimum price schedules, it would provide the industry with the necessary revenue to maintain wages and to secure a reasonable profit to the owners.

It will not be denied that these two objects have not been achieved. It is true that progress has been made in the stabilisation of prices, although the effect of the Act in this respect is controversial. The fundamental point is that pithead prices during the operation of Part I are actually lower than in 1930-31. Meantime, the costs of production, in which the cost of the administration of the scheme bears some important part, have helped to keep up costs when other competitive industries have been able to reduce their costs of production. With regard to exports, which is the real subject of this Motion, during the three years our exports have fallen from 60,000,000 tons to nearly 39,000,000 tons. Of that quantity, South Wales and Monmouthshire exports have fallen from 24,000,000 to 16,000,000, or by 33⅓ per cent. It is idle for anyone to argue that this is entirely due to the operation of this Act. There are many other causes. There is the much fiercer competition by foreign exporters. There is a world depression, and of course there is the operation of quotas from three countries—France, Belgium and Germany—while Spain is endeavouring to enforce some form of quota but the rest of the world is free and unrestricted.

If we make comparisons in the realm of the world export trade, we find that Great Britain has suffered more during the operation of this Act than the other five important exporting countries. Great Britain's exports during this period have fallen 35 per cent., while the exports of the other five countries have fallen only 28 per cent. This is a very serious matter, and, if we were to calculate the quantity of coal we should have exported last year if we had been able to maintain the same pro rata export as our foreign competitors, it would represent 5,000,000 tons of coal, and it is not too much to say that this loss is mainly due to the operation of Part I of this Act. It might be argued that if we had to sell this 5,000,000 tons of coal, it would have to be sold at a lower price than the present prices, which in some cases are uneconomic; but against that we have to offset the lower cost of production due to the larger outputs of the collieries.

I have no need to stress the necessity for exports from this country in order to assist our trade balance and the importance of coal to shipping, because, in spite of the reduction in the tonnage of shipping, coal still forms four-fifths of the total weight of tonnage exported from this country, and approximately two-fifths of our ships are bunkered by our coal. When we came off the Gold Standard it was felt that it would be a great opportunity for our exporters, particularly coal exporters, but the operation of the quota and price fixation has practically nullified that advantage. Foreign exporters are aware of the quotations which are made in competitive markets and are able to quote only a fraction of a penny less than we quote in order to obtain our business.

Coal is very often sold, particularly abroad, because of its description and fitness for special purposes, and numerous cases can be cited where exports of coal have been lost to this country because the particular colliery that can supply the customer's particular requirements has used up its quota. While these points apply to all exporting areas, I submit that it has a particular bearing on South Wales and Monmouthshire, which is a very distressed area, and the indirect operation of this Act has been a means of diverting Monmouthshire coal, which would be normally shipped at Newport, to other ports. This is a subject of strong representation from the Newport Chamber of Commerce, together with the condemnation of Part I of the Act. Strong representations have also been made by the Association of British Chambers of Commerce and the Chamber of Shipping to end export restrictions. In the search for measures to find work to relieve the heartbreaking unemployment in our distressed areas, I submit that we have a means here at hand for increasing work in our coalfields, railways, docks and shipping by giving back to the exporting and bunkering coal trade the freedom which was taken from it by the operation of this Act.

8.43 p.m.

Mr. GEORGE HALL: I beg to move, in line 1, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof the words:

> "This House approves the action taken to continue Part I of the Coal Mines Act, 1930, for a further five years, and urges the necessity for a strict supervision of the operations of the district committees in order to ensure the effective administration of the law."

Like my hon. Friend who moved the Motion, I represent a mining division, but, unlike him, I ask for a continuation of Part I of the Act. I ask that because I think that it is in the interests of the mining industry that it should be continued. My hon. Friends and I are not going to argue that Part I of the 1930 Act is perfect. It is not perfect, and we should like to see some alteration, but we think that the people who should bring forward suggestions for the alteration of that Act are the people who are directly connected with the industry. I am tempted to ask my hon. Friend on whose behalf he is speaking. Is he speaking on behalf of the Mining Association of Great Britain?

Mr. DICKIE: Most assuredly not, and I very much resent the insinuation. I am speaking here as a Member of Parliament representing a mining division—the owners, the miners, the railwaymen, the postmen, the grocers, and everybody else in the constituency.

Mr. HALL: I have no desire to impute motives to my hon. Friend, but on a Motion of this kind I think it is only fair that we should know whether representations had been made to the hon. Member by the various associations connected with the industry asking him to advocate the repeal of Part I.

Mr. DICKIE: I have had the usual things which are sent to every Member of Parliament when a Motion of this kind is to come before the House—from coalowners, from exporters and from chambers of shipping and other organisations which are interested; just the same as every other hon. Member has.

Mr. HALL: I also have received the usual circulars, but not one from the Mining Association, not one from the Miners' Federation, not one from a large producer of coal. From exporters—yes; from chambers of shipping—yes. We say that while the machinery of the Act is not perfect it embodies means whereby representations can be made for the purpose of tightening up the Act. My hon. Friend suggests that there are evasions of the Act. There are evasions, but that is not the fault of the Act but of the people who carry on the evasions. For my hon. Friend to suggest that Part I is driving honest business men to practices which they detest does not speak very well for the honesty of the mineowners of this country.

Sir ROBERT ELLIS: The hon. Member did not say that of business men.

Mr. HALL: But that must be the inference. It is the mineowners who are responsible for administering the Act. The whole machinery of the Act is entirely in the hands of the owners.

Mr. McKEAG: Surely the hon. Member realises that they have been doing whatever they could to find work for their own men.

Mr. HALL: If they deliberately break an Act of Parliament instead of endeavouring to fix the minimum price at which coal can be sold, it does not speak too well for them or the way in which they conduct their business. The point I want to make is, that if there are complaints against the Act, the whole machinery of the Act is in the hands of the owners themselves. That applies to the central committee and the district committees. No other body or organisation has any representation upon district or central committees. The number of complaints received about the administration of the Act is almost negligible. I will deal with the question of the quota. In the excellent report by the Mines Department on the working of the Act, issued towards the latter part of last year, they state, with reference to quota allocations:

> "In only comparatively few cases has it been necessary for applications to the central council for increases in allocations to be referred to arbitration. During the first three months of 1932 there were only two such references."

Where are all the complaints about difficulties arising as the result of the allocation of quotas? My hon. Friend suggested that it is hardly logical to refer to allocations and output. It is interesting to note, according to this report, that in the first quarter of 1932 the actual output of coal was 15.7 per cent. less than the quotas allocated. In the county of Durham in the same quarter the coal output was 19.3 per cent. less than the quotas. In the June quarter the output was 8.6 per cent. less than the quotas and in the September quarter 16,23 per cent. less. Where are the mineowners sitting in their offices making 1s. 6d. a ton as the result of selling their quotas—just sitting at the telephone? Some of the statements made by my hon. Friend were almost unbelievable.

Mr. DICKIE rose——

Mr. HALL: My hon. Friend took 50 minutes for his speech, and as this Debate will have to close at 11 o'clock he might give me an opportunity. As far as I know, my hon. Friend is not representing any organised body, either the Mining Association, the Durham Mining Association or the Miners' Federation of Great Britain. He may pay lip service to the question of the minimum wage for miners, but those of us who have had experience in negotiating the wages of miners know that without minimum prices they cannot get minimum wages. My hon. Friend is asking for unrestricted competition, yet we know that right along from 1921 until 1930, when the mineowners had unrestricted competition, the price of coal fell to 50 per cent. of what it was and the wages of miners fell to the same extent. The condition of the industry became very much worse under unrestricted competition, yet my hon. Friend is asking for a return to unrestricted competition. That would inevitably mean wages very much lower than those which are being paid at the present time.

We have had a shrewd suspicion, as the hon. Member for Newport rightly said, that chambers of shipping and exporters are, of course, pressing for the repeal of Part I of this Act. If there is any body of people who have made money out of the export of coal it is exporters and chambers of shipping. The exporters can always live and the producers can always starve. The late Lord Rhondda, who was not only a coal producer but was an exporter, always maintained that he could make more money out of selling coal than out of producing it, and what exporters are concerned about at the present time is not so much the price at which coal can be produced as the commission they can get out of the selling of the coal irrespective of the price at which it is being sold.

As I have already pointed out, the organisation of the industry under Part I of the Act is entirely in the hands of the coalowners. They control the whole machinery, district and central. Mr. Archer, the chairman of the Export Committee of the Midland Amalgamated District, said recently that it was the duty of owners to operate Part I honestly and sincerely, and after they had tried to operate it in that way then, if they failed, they could inform the Government that they had been set a task which could not be performed. The coalowners, however, were obviously unable to take that line. Despite some of the criticism, the majority of them would regard the repeal with dismay. That is the attitude of the Mining Association—not that I want to appear here this evening as an advocate on behalf of the Mining Association. That is the attitude of the Miners' Federation. I am speaking on behalf of the Miners' Federation. This Bill does not satisfy us entirely, but it is better than the unrestricted competition which would arise if the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Consett were carried. Mr. Lee, Secretary of the Mining Association of Great Britain, put the position of the coal industry from the owners' point of view quite clearly, in the article which he wrote in the "Colliery Year Book" for 1928. He said:

> "The surplus of productive capacity over present demand, both in the inland and export market, has brought down coal prices far below the general level of prices. They have reached a point at which the economic operation of collieries is impossible and the capital resources of the industry are being gravely impoverished. As is well-known, schemes for co-ordinated action with a view to securing more economic relationships between costs of production and prices, are already under consideration in most of the large coalfields."

[Mr. Hall.]

That was under a Tory Government in 1928, before there was any suggestion of the introduction of the Bill which brought about the Act of 1930. Mr. Lee further said:

> "Concerted action of this character is vitally necessary, not only to maintain the rates of wages of the mine workers in fair relation to those in other industries, but to avert the most serious danger to the very fabric of the industry during the abnormal period through which we are passing."

Those were the words of Mr. Lee. It can be said of Mr. Lee that he knows his job. He knows the industry very well. We say that the condition of the industry is very much what it was in 1928, when Mr. Lee penned those words. The hon. Member for Consett referred to the fact that the present Secretary for Mines opposed the Act when it was passing through the House in its early stages. The President of the Board of Trade did likewise, and so did the late Secretary for Mines. When they were brought close up against the problems with which the mining industry was and is confronted, they saw that their attitude during the period when the Bill was passing through the House was wrong.

Mr. E. BROWN: If the hon. Gentleman will search the Official Debates, he will find that my objection was not so much to the case made out, but to the machinery which is now being discussed.

Mr. HALL: I remember the Debates and some of the speeches. I have here some of the speeches of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of Mines. He will have an opportunity to deal with them later. I well remember some of the speeches which were made with regard to the tremendous increase of prices which was going to take place as a result of the operation of Part I of the Act. The increase of prices has not been brought about. There is a stability of price for which the mining industry is profoundly thankful. I am not going to quote figures other than from the export prices in 1929, to show that the price for coal exported from this country was 16s. 1¼d. per ton. The average price in 1932 was about 15s. 11d. per ton. There has been very little fluctuation. I am surprised that hon. Members who support this Motion are always asking, not only for stability of price, but for an increase in the price, to deal with unemployment.

The hon. Member for Consett is asking that we shall not have this stability of price in the mining industry, but that we shall have a reduction of price so that we can capture the market. That has been tried, and it has failed. I have already referred to the statement which was made by Mr. Archer, who knows questions of marketing. I am not going to take up the time of the House in quoting some of the statements that were made in the course of Mr. Archer's speech. I ask hon. Members to take the trouble to read the speech, which is published in some of the technical journals. The case for Part I and for some of the Amendments to Part I of the Act has been very well put.

The hon. Member for Consett really asks for the repeal of Part I of the Act, as far as the export trade is concerned. He, like myself, represents an exporting area in this House. He represents Durham and I represent South Wales, two districts which are, we can say without exaggeration, almost entirely dependent upon the export of coal. I take a good deal of interest in the export trade. It is, as the hon. Member for Consett rightly pointed out, a vital part of the trade and industrial life of this country, from the point of view of employment. If you destroy your coal export trade, you at once throw 200,000 workers out of employment and, in addition, all those who are engaged in the ancillary occupations upon railways or docks, or as seamen. My hon. Friends who come from the mining districts would not do a thing in any way to injure the export trade of this country. We are of opinion that the nation does not take the interest that it should take in the export trade. We hope that the coal industry, that portion which is producing for inland purposes as well as that which is producing for export, should be treated as one economic unit.

The hon. Member for Consett is asking in his Motion to give all the advantages, if there are any, of Part I of the Act, to inland districts, and to take away from the exporting districts any advantage that there may be. That is making the gulf very much further, instead of endeavouring to bring the exporting and the inland areas very much nearer. What a contrast to what is taking place in Germany, one of our main competitors, where the whole industry is organised for the purpose of competing with us in those neutral markets. Not only are the inland and export coal industries in Germany and Poland acting together, but they have the support of the Government, which is very heavily subsidising the export of coal. Those Governments realise the importance of the export trade to the national life of the country. Figures have been given by the hon. Member for Newport (Mr. Clarry) and the hon. Member for Consett as to the loss of export trade. They did not give the figures for last year, and they made no comparison between the percentage loss of export trade in this country with the percentage loss of export trade of other countries which are our main competitors. I will give the figures.

Mr. CLARRY: I gave those figures, namely, 35 per cent. for this country and 28 per cent. for the other five countries.

Mr. HALL: I understood that those figures covered a period of three years.

Mr. CLARRY: Yes.

Mr. HALL: I want to speak about last year as compared with 1931. The loss of export trade by Great Britain to foreign countries last year was less than 9 per cent., whereas in the case of Germany it was about 22 per cent., of Poland 28 per cent., Belgium 32 per cent., Holland 28 per cent., and the United States 27 per cent.

Mr. CLARRY: That was in one year only.

Mr. HALL: Yes, but it was last year, in reference to which my hon. Friend deplored the fact that there has been this terrible loss, which we all deplore. May I call the attention of my two hon. Friends and of the House to the real cause of the difficulty with which the export coal trade of this country is confronted? Reference has been made to restrictions, which have been aggravated very largely as the result of the fiscal policy of the present Government. Coal has been the pawn in the fiscal war that is being waged at the present time. I shall endeavour to prove that statement.

Which are the best customers of this country for export coal? There is an idea that coal exported from this country is being sent to the furthermost parts of the earth, but, instead of that, it is our near European neighbours that are our best customers. In the year 1930, when we exported 54,800,000 tons of coal, one ton out of every four exported from this country went to France; 12,969,000 tons of coal left these shores for France. Italy took over 7,000,000 tons; Germany nearly 5,000,000 tons; and Belgium nearly 3,500,000 tons. These four countries, in 1930, took more than half the total amount of coal exported from this country, and, if we add the Irish Free State—where there is a very heavy duty at the present time—and Spain, 32,500,000 of the 54,000,000 tons went to these countries, which have now restrictions and duties against us. The same thing happened in 1931. Of the 42,000,000 tons of coal which we exported in 1931, nearly 26,000,000 tons went to these five countries. In 1932, of the 38,000,000 tons of coal that we exported, 20,800,000 tons went to these countries. All of these nations now have restrictions in the form of quotas or very heavy duties, and that is, to a large extent, the cause of the suffering in the exporting areas of this country.

Mr. SLATER: May I ask the hon. Member if these countries are justified, in view of their favourable balance of trade with this country, in imposing restrictions against our export coal?

Mr. HALL: I am not going to justify anything; I am simply stating facts, and I am sure the hon. Member does not doubt the facts. In the year 1931, our export trade suffered a reduction of nearly 16,000,000 tons as compared with 1930. The reduction in our exports to France, Italy, Germany, and Belgium accounted for 10,500,000 of the 16,000,000 tons, and, again, adding Spain and the Irish Free State, the loss in the case of these countries amounted to nearly 12,000,000 tons. Last year, as compared with 1931, showed a reduction of nearly 4,000,000 tons in our export coal trade. The reduction in the case of the four countries France, Italy, Belgium and Germany, accounted for 4,500,000 tons, or 500,000 tons more than our total loss of export trade for that year. Adding again Spain and the Irish Free State, we account for losses of over 5,000,000 tons, or almost 1,500,000 tons more than our total loss during that year.

My hon. Friend spoke about further reductions in prices. Does he or anyone else imagine that it is only a question of reducing prices in the face of the restrictions which exist at the present time? He may refer to the Scandinavian countries; he may refer to the market in Poland, and in Denmark, Norway and Sweden. I know that those countries took a larger percentage of coal from Poland and Germany during last year and recent years than they did previously, and there is no justification for that in view of the trade balance between them and this country; but, if we had the whole of the trade which Germany and Poland now have in those three countries, Denmark, Norway and Sweden—if we had sent them the whole of the coal that they required last year—it would not make up for the loss of our export market in the four countries to which I have already referred.

I am not going to deal with the question of restrictions, although it has been referred to—French, Belgium and German restrictions—but I would like to ask the Secretary for Mines if he will, when he comes to reply, give, not only the House of Commons, but the coal industry generally, an idea of how the negotiations with these other countries are proceeding. We heard some time ago that tariffs were to be used as a bargaining weapon. I want to say—I do not mean it in a personal sense at all—that, if any industry in this country has been treated in a brutal and callous fashion by the present Government, it is the coal mining industry, and especially the export trade. It is no use those who went to Ottawa and negotiated the Ottawa Agreements coming here and saying that they brought back orders for an additional 100,000 or 200,000 tons of anthracite coal. The quality and price of Welsh anthracite coal almost demand a market for it. It is the one bright spot of the British coal industry, and it was so before the Ottawa Conference, because it was the one part of the British coal mining industry whose post-War output exceeded the pre-War output. I would also ask the Secretary for Mines to give us an idea when the Italians are likely to place the additional order for 1,000,000 tons of coal under The Hague agreement, from which South Wales has benefited so much. Already 2,000,000 tons have been sent, and there is an additional 1,000,000 tons waiting; and we are anxious that that order should be placed in South Wales as soon as possible.

We say quite frankly that there are defects in Part I of the Act. It has been shown that the Act has succeeded in maintaining some degree of stability in particularly difficult circumstances, but it has not succeeded in its main object, which was to fix such a price for coal as would give a proper standard of living for the miners, and, may I say, a fair margin of profit to the owners. Its failure must be attributed to some extent to the absence of proper co-ordination of prices between the districts. The mere fixing of minimum prices on a district basis tends only to substitute inter-district competition for individual competition, and it has been proved that this inter-district competition can be as severe as it was before the Act came into operation. The owners have endeavoured to co-ordinate district prices, but up to the present they have not succeeded. I understand that they have, at the request of the hon. Gentleman, who invited them to consider the defects of the Act, made representations that there should be some co-ordination on this question of district prices. The Miners' Federation also asked that this should be done, and I am sure my hon. Friend has read the very excellent memorandum issued by the Miners' Federation in the early part of last year. May I ask what the Minister is doing in regard to this matter. It is a long time since the owners made the representation to him. The Central Council has no power to fix prices itself, nor can they amend the prices fixed by a particular district. We claim that the central body should be given statutory powers to regulate the level of prices on a national basis. Unless this is done, there can be no assurance of effective co-ordination throughout the industry.

Then those of us who come from the exporting areas—we mention this question of the national levy with fear and trembling—believe that there should be complete co-ordination between the inland and the export trade. That is being done in those countries which are our chief competitors. Take, if you like, Poland. It can truly be said that Poland has virtually nationalised her coal-mining industry to enable her to deal effectively with the question of her export trade. She is able to compete with us for that reason, that the Government are heavily subsidising her export trade as they recognise the importance of that branch of the trade. Then, if amendments are to be made in Part I, we claim that, in the interests of the industry and of the workmen, representatives of the workmen should be allowed to share with the owners the responsibility for the control and the direction of the schemes, for the wages and conditions under which the workmen are employed almost entirely depend upon the price that is paid for the coal produced, and, therefore, it is but natural and equitable that they should have a voice in the fixing of those prices. We think that the participation of the representatives in the direction of the industry would prevent unnecessary controversy and delay and give that rapidity of decision and action upon which business so largely depends. After all, the representatives of the workmen are men of knowledge and experience of the industry who would be able to make a genuine contribution to the solution of the difficulties with which the industry is faced.

We think the Act could be strengthened so that in the inland trade a minimum delivered price should be fixed for various classes of coal in prearranged zones and so that coal is not sold in any zone below the price fixed for the particular class of coal in that zone. If properly co-ordinated and carried out, this would ensure that, as far as possible, each zone would supply its natural market and that collieries outside a particular zone would supply that zone only with coal which could not be produced from collieries within that zone. Part I has been in operation for two years of exceedingly great difficulty in the mining industry. We think it has more than justified itself. It could be strengthened as I have suggested. It should then be continued. To-day more than ever before the circumstances of the industry require that the principles of regulation and co-ordination should be rigidly applied, for to-day the surplus of productive capacity over present demand is greater than ever before. We claim that a return to the old conditions of free competition would be disastrous to the coal industry and to the country. We go further and claim that it is only by the European application of some such organisation that the coal export trade can be saved and a strong national organisation in this country, which is after all the chief producing country in Europe, will be a preliminary and necessary condition of an international or European organisation.

Sir ADRIAN BAILLIE: I desire to support the case against the continuation of Part I of the Coal Mines Act. I have listened with considerable interest to the speech which we have just heard, and I am sure that many of the arguments that the hon. Member used for the continuation of Part I and its application to the export trade will have impressed the House, and possibly even the Secretary for Mines. He suggested, however, that the hon. Member for Consett (Mr. Dickie) was proposing the abolition of Part I in order to allow of unfettered competition in the industry. If that is the hon. Member's intention, it is not mine. I merely suggest that the restrictions imposed by Part I are not the right sort of restrictions. We were told by the Lord Privy Seal that we should not be surprised, but I was surprised until I heard the hon. Member, representing a constituency chiefly employed in the export of coal, drop the remark that Welsh anthracite demands a market. If you happen to be favoured, it is suggested that Welsh anthracite demands a market.

Mr. CLARRY: It is 40 miles away.

Sir A. BAILLIE: I shall be excused for not knowing the geography of that part of the country. It will be sufficient to recall the situation that occurred in the December quarter of last year, affecting the Lothian Coal Company, which had to post up notices restricting the working week to three days when all the time they had on their books orders for coal for Scandinavia. The only reason why they could not fulfil them was because they had exhausted their quota. The Scottish district had exhausted its quota, and there was not a quota available to purchase. West Fife was in the same position. To pile up injury upon injury, the company had to pay a fine for failing to fulfil their obligations. An example such as that ought to have been sufficient to convince even the most ardent supporters of the regulation of the output of coal in this country that the particular form of regulation contained in Part I of the Coal Mines Act, 1930, is at least no better than the curate's egg. When the Government interferes in such an industry as the coal mining industry, with its ramifications and its variety of conditions, interests, and requirements, then that Government or its successor should not rest content with legislation which, while admittedly satisfactory to a large part of the industry, is certainly most unsatisfactory to a minority of that industry, and a very important minority in that it is engaged in the export trade of this country.

By whom was the Act drawn up? By the late Socialist Government. Why was the Act framed and what were its objectives? I find them stated in the memorandum, which has already been referred to, which was drawn up by the Miners' Federation explaining away the Act. It states in the opening paragraph the objectives as follow:

> "Part I of the Coal Mines Act, 1930, was designed to check the evils of unrestrained competition between the numerous units of the coal mining industry. Such competition has always been a source of weakness to the industry and a big factor in lowering its economic position."

I have very little doubt that the framers of the Coal Mines Act, 1930, might have hoped that the Act would be a stepping-stone towards nationalisation, which they always advocate on every platform but which, thank God, they have never yet been able to reach. As to their reference to unrestrained competition as a big factor in lowering the economic position, then, if nationalisation is to be the only alternative, experience shows that nationalisation has never succeeded in raising the economic position of the coal mining industry. Hon. Members will all agree that cut-throat competition is to be deprecated. If, however, it is a question of supplying co-operation instead of cut-throat competition, of supplying lubrication instead of friction, I agree, but I say that that co-operation must be based on common-sense principles, must have the willing consent of the co-operators, and must bear in mind the real interests of those concerned.

My claim and my indictment are that Part I and Part II of the Act of 1930 entirely ignore the conditions which are pre-requisite to healthy co-operation. I am supported in this, as far as I can make out, by Sir Ernest Gowers, the Chairman of the Coal Mines Reorganisation Commission. Speaking recently in Cardiff, he expressed considerable doubts as to the proved value of recent large amalgamations and combines, and added:

> "Voluntary amalgamation represents an organic growth, whereas compulsory amalgamation is a surgical operation."

It is an operation which unless the Ministry of Mines or this Government will intervene, will shortly take place in Scotland. It may be termed a surgical operation, but where is the anaesthetic? It will be vivisection by surgeons who, while very highly paid, are, so far as I know, inexperienced if not inexpert. I hope that, if the Government cannot intervene to stop this form of industrial brutality, they will at least see that these surgeons will only use the knife of fair play and common sense.

To return for a moment to the framers of the 1930 Act, it will not be uncharitable to assume that they and the Socialist Government were imbued with the laudable desire to protect the wages and the employment of the men in the coal mining industry. Let us see how far they have been successful. I agree with the hon. Member for Consett that all the recent troubles in the coal mining industry cannot properly be put down merely to the Coal Mines Act, 1930, but has that Act been successful in protecting the wages and conditions of employment in the industry? Speaking as to the export situation alone, I cannot give a single case where, as a result of the provisions of that Act, one miner has benefited. On the contrary, we have had the case of the Lothian Colliery Company which I quoted in my opening remarks. I am not exaggerating when I say that, since the Coal Mines Act, 1930, was introduced, 150,000 miners have lost employment. In December, 1932, there were 53,000 fewer miners on the colliery pay rolls than at the beginning of 1932, which again supports my argument. In the December quarter of 1932, on the other hand, the Scottish district was short of quota—and I would draw the attention of the hon. Member for Aberdare (Mr. G. Hall) to this—by 450,000 tons.

Mr. G. HALL: May I call the hon. Member's attention to the fact that almost every other coal-producing district in the country is at variance with Scotland because the Scottish owners are fixing the minimum price of that coal so that they are able to bring coal, which really ought to be used for export, inland and sell it there? They bring it into Lancashire and Yorkshire. If Scotland would export their coal, which they ought to export, at a proper price, then they would not compete and take the coal from some of the other localities.

Sir A. BAILLIE: I am entirely unimpressed. My whole argument is——

Mr. KIRKWOOD: Is it true?

Sir A. BAILLIE: If in Scotland, as I believe to be the case, the Scottish collieries are so efficiently organised that they can sell their coal in Lancashire at a lower price than the Lancashire collieries, I have no objection. If my hon. Friend's complaint is that the minimum prices are so low in Scotland that they affect the miners' wages, then one has to look a long way to find a higher level of earnings than that in the Scottish coal mining industry.

Mr. DUNCAN GRAHAM: I ask the hon. Member if he will be good enough to give any evidence to justify the statement that he has now made, that the wages in Scotland are higher than they are in any other part of the country? May I further call his attention to the fact that, because of the black-legging tendencies of the Scottish coalowners, they have to work a considerable number more days per year than in any other district in the country. Take the day wage——

HON. MEMBERS: Speech!

Sir A. BAILLIE: Again, that interruption only goes to confirm what I was saying. I was talking very specifically about the annual earnings, and if the hon. Member who chose to intervene just now likes to put forward the case that it is better to work fewer days in the year than more days in the year, I will give him a present of his own argument. As I was saying before I was interrupted, in the December quarter of 1932 the Scottish district was short of quota by 450,000 tons. With this position facing them, Scottish coal exporters were obliged to withold quotations. There was a definite loss of orders, but what was much worse than the loss of orders was the loss of confidence of the foreign buyer in the ability of the Scottish coal owners and exporters to deliver the goods. It has been argued to-night—it is very often put forward by the protagonists of what I consider is a monstrous piece of legislation—that a district can quite easily apply to the Central Council for an extra allocation. But hon. Members must realise that in order to obtain an extra allocation a district has to put forward a very good case, and that takes time, and when that time has elapsed the damage has been done. That was the case in the December quarter of 1932 in the Scottish district. On 17th November they made application to the Central Council for an extra allocation of 450,000 tons. Consideration of the application was deferred until 24th November, when only after severe opposition from the Midland districts they were allocated 300,000 tons. As I say, by that time the damage had been done and orders had been lost. It is this lack of elasticity in the operation of those restrictions which is one of the most vicious features of this legislation. I submit that it is not beyond the perspicacity of the Secretary for Mines and the Government to realise that the operations of the quota, as far as exports are concerned, have been, and inevitably must be, to the detriment of that part of our great industry.

There is only one other point I desire to make. Reference was made just now to the question of costs. I am entitled, I think, to assume that it was hoped, through the provisions of Part I of the Act, to raise the price of coal to the consumer. I make no objection to that at all. But what happened in point of fact? In the month of October last year the average cost of production had gone up as a result of those restrictive provisions by 1s. a ton, and the average selling price in October was down by 1s. 1d. a ton. There is a colliery very near to my home in Scotland, a young and efficient colliery, where they have a capacity output of 3,000 tons a day. Their standard tonnage is estimated at 2,000 tons per day. Even with the extra allocation which was accorded to Scotland in the last quarter of 1932, that colliery is given only 77 per cent. of its standard tonnage.

Mr. D. GRAHAM: Will the hon. Member name the colliery?

Sir A. BAILLIE: I will. The colliery is called Polkemmet.

Mr. GRAHAM rose——

HON. MEMBERS: Order!

Mr. KIRKWOOD: It depends who is speaking. If we happen to make an interjection we are out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER (Captain Bourne): The hon. Gentleman has not given way.

Mr. KIRKWOOD: They do not know the Rules of the House.

Sir A. BAILLIE: Perhaps I may proceed, with my hon. Friend's permission. I have named the colliery. I am only desiring to prove that even with 77 per cent. of its standard tonnage it really means that that colliery is limited to the production of 1,540 tons a day when it has a capacity of 3,000 tons. In other words, it is very little over 50 per cent. of its capacity.

Mr. D. GRAHAM: Is it true?

Sir A. BAILLIE: Is it reasonable to ask a new, developing, efficient colliery like that to be restricted to 50 per cent. of the capacity of its production? I am supported by the Chairman of the Reorganisation Committee, Sir Ernest Gowers. Referring to quotas, he says:

> "A quota system which swells the costs by making every mine work below capacity cannot be a lasting remedy.

My personal feeling is that coal for export markets should, as far as possible, not be subjected to the quota. I entirely agree that there must be regulation of the output of coal for the home market, but I suggest that the quota system is not the right way to restrict output. I submit to the Minister that if curtailment is required—and I believe curtailment of production is required—it should be effected, again as hinted at by Sir Ernest Gowers, by the closing down of pits where the costs are uneconomic. That having been done, the pits with low costs should be allowed to produce to capacity. Finally, I believe that it would well repay coalowners in this country to get together and subscribe to a fund for the temporary closing down of pits with uneconomic costs. Whether they were closed permanently or temporarily would be of no real importance. I said "temporarily" because of the possible increase in the demand for coal in the future. I beg of the Secretary for Mines to reconsider the case we are putting before him. I ask him to reconsider it, advisedly, because we have knocked at the door of the Secretary for Mines for many months now. We are entitled, at least, to some form of reconsideration of the case we are putting before the House to-night.

9.45 p.m.

Mr. ROBINSON: I do not rise to Debate the general question but to refer to a matter raised by the hon. Member for Aberdare (Mr. G. Hall), namely, the determination of minimum prices under the Coal Mines Act, 1930. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Sir A. Baillie) was not impressed by what was said by the hon. Member for Aberdare, but if he will be so kind as to listen to the remarks I have to make on the subject he may perhaps get a better impression of one of the great difficulties of the coal-mining industry. As I see it, the position is this. By Section 3 (2) of the Coal Mines Act, minimum prices are to be fixed in respect of each class of coal produced in a district. There, I think, is a fault, because the executive boards administering the district schemes can fix those minimum prices at whatever levels they wish. It seems to me that very grave difficulty arises here, because unless there is a very great amount of good will between the districts a very complex problem is bound to arise.

Right from the first there was a certain amount of difficulty with the Scottish Board. The Scottish Board failed to prepare any schedule of minimum prices, and there is no doubt that considerable pressure was required from the Central Council before a Scottish minimum price was determined. There has been still more difficulty. The Scottish people had lost a good deal of their export trade, and they looked around to find some other place where they could make up for it. In order to back themselves up in this matter they fixed their minimum prices at a level which had absolutely no relation whatever to the actual values or to the cost of production.

I wish to urge upon the Government and upon the Minister the necessity for providing some scheme whereby minimum prices in the several districts can be co-ordinated, in order to eliminate unfair competition. I will bring to the attention of the House one concrete case to show what can happen. For many years the Lancashire coalfield have supplied the electricity department of the city of Liverpool with its coal. The Lancashire coalfield is, of course, at the very gate of Liverpool and anxious and eager to supply it with the whole of its requirements. Last year, however, the city of Liverpool went to Scotland and bought her coal. She got 200,000 tons of coal for her electricity department from Scotland. Our complaint is that the price which Liverpool paid for that coal was actually less than the minimum price fixed by the Lancashire district. Not only that, but the price paid must have meant a loss of shillings per ton to the coalowners who sold that coal. If you add the cost of the freightage from Scotland to Liverpool, much more loss must have resulted. I am certain that if such a situation had arisen owing to the action of a foreign country and coal or any other commodity had been sold here at a heavy loss like that, every Member of this House would have been up in arms against a flagrant case of dumping.

I want to take this opportunity of considering what this situation means to the city of Liverpool. They saved £20,000. They saved one-fiftieth of a penny per unit on the electricity they sold—a very small amount—and what is important is that it did not save them from any deficit, because the Liverpool Electricity Department has been making money for years, but that they were just seizing this opportunity of making an extra profit at the expense of the Lancashire coal mines. This action of Liverpool meant that the Lancashire district lost £102,000 more in wages last year, 880 miners were put out of work, and 220,000 working days were lost, while the authorities of the Lancashire district had to pay out an extra £50,000 in unemployment pay. I think it is a very short-sighted policy not only from the Scottish point of view but from the point of view of the city of Liverpool.

It seems to me a very significant fact that to-morrow that same City of Liverpool is sending a deputation to this House to the Minister of Health asking that the hinterland of Liverpool, the county districts of Lancashire, should join in trying to find some of the money necessary to maintain the unemployed of Liverpool. It is a very short-sighted policy on the part of the Liverpool Corporation to ruin an industry and to impoverish the people whom they are now asking to support them. I know that they are considering contracting for a further three years' supply from Scotland, and I would ask them very carefully to consider the true position and to realise what their benefit is in the matter. A similar situation has taken place in regard to Southport. Southport has taken 32,000 tons of coal from Scotland, and there has been a corresponding loss of working days in the Lancashire coalfield. Southport depends for 80 per cent. of its income on the very working men in Lancashire whom they are depriving of their jobs. At the present time in Lancashire we are starting efforts to create a better industrial situation and the miners and the coalowners are uniting in a propaganda campaign with the slogan: "Lancashire coal for Lancashire people." Why not "Lancashire coal for Liverpool people?"

Mr. DENVILLE: Will the hon. Member explain to the House whether Liverpool went to Scotland to get her coal, so that she could break the ring of Lancashire coalowners?

Mr. LOGAN: Will the hon. Member explain to the House that Liverpool is controlled by Members of the National party?

Mr. ESSENHIGH: Including the hon. Member for the Scotland Division (Mr. Logan).

Mr. ROBINSON: That campaign of propaganda alone is not enough. The intention of Part I of the Act was to keep up the price of coal so that the industry could be run on a remunerative basis and that revenue might be made to provide decent wages for the men. I would plead with the Government to complete the purpose of the Act by so amending it as to provide means for the co-ordination of prices between the districts and to stop the useless, wasteful, cut-throat competition that is ruining the industry.

9.53 p.m.

Mr. PARKINSON: The hon. Member for Widnes (Mr. Robinson) has brought the Debate down to actual realities and has dealt with one of the points with which I propose to deal in the course of my remarks. The Coal Mines Act, Part I, was put into operation in order to overcome difficulties which were then operating in the national field. It was designed to check the evils resulting from unrestrained competition between numerous districts of the coal-mining industry, but we have heard sufficient to-night to realise that there are a large number of different units among the coal-owners who are acting with a view to securing their own individual prosperity. Such competition has always been a source of weakness to the industry and has had the effect of lowering the wages of the workers and weakening the structure of the industry.

We seem to forget the fact that the whole of the power with regard to the allocation is in the hands of the Central Council. We find Members of this House railing against the Government for not increasing their quota or doing something in that direction while, at the same time, the Government have not the power to do it. The power rests with the Central Council to do what they think is right in regard to the question of altering the quota. Since the War, new forces have arisen to cause a decline in the consumption of coal for heating, lighting and power, and markets have been completely reversed. Many countries have increased their own production of coal because they think it is best in the interests of their own countries to do so, instead of importing coal from other countries. I have a quotation here from a speech made by the Chairman of the Coal Mining Association of Great Britain, Mr. Evan Williams, who may be looked upon as one of the biggest figures in the coalowners association. He made a very pessimistic statement at the Central Council on 6th October. He said:

> "We all know that instead of getting better prices than we did when we began to function under this Act, we are really getting lower prices. This is due to the facts that we have placed more coal on the market than there was a demand for, that we have not been able to co-ordinate the regulation of price as between district and district, and that we have not been able to prevent in the districts the evasions of the provisions of the schemes which were designed for maintaining prices at a remunerative level."

A more depressing statement could not possibly be made by a man of the standing of Mr. Evan Williams. It shows the failure of the owners to look beyond individual interests to the well-being of the industry as a whole. It also shows the folly of placing too much coal on the market, and deals with the failure to co-ordinate prices or to remedy the evasions of the Act. The outstanding fact is that the predatory instincts of individual owners, or of districts, is the predominating feature. Are the coalowners not able to rise above individual interests? Are they not able to develop a collective mind? Cannot they look at the industry as a whole? Powers were given to them under the Act to enable them to restore the industry, to enable it to pull through a very difficult period. In contradistinction to the statement of Mr. Evan Williams we have a statement from Mr. Archer, the vice-chairman of the West Yorkshire Coalowners. He says:

> "The majority of coalowners would, I think, regard the repeal of Part I with dismay, and if they do not do so initially they would eventually. The facts prove that the districts which have been really trying to work Part I have benefited, whereas those which have not done so have hurst themselves."

We have heard a great deal about the difficulties which have arisen from the coalowners' point of view and from the exporters' point of view, indeed from almost every point of view. The hon. Member for Consett (Mr. Dickie) told a very dismal story. I do not know whether he was speaking on behalf of his constituents, or whether he was satisfied that the statement sent out by the exporters was meant to be a kind of manifesto for his political extinction at the next general election. I am sure that during the period during which the Coal Mines Act has been in operation we have had a steadier and stronger tendency in the trade than before. We must look at the profits which have been made on the sale of coal during the last few months. I am speaking in support of the retention of Part I. I say that it has been of service to the coal industry and to the country as a whole.

The profit on saleable coal raised in 1931 was 3.2 pence per ton; and it was practically the same for 1932, though, of course, we have only the returns for the first nine months of that year. The tonnage of saleable coal was 241,000,000 tons in 1927 and 213,000,000 tons in 1931. The hon. Member for Consett tried to make out that a lower output of coal was an offence or crime against the nation. If we produced coal during one year at our maximum capacity we could not export the coal or sell it, and we should find what we used to see 25 years ago, huge stacks of coal at every pit bank.

Mr. DICKIE: The hon. Member must surely know that we have this state of things now. There are millions of tons of small coal lying on the ground, unsaleable.

Mr. PARKINSON: It is in a minor degree to what it was 25 years ago. Then, in every colliery in Lancashire you would find huge stacks of coal waiting for the highest bidder. The costs of production in 1931-32 were practically the same as in 1929-30, but they were substantially below the figures for 1927-28. The average selling price for 1931-32 was in keeping with the price for 1929-30, there was practically speaking only a few coppers difference. The output per man in 1932 increased. The production of coal in 1931 was no less than 13,000,000 tons short of the quota allowed, and in the first nine months of 1932 it was 22,000,000 less. That disposes of the question that it is necessary to have a greater quota in order to meet the difficulties of certain exporters. Workmen's wages, including allowances in kind, were practically the same as they were prior to the agreement.

The hon. Member for Consett made one or two insinuations against hon. Members on this side of the House, but I should like him to realise that, no matter what his experience may be of the coal industry, there are people on this side with equal experience, perhaps a greater experience. The Act was passed in 1930 and the allocations were made to districts. These have been varied on several occasions. Let me quote from a report issued by the Secretary for Mines. On page 5 is stated:

> "In fixing total allocations in excess of those in any other quarter when regulation of output was operative, the Central Council doubtless desired to enable the districts to take advantage of any increased demand for coal. Demand continued to decline, however, and output, which fell short of allocation by 10,111,745 tons (15.07 per cent.) was 1,389,115 tons less than in the corresponding quarter of 1931, and 1,818,756 tons less than in the December quarter, 1931."

The deficiency of the output as compared with the quota in the June quarter was 5.56 per cent., and in the September quarter it was 14.03 per cent. It will be understood, therefore, that it is not a question as to the amount of coal which has been brought to the surface. There have been opportunities for these people if they had cared to utilise them. In connection with price regulation and co-ordination between districts there has been one of the glaring misapplications of the spirit of the Act. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Sir A. Baillie) has been speaking about the position in Scotland. I would like to read a short paragraph from page 9 of the same report:

> "Before Part I of the 1930 Act was passed, and before minimum prices were fixed, Scottish coal never came into Lancashire. Since the Act was passed, however, the Scottish coalowners or Scottish merchants have exploited the position, and large tonnages of coal from Scotland have been sold in parts of the Lancashire coalfield, depriving Lancashire collieries of valuable orders which they have enjoyed for many years. It would appear to be obvious that the minimum prices of the Scottish coal must have been fixed at a ridiculously low figure. The Lancashire owners feel very strongly that there should be amendments to Part I of the Act to enforce inter-district co-operation."

Lancashire during the last year seems to have been the tipping ground for all the cheap coal of Britain. An hon. Member behind me spoke about a campaign that was being launched. I would tell the House that as much coal is coming into Lancashire from other counties and Scotland as would provide work for 4,000 miners in the Lancashire district. Though the Scottish owners may be absorbing more people in their own area, they are encroaching over the border and causing a large number of our people to be unemployed. The hon. Member for Linlithgow on two or three occasions mentioned the name of Sir Ernest Gowers. I am one of those who think that Sir Ernest Gowers would be doing a better service if he was minding his own business, and if he cannot mind his own business he had better resign his position. We know the circumstances of the appointment, but we do not want the ridicule which he is trying to pour on Part I of the Act to be continued. Really, it is unfair for such a thing to take place, for a man in his position to publish such statements to the Press or to make them to individuals, and this sort of thing ought to be discontinued.

There will have to be inter-district agreements of a stronger character, and greater morality among the coalowners. It must not be a case of cut-throat competition, but of the widest co-operation possible. The hon. Member for Linlithgow spoke about Scotland being 450,000 tons over the quota during the last quarter of last year. Here are the figures I have: In the first quarter, ended March, 1932, they were 9.25 below the quota in production; in the quarter ended June they were 5.56 below; and in the September quarter they were 10.74 per cent. below the quota granted to them. It is very unfair for anyone to try to lead the House to believe that the Act has undermined the stability of a section of the industry. It has consolidated the industry. It gave to the owners all that they asked for to make their position secure, but they have so little faith in themselves or in each other that they believe they ought to continue a cut-throat competition which will lead them to the end of a very dark career. What is wanted is a better spirit in the industry. The selling side ought to have constant supervision and further reorganisation. Sound schemes for all these problems can be formulated, given the spirit of co-operation and good will among the owners. The only alternative is to drift back to the old bad conditions. The industry needs clear direction, unity of purpose and co-operation for the good of those engaged in it. Failing that, we shall be as we have been before. A return to the old conditions of free competition would be disastrous to the industry and to the country. Let me quote a few words from the League of Nations Report of January, 1932. There it is stated:

> " National organisation is the preliminary and necessary condition of international regulations. In 1929 one of the chief obstacles to this idea was the absence of national organisation, notably in Great Britain, the chief producing country in Europe."

We must either go forward with the reorganisation given under the Mines Act, or we must slide back into the abyss of which I have spoken.

10.14 p.m.

Mr. CURRY: In the few minutes that remain I wish to express a point of view which I think has not been expressed so far in this Debate. I find myself not quite in agreement with either the hon. Member for Consett (Mr. Dickie) or the hon. Member for Aberdare (Mr. G. Hall). The hon. Member for Consett has placed us all under an indebtedness by giving us the opportunity for such a valuable discussion on such an important subject. The facts which he brought out and the views to which he and those supporting the Motion have given expression, cannot be brushed aside as the hon. Member for Aberdare tried to do by the simple statement that the administration of the Act is in the hands of the owners. It is a great surprise to me that in the case of an Act which was passed by the Labour Government we should now be told that the men have no voice in its administration. I think that position ought to be noted, because I am firmly of opinion that we shall never have permanent peace in this industry until we give those employed in it an effective voice in the fixation of quota and prices, if we are to go on fixing them.

The hon. Member for Aberdare said that we must move forward to the coordination of the export and inland areas in the country and try to get them to co-operate—as has been done, I understand, in Germany—but he rather misrepresented the hon. Member for Consett by saying that he wanted to take away some of the advantages which exporters were enjoying. The view expressed by the hon. Member for Consett was that the Act is not an advantage, but a disadvantage to the exporting industry, and the facts which have been brought out in this Debate point to the necessity for a proper Government inquiry into the working of this part of the Act. It was with that in view that I put upon the Paper an Amendment which it has not been possible for us to discuss. Much has been said on the benches opposite about the coalowners, and I detected in one or two speeches a note of cynicism in references to the coalowners. But they are not indulging in these evasions out of choice. When we were debating the Coal Mines Act last summer I called attention to a conversation which I had had with a well-known coalowner in the county of Durham who told me that that week he was writing notices for some hundreds of men, not because he could not sell his coal, but because he would not attempt to sell it underneath the fixed price. All honour to that man. But in that type of man the sense of trusteeship for those whom he employs is highly developed, and it is hard on those men if they have to suffer unemployment because of their employer's high standard of moral integrity.

Mr. LAWSON: Somebody else would get the contract.

Mr. CURRY: Yes, but if we lose from British industry that sense of honour which is the fine gold of commerce, whether we lose it through the operations of this Act or in any other way——

Mr. LAWSON: Somebody in Durham got the order.

Mr. CURRY: Certainly, but as I say if we allow to be undermined that sense of honour which has been the pride of British industry ever since ships sailed to sea—if we once lose that out of British industry, we shall have lost the foundation upon which our Imperial and commercial greatness rests. If there is even a suspicion of such a loss, then it is no answer—and I am surprised that the remark should come from the quarter from which it has come—to say that somebody else got the order. The fact that a man of the calibre of that owner should suffer economic loss because of the faults of this Act is a mandate to this House and is the strongest reinforcement possible for the request that we should have an inquiry into the working of this Act and discover the facts, and then legislate in the full light of knowledge. We should do away for ever with the sort of debate which we have had to-night in which speakers in different quarters of the House and from different parts of the country, have been giving us contradictory statements of their opinions and of the facts. We can only do it by an inquiry.

I would remind the hon. Member for Aberdare that he pointed out at great length the changes in the world conditions which have sprung up since this Act began to operate. An Act which was passed in 1930 may not be applicable to the condition of things existing in 1933. The year 1931 altered a tremendous lot of the relationships between one market and another, and we should not go on, in a great industry like this, continuing an Act simply because somebody passed it or simply because it happens to fit in with a certain political faith, when we have direct evidence that it is lowering the moral standard of our commercial people, bringing unemployment in certain areas, leading to inequalities between one county and another, and generally playing ducks and drakes with an industry which is the very foundation of our commercial and industrial greatness.

Mr. E. BROWN: I am sure the House will agree that the hon. Member for Consett (Mr. Dickie) has raised a live issue and an issue of great interest, not merely to this House, but to the country as a whole. The only regret that the House will have is that the time has been so short that a number of Members who would wish to have made their varying contributions, for they would have been varying, have not had that opportunity. I will do my best to be as brief as I can in covering the ground, so that, if possible, when I have done, there may yet be time for some others to speak, but that I cannot promise; I will do my best. The reason I cannot promise is very obvious. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Sir A. Baillie) said he was knocking at the door. It might be very simple if all who knocked at the door of the Minister of Mines at this time wanted the same thing, but he wants one thing, another hon. Member wants another thing, a third wants quite a different thing, and a fourth another yet again. They all knock at the door, and they all want different things; and what makes it more complicated is this, that some of them agree with each other about one thing, or two others may disagree with each other about another thing or another two things.

The result is, as the Debate has shown to-night, that this is a very difficult and complicated question, and, as I say, it is a regret that we have not had longer to consider it. Still, we must be grateful to the hon. Member for Consett for seizing the opportunity and, in his own vigorous way, putting his case. He made a quotation from a speech by me, but I think, if he re-reads it, he will see that he does me an injustice, for in that speech, so far from making the point which he was making, I deliberately stated that I did not make the claim that the quota has anything to do with it. I remember the speech very well. It was the only one of that kind that I made in the course of the discussions upon that Bill, for my objections to that Bill were not objections held by many of my hon. Friends. As a matter of fact, one or two of the objections that I lodged in the course of the Debates on that Bill were sustained, and it is the fact to-day that it is possible to give adequate standard tonnages so that the developing pit can be met, because I proposed an Amendment to the Bill which in substance was accepted and is now part of the Act.

That quotation comes from a discussion two and a-half months after the Act had begun to operate, when there was the initial difficulty affecting every port in the land and, more than that, a particular colliery in South Yorkshire that had a real grievance. The committee of investigation set up to inquire into the change upheld the colliery, and so the Act was found to have the remedy for the objection then raised. If the hon. Member for Consett will re-read the whole speech, instead of looking at one quotation only, he will find that he has done me, of course without any intention, an injustice in that matter. I think, if he will also study the particular speech of the President of the Board of Trade from which he quoted, he will find that it was given in circumstances which are very interesting in view of some of the issues which are now being raised.

Now let me deal with some of the points that have been raised in this Debate. It is true, of course, that we are dealing with the operation of this Act in the present state of the coal industry, and we have to regret that we have seen a contraction in this country. Part of the troubles that we have been discussing to-night do not arise from the structure of the Act at all. They arise from the circumstances in which the Act has to be applied. Most of the Members who have discussed the operation of the quota regulations under the Act have admitted that they do not want to see the abolition of the whole of Part I. It is interesting to notice that the hon. Member for Consett himself is one of those who are inclined to say that there is a case for the regulation of output and price in the inland market.

I will come back to that a little later, but I point that out now because much of the propaganda that is made against the Act is not based on any discrimination in the operation of either the regulation of output or the minimum price. It is based on the idea that all you have to do if you want to bring back health to the coal industry is to wipe the whole of the Act away. I am glad to have noticed in the Debate that that opinion does not seem to be largely adopted. That atmosphere is sometimes created even by speakers who say in the course of creating the atmosphere that they do not want to sweep Part I of the Act away. Hon. Members will have noticed that in the replies to questions which I have made I have continually told the House that every question asked about a difficulty under the operation of this Act has been analysed in my Department. Every letter that has appeared about the Act, for and against it, containing any material facts, has been analysed, and we have tried as far as we can to trace the allegations made to their sources.

It must have been borne upon the Members who have listened to this Debate that allegations are many, opinions are many, but facts are very few. We had one fact in the course of the Debate in the admirable and eloquent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow. It is a fact concerning a particular group of collieries. It is true, as he says, that there was a short allocation in December, 1932, but I would ask him to notice that there have only been two quarters in the whole period of the operation of the Act when there has been anything like a short allocation, and that was in each case the final quarters of the years 1931 and 1932. In the case he quoted, the case of the Lothian Coal Company, notices were issued. I took some personal interest in it, and I saw the owners concerned. The hon. Member knows quite well that 300,000 tons were first allocated, and then an additional 150,000 tons. I took the trouble to follow the thing up in regard to both West Fife and East Fife, and in regard to Lothian, and I found—[Interruption.] the particular area was concerned with the operations of the Wemyss Coal Company; that is a case which my hon.

Friend had in mind. He mentioned a case that was in his own area, and I took the trouble to go into the facts. Notices were issued, the propaganda was started, the atmosphere was created, and these are the facts. The number of days worked during the week ending the 10th December in the Whitehill Pit of the Lothian Coal Company were five; for the 17th December, six; and the 24th December, six. In the week in question for which notices had been published, the number was five. For the Polton Pit, in the week ending 10th December, five days; 17th December, six days; 24th December, six days; 31st December, five days. So the notices and the facts do not agree.

With regard to the Newbattle Pit the case is rather different. In the week ending 10th December, five days, one stop day; 17th December, four days; 24th December, six days; 31st December, five days, one stop day. The stoppages came as normal in the first week in January, the New Year Scottish holidays. The practice at this undertaking was to work 11 days a fortnight, six days in one week and five in the other. Apart from the week ending 17th December, when one pit, Newbattle, worked four days, full time, allowing for holidays, had been worked during the period in question. With regard to the export trade, there is not a Member of this House, or a member of the Central Council of Coal Owners, who would put any obstacle in the way of the expansion of the export market or the fulfilment of a single order for export. I am bound to admit that in the course of my inquiries I have had a few cases put before me—cases, not assertions, which I have been able to verify. It so happens that of all the Members of the House I have been most successful in finding them. Two of about 10 were found by me in my own constituency. But when we take these dozen lost orders and compare that figure, which has been proved, with the assertions made in this Debate, the issue is a very different one. My hon. Friend the Member for West Lothian did put his finger on what is a very real difficulty when he referred to the loss of confidence among foreign buyers. There, I am bound to tell the House, he was on firmer ground, for I have got evidence that there is a feeling, whether it be justified or not, in the minds of some foreign buyers that when the negotiations which are now proceeding have come to a successful conclusion, as I trust they will, it may be that they will not be able to get delivery if they place extra orders. Let the House bear that in mind in the discussion of this problem.

The hon. Member for Consett raised the very difficult question of evasions. I would point out to him that there is more than one way of looking at the problem of evasions. There are those who take the view that the way to deal with evasions is to scrap the whole Act. Others take the view that to stop evasions the thing to do is not to have fewer regulations but more regulations. The fact, alas, is a serious one, and the point put by the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Curry) is a serious one, too, because there can be no doubt whatever in the mind of anyone who has examined the question as to what is going on, and in a moment or two I will go so far as to give the House some instances of the methods which are adopted for evading the regulations of the Act. It is having a bad moral effect on the industry, and those responsible, the Central Council of Coal Owners or the Government—if the Government have to take action—may be led to draw very different conclusions from those drawn by people who say that what we have to do is to scrap the Act.

Let me for a minute or two deal with the problem of the foundation of the Act itself. The Act was passed for a very simple reason. I do not understand one or two of the complaints of the hon. Member for Aberdare (Mr. G. Hall) for if there are not representatives of the Miners' Federation on the board the responsibility does not lie here; it lies on the benches opposite. The Bill startled me when I saw it and for many reasons I was strongly against it in its passing. The title of the Bill said:

> "An Act to provide for regulating and facilitating the production, supply and sale of coal by owners of coal mines;"

It is now too late for complaints to be made from the Opposition Benches that there is not a joint body of some kind to operate the Act. The hon. Member for Aberdare will know that it is a perfectly fair point that I am making. Responsibility is with the owners of coal, and there are often reminders of that.

[Mr. Brown.]

The basis of the Coal Mines Act was a production from British mines of about 300,000,000 tons a year. At the moment there is an actual market of 209,000,000 tons a year. Up to the month of November, we feared that it would not actually reach 200,000,000 tons, but the last quarter brought the figure up to 209,000,000 tons. That is the reason why many who objected to some of the provisions of the Act do not find it possible to advocate the abolition of the Act, and do not join in the propaganda put out by some of the organisations that have been circularising hon. Members in the last two or three days.

In dealing with the Act this House has to consider the industry as a whole—and I mean by that the miners who hew the coal and bring it to the surface, the owners who have to dispose of it and the sellers of it, either at home or abroad. More than that, the House has to bear in mind the interests of the community as a whole. I was taught when very young that when coal was sick, Britain was sick. I told some of my Danish friends the other day that when Britain is sick she does not eat bacon. Coal is sickening in this country and we cannot hope to get coal well again if we take our own point of view and try to attribute to certain things in the Act every ill that has come upon coal since the passing of the Act. It is grossly unfair to suggest that the drop in the export of coal has anything to do with the structure of Part I of the Act, excepting perhaps in a very minor degree. The hon. Member for Consett made it quite plain that he did not do that. I am now referring to certain propaganda that has gone very far and very fast in recent days. The charge that the Act is responsible for the reduction of coal exports is not only grossly unfair, but, to anybody who knows the Act, the charge is ridiculous.

What was the purpose of the Act? It was to meet a situation in which the industry does not respond to the ordinary economic test. The ordinary economic test is this: that if you produce coal, and if you can meet the demand of the consumers both in quality and in price, you can get any market in the world. Is there anybody, in this House or outside, who will contend that a mere price-cutting campaign in the export market will win us back any proportion of what we have lost? The facts that have been brought forward to-night will prove the contrary. In the way he spoke of the restrictions in Germany, in France and in Belgium, I do not agree with the hon. Member for Aberdare. Hon. Members are just as unfair to the countries concerned when they say that those restrictions are due solely to tariff measures taken by this Government as are those who say that the drop in the export trade is due to the Act. I do not agree with that. I am not going to say that there may not be an element of truth in it, but I say that anyone who studies the structure of those countries will know that they are themselves coal-producing countries as well as coal-importing countries; and the real reason for the major part of these restrictions has nothing to do with the fiscal system of this country, though it may be that the fiscal system of this country will enable us in the course of our arguments to overcome that difficulty partially.

Sir HERBERT SAMUEL: It may not.

Mr. BROWN: We can only do as our mutual Leader used to say: we can only wait and see; and I should think that the right hon. Gentleman will be quite willing to do that, for I remember him standing in this House, not very far from where he is now, and asserting that, if we went in for a tariff, there would be a rise in the cost of living to the poorest of the poor. I think we can afford to wait and see; but I assert that, when you are dealing with restrictions in Germany, France, Belgium and Spain, you are not dealing with restrictions that have been mainly imposed for fiscal or any other reasons connected with the policy of this country. Those countries are themselves in possession of coal industries that are sick. They are coal-producing countries and they have their own difficulties. We have realised that fact, and for any person outside or inside this House to assert that merely destroying the regulations with regard to price in Part I of the Act of 1930 will win us back those markets is to assert what they will find it very difficult to prove.

Mr. REMER: I think that the hon. Gentleman will also find that there are subsidies in Poland.

Mr. BROWN: I am not unaware of that fact, but let me go a little further. Let me point out that the working experience of the Act has shown many things. It has shown, first of all, that it might have been good if more power had been given to the central board than was given in certain directions. I need not deal with the question of allocation except to quote one set of figures for the purpose of comparison. The allocations as regulated for the last two years have on the whole, with the exception of certain areas in the last quarters of 1931 and 1932, been ample to meet the demand. There has been a margin, at the smallest, of 1,700,000 tons, and, at the largest, of 10,000,000 tons.

I now want to deal with the question of evasion, because this is one of the gravest issues that can be raised, and the one which, I am sure, is exercising the minds of all those concerned with the operation of the Act. Let me, without passing any comments, quote a series of the types of evasion which have come to our notice. These are examples of the evasions of the minimum price provisions that are operated in different districts. I will give the principal and most artful first. They are as follow:

1. The formation of subsidiary companies to which coal is sold at the statutory minimum price, the subsidiary companies in turn selling it at less than the minimum price, their losses being borne by the parent company.

2. Selling coal at prices below the minimum price ruling.

3. Selling more than one kind of coal at a time to one consumer, one kind at the minimum price and the other at a discount.

4. Selling a parcel of coal to a customer the greater part at the minimum price and the balance invoiced at a nominal price of a few pence per ton.

5. The payment of exorbitant remuneration to selling agents whose functions are purely nominal, to sell at prices below the minimum, making good their losses from their remuneration.

6. The purchase of stores from customers at inflated prices.

7. Coke is outside Part I of the 1930 Act. Selling of coal and coke together, the former at a minimum price, the latter at a substantial discount on the current market rate.

There are others. I have put these on record to show to hon. Members concerned that we are not without knowledge, and to show the hon. Member that we do not need an inquiry into the matter. The only inquiry I want to have is one in every case where anyone makes an assertion about a lost order as to where, when and how that order was lost, and I should like to have that whenever the assertion is made, because it would be very helpful in any discussion that may be forthcoming about the defects which it has been admitted in all parts of the House that the Act has.

Mr. SLATER: Legislation would certainly be required to deal with those matters.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. Member will understand that I am not entitled, nor is anyone, to discuss legislation. That is why I put my speech in the form that I put it. Let me tell the hon. Member precisely what we have done. We have consulted all sections of the coal trade. The Mining Association informed the Government that the majority of the coalowners are in favour of the continuance of Part I and that a sub-committee has under consideration those amendments to the scheme which can be effected without fresh legislation which will secure general agreement among the coalowners to the continuance of Part I.

Sir H. SAMUEL: If my hon. Friend is passing away from evasions, can he tell us whether any of those evasions are legal?

Mr. BROWN: Some of them are evasions of the letter and some of the spirit, but it is not as easy under the structure of the Act to stop even illegal evasions as it would appear. It is one of the problems that are now exercising the minds of the Central Council. Let me make the point about the inquiry. The Miners' Federation unanimously recommended that Part I, amended and strengthened in certain directions, should continue. The Coal Merchants' Federation said it would view with regret a decision to allow the Act to lapse. The Coal Exporters' Federation urged that coal for export and bunkers should be free from the operation of the quota and minimum prices. Another body representing wholesale coal merchants recommend that Part I should lapse in December 1, 1932. We have done our best to make inquiries and, more than that, the Central Council has been busily engaged discussing this issue. I think, therefore, there is no need whatever for a new inquiry in the matter.

I should like to say a word or two further about the export trade. As distinct from wild statements made in some propaganda, the Chamber of Shipping have put their view in a very moderate way. They say they are of opinion that the quota and minimum price restrictions of the Coal Mines Act had tended to hamper the export of coal and had contributed to the grave loss of employment in the coal and shipping industries. We have had a lot of figures about exports. It is true that we have lost 4,500,000 tons in 1932 as compared with 1931, but there is another remarkable fact. While in the markets to which the hon. Member referred, the coal-producing coal-consuming markets, we have losses, 1932 saw a gain in quite a number of our other markets. That is a point which, I think, the House should take into account in discussing this matter. For instance, Denmark increased her demand last year over 1931 by 505,000 tons. There were increases from Sweden, Norway, Finland, Latvia and Lithuania—none of them large, but all of them showing the new tendency in the North-West European market, and a very remarkable one.

Mr. D. GRAHAM: And from Russia?

Mr. BROWN: Not from Russia. Russia is one of our competitors in some of the markets in the Mediterranean, and a very serious competitor. That is the answer to some of those who say that by mere price cutting you can get markets all over the world. I think this point is one of instruction, and throws a ray of light on what can be done under the present regulations. There is a small increase in certain South American countries—in Brazil, for instance, and in Cuba. There is a very remarkable increase in Canada of 760,000 tons. The year 1932 is the largest year we have ever had in exports to Canada—1,671,000 tons. When we add these together we find that while there is a loss in the markets to which the hon. Member for Aberdare referred, there is a gain of 2,579,000 tons in these other markets in 1932 over 1931. I am entitled to point out to the right hon. Member for Darwen (Sir H. Samuel) at any rate, that while there has been no agreement in the matter, and it is much too early for me to discuss the details while our customers are still in this country and we are still talking, it is quite obvious that there is a new mind in North Western Europe, and we are getting some fruit from the discussion.

Let me say a word or two on another point before I sit down. It is obvious than hon. Members in all parts of the House are uneasy lest anything should be done to hinder the export of coal. The Central Council of Coalowners have been working since the summer on Amendments to schemes which it is expected will remove, or at least reduce, some of the difficulties which schemes of regulation involve. They have not yet reached conclusions which they can place before the Government, but I wish to emphasise the point made in June by the President of the Board of Trade and my predecessor, that the administration of the schemes must be put right. That has been, in fact, the condition of the continuance of the scheme for five years. In regard to tariff negotiations with foreign countries, assurances have already been given that if there is agreement to take additional quantities of British coal, the necessary supply will be available. If those negotiations result in increased trade for British coal, I think the whole House will agree with me that it is unthinkable that the trade should be hindered through want of flexibility in the machinery of the Act. May I point out, as I did in the course of the short speech I made on the Adjournment in December, that district schemes now have the power to separate inland from export coal as a class of coal. That is now part of the machinery of the Act, and they can do it if they wish.

I would point out that one of the difficulties is that some of those who are most clamant for the removal of the restrictions on the allocation for export are just those who would most violently oppose it if it were done. The real trouble is that the knot is tied when those who have allocations for export desire to use them coastwise in the inland market. That is the crux of the whole problem. That is why it is not as easy to solve the problem as some of our hon. Friends would suggest. It is not because it is not in the power of a district to do it, but for reasons best known to themselves and to those who have studied the structure of the Act, owners in every district have decided not to use that particular machinery.

Lancashire may have bought Scottish coal. The illustration of coal being brought from Ayrshire to Liverpool is a perfect illustration of one of the reasons why it is difficult at times to get an extra allocation for certain districts. It is very difficult to expect the representative of the inland district to vote excess allocation if he thinks that it is not to be used to send abroad, but used in competition with him in his own market at a price which may be—as I believe in this case is the fact—below the local minimum price. If you put powers into the hands of the Council to make separate allocations for inland and export coal it would then be possible to ensure that the requisite amount of coal for export could be available. I hope that the coalowners will come to an early decision on this matter. I can assure the hon. Member interested in this particular side of the subject and the House that unless the Central Council reaches a conclusion in the near future as to steps to be taken to ensure that coal for export is available, it will then be of course a question for the decision of the Government as to whether they will themselves take action in that matter.

Mr. MARTIN: How long is "the near uture"?

Mr. BROWN: Shorter than six months, which I think the hon. Member regards as a reasonable period. In view of what is happening, I should think six months too long. With regard to the Motion and the Amendment on the Order Paper, the House will see from what I have said that I am in sympathy with elements in all of them, but I cannot accept any of them on behalf of the Government. I would, therefore, suggest as the wisest thing after this nteresting and very valuable Debate, in which I regret that so many of the Members who wished to speak have been unable to take part, either the Motion hould be withdrawn or we should exercise the two minutes left for another Member to see his way to talk out the Motion.

10.58 p.m.

Mr. MILNE: I venture to intervene in the Debate because I represent the mining constituency of West Fife which is the centre of all the trouble and has suffered more than any other district. I think I heard an hon. Member ask, "Where is West Fife?" I can tell him. West Fife is the principal exporting county in Scotland. There are collieries there mainly concerned with the export trade. They are the best equipped in the country, and the management is second to none. In spite of the facts to which I have referred, at the end of the year hundreds of men were thrown idle, not through lack of work, but as a result of the operation of an Act of Parliament. I address the House upon a mining topic with very real diffidence, because I feel that I am addressing Members, many of whom are equipped with a knowledge which I do not possess, but which I envy and respect. On the other hand, I have the advantage that I am entirely free from any prepossessions. When I entered Parliament I found the Coal Mines Act upon the Statute Book and I regard it neither with favour nor illwill. Amidst all the welter——

It being Eleven of the Clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

The Orders of the Day were read, and postponed.

IMPORT DUTIES ACT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—[Sir F. Thomson.]

11.2 p.m.

Sir B. PETO: I put a question to-day to the President of the Board of Trade, on which I wish to say a few words. It will be for the convenience of hon. Members if I first read the question, and the answer I received, which made me give notice that I would raise the matter on the Adjournment. I asked the President of the Board of Trade:

"whether he can give any date by which an order may be expected, in accordance with the recommendations of the Import Duties Advisory Committee, on the application of the fabric glove industry; whether the commercial negotiations with foreign countries, which are delaying the decision, relate to the glove industry or other industries; and whether, in view of the depression in the fabric glove industry in this country, due to the dumping of surplus foreign produce at prices below cost of production, he will arrive at a decision at the earlist possible moment."

The reply that I received was as follows:

"I cannot give a date by which a decision will be reached on the Committee's recommendations, but the hon. Member may rest assured that there will be no unnecessary delay. As regards the second part of the question, it would not be expedient to make detailed announcements as to the scope of negotiations which are in progress."

I do not desire, indeed it would be out of order, to go into any question as to why the Import Duties Advisory Committee have made a recommendation to the Treasury, or the nature of that recommendation or the evidence that produced that recommendation. What I am concerned with is the position of this House in relation to this new method of procedure in dealing with tariff questions. The only information that has been vouchsafed was a communique which appeared in the Press, in a few lines, on the 23rd February. I will read it. I am quoting from the "Times." It is headed:

"DECISIONS DELAYED.

"The Treasury state that they have also received from the Import Duties Advisory Committee recommendations relating to Customs duties on the following commodities:

Yeast,
Pottery and clay products,
Baskets,
Fabric Gloves,

but that in the present stage of the commercial negotiations and discussions which are in progress with various foreign countries they have deferred a decision whether or not to make Orders in pursuance of these recommendations."

It is necessary for my purpose to show that this question of duties upon fabric gloves is not a question of a new duty. There has been a history of duties in relation to that particular industry. They have had varying duties, sometimes on and sometimes off, for 15 years. In 1918 they came under the Safeguarding Duties Act, which operated against imports from enemy countries, mostly imports from Germany, as these imports practically are all made in Saxony. There has been more general legislation since. There was a duty of 33⅓ per cent. for five years, but when the Labour Government came into office for the first time, that duty was allowed to lapse in 1923. It was reimposed two years later, in 1925, and continued for a further five years when it lapsed again under the Labour Government in 1930. Then we come to the present Government. They began with no duty at all. Just before Christmas 1931 we had the Abnormal Importation Duties Act, which imposed a duty of 50 per cent. In April that was changed to a duty of 20 per cent. There have been several applications since. We now learn that a recommendation has been made, and obviously it must be for an increase in the duty. I want to point out in the first place that this is no new duty. The industry has had a duty and has been without a duty, and under the present Government there has been a Duty of 50 per cent., and one of 20 per cent. Therefore I ask hon. Members to consider the position of this House in regard to the Import Duties Advisory Committee and the Government. The Committee is inacessible to hon. Members. When we go to the Department we are told that the duty of the Advisory Committee is to advise the Government, and that no Government Department exercises any control over them. Now we know that when they come to a decision it may be delayed for weeks and months while negotiations go on with foreign countries dealing perhaps with industries which had no relation whatever to the industry which has been the subject of the recommendation.

I want to know when this recommendation was made. Was it this year; since Christmas? I was under the impression the other day that the Board of Trade were waiting for the recommendation of the Advisory Committee. I want to know why workpeople should be thrown out of work, as in this case, and why this industry should be sacrificed in the supposed interests of other workpeople? Is it a question of the greatest goods to the greatest number. The fabric glove industry is practically destroyed in this country. Only one or two little factories are operating at all, and only a minute fraction of those employed a few years ago are now in employment.

It is only in one special line, fabric gloves made from artificial silk that any business at all is done. This industry had protection under the Abnormal Importation Duties Act, because there was an abnormal flood of dumped goods into this country. The position in January was worse than it was 12 or 13 months ago. In January, 107,000 dozen fabric gloves were imported from abroad, and in one case an order has been placed by a firm of wholesale glove buyers in London for the purchase of 24,000 dozen simplex cotton gloves in a single line which had been bought by a firm in America. They were sent to this country because there was no demand for them in New York, and were sold at 7s. 6d. per dozen pairs, which is about half the price of the cost of production in Saxony and about one-third of what they would cost to produce in this country.

There is every evidence, therefore, that as far as the abnormal importation of dumped goods is concerned, the position is worse now than when there was a 50 per cent. duty. The condition of the industry is deplorable. The industry is practically wiped out. There were considerations that related to Lancashire yarn. Now, far from Lancashire yarn being used in the production of these Saxony fabric gloves, the yarn that is being used in Germany is almost exclusively German-spun cotton yarn, which is very much cheaper than anything which could be imported from Lancashire.

I want to know when this recommendation was made, and with what country these negotiations are taking place. If the Minister cannot tell us that, let him tell us whether the negotiations relate to any industry connected with glove-making. The industry in this country lately employed 1,000 hands, at another time 2,000 hands, and if we made here all the fabric gloves that we use it would employ 6,000 hands. Is the Minister sure that in keeping us waiting until the industry is finally destroyed, for some hypothetical advantage we shall get for some other industry, he is not grasping at the shadow and dropping the bone?

1.12 p.m.

Mr. HALES: I want to put before the House the very desperate condition of the pottery industry of North Staffordshire. To a large extent the pottery industry is affected similarly to the glove industry, inasmuch as the Abnormal Import Duties Act resulted in a duty of 50 per cent. From that moment a new era of prosperity dawned on the district. Factories were employed on full time, more hands were engaged and machinery was ordered for the increase of business which rapidly came in. Then, to the consternation of the district, the Advisory Committee was appointed. It adopted a course which to every business mind seemed amazing. Instead of allowing the existing duties to remain until they had had an opportunity of going into matters in detail, and seeing whether the duties were ample or insufficient, they adopted the course of making a 20 per cent. datum line, raising the duty by 10 per cent. up to 20 per cent., and reducing the 50 per cent. to that 20 per cent. level.

The results were disastrous. Immediately the new duties came into force many orders from the Continent and home buyers were cancelled, and to-day in Staffordshire you can see thousands and thousands of tea sets lying unsaleable in the warehouses.

I am very pleased indeed to find that there is some possibility of the duties being enhanced. After 10 months of weary waiting, during which time the whole district has been on tenter hooks, not knowing what was to happen, we find that after a recommendation has been made which means the enhancement of the existing duties, we are told that for some mysterious reason of international bargaining the duties are not to be divulged, and we are still in uncertainty. I demand on behalf of the potters and manufacturers in North Staffordshire that we should not be victimised, that this industry should not be made a counter in some bargaining business abroad and brought to the verge of ruin. The situation is desperate, and I hope that the Government will see the importance, at this time, when everybody is asking for more employment, of not taking away the livelihood of these people, who have been waiting for 10 long months for the restoration of their prosperity. I hope the Government will at once carry out what the committee have advised.

11.16 p.m.

Mr. HOLDSWORTH: To those of us who never believed in tariffs as a bargaining power, some of the statements made during the last two or three weeks by different Ministers have been very interesting. Only a week ago, the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to the use of tariffs as a bargaining weapon. This afternoon, the Lord President of the Council made the point that, if the world was to recover, there must be a lowering of tariff barriers. The Prime Minister last week said that at the World Economic Conference the opportunity would be taken of pressing home the necessity for lowering tariff barriers, and that our tariff would be used to that end. Members of the Conservative party have told us repeatedly that the purpose of placing tariffs on the Statute Book was that they should be used to bring in Free Trade throughout the world. We desire to impress that point of view on the Minister to-night. All these questions that are being raised show how little sincerity there is in many of the statements about the use of tariffs as a bargaining weapon. But I assure the Minister that so long as tariffs are used, in order to restore world trade, we shall give them every support in our power. We would like the Minister to-night to reassure us that the statements of the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Lord President of the Council can be accepted as positive proof of the intention of the Government to use tariffs and promote freedom of trade among all the nations of the world.

Sir FRANK SANDERSON: It was not my intention to take part in this Debate but the point raised by the hon. Member for Barnstaple (Sir B. Peto) is so important that I would like to mention the case of the duty upon linseed in this connection. A few weeks ago I raised the question of the import duty upon linseed and the seriousness of its effects. I pointed out that the result would be that we should be inundated with linseed oil from abroad and what I then intimated has proved correct. During December and January no less than 5,000 tons of linseed oil——

Sir B. PETO: May I make an appeal to my hon. Friend? The point that I raised has nothing to do with the question of linseed oil and it is unfair when a question has been raised on the Adjournment that the Minister should not be given time to reply.

Sir F. SANDERSON: I was under the impression that my hon. Friend's point was in regard to delay both by the Treasury and by the Advisory Committee in coming to a decision in regard to import duties. If I am wrong, I will give way.

11.20 p.m.

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE (Secretary, Overseas Trade Department): I am glad the hon. Baronet the Member for Barnstaple (Sir B. Peto) has raised this question, because it gives me an apportunity of dealing with a point of importance, which refers not only to fabric gloves, but to the general position of industry in this country, in relation to reports from the Import Duties Advisory Committee and commercial negotiations. The word "hypothetical" has been used to-night, but I can assure hon. Members that there is no question of jeopardising industries in this country in order to obtain hypothetical benefits. It is recognised that we are in this country, and have been for many years, the greatest individual market in the world for foreign goods, and that we are entitled to use our bargaining power, and the argument it has given us, in our discussions with other nations; in other words, that the British tariff is not only for the purpose of giving stability and strength to our industries internally, but that we should be neglecting our duty if we did not make use of it also, as far as we can, in order to obtain better opportunities for the United Kingdom export trade.

The position is that the Import Duties Advisory Committee make reports based upon their views as to the need of industries in this country for Protection, in order to enable them to compete in the home market. That is the function of the Advisory Committee, which they carry out independently, as hon. Members know, and they make their report. It is not their function to consider the repercussions which their recommendations may have on negotiations which may be in progress, or immediately pending, with foreign countries, but His Majesty's Government must clearly retain the right to take into account these wider questions when they decide whether or not to publish or to put into force the recommendations of the Advisory Committee. Let me explain the reason for that. Publication of a negative report, a report saying there was to be a decrease of duty, at a particular juncture might very well weaken our hands in negotiation, while equally action on a positive report, to increase a duty, at a particular juncture might have an effect on urrent negotiations which would damage British trade generally out of all proportion to the value of the duty to the particular trade concerned. That is a consideration which His Majesty's Government must have before them in dealing with the question.

My hon. Friend raised, very properly, he point, Who takes this responsibility, hen the Import Duties Committee have made their report to the Treasury, of that report not being mmediately acted upon? I answer that y saying that the Government take that esponsibility. They must do so, and hey must do it with the knowledge, which only they have, of the reactions which this would have on trade as a whole. Therefore, we do not in any way eek to shirk the responsibility of delay- g, in a particular case, the action commended by the Committee, or of elaying publication of their report. I as asked the specific question, which I ink I can answer, in relation to fabric oves, When did the Treasury receive e report from the Advisory Committee? find that in that case the report was ceived on 26th January. It was blished in the Press later after con- deration by the Government, and there s a delay.

Mr. HALES: Can the hon. and gallant ntleman say anything about pottery?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: I cannot swer that without notice. In the case fabric gloves I ascertained the position cause it was on that particular matter at the hon. Baronet gave notice. It is vious it is not possible to debate in House the reasons which may have en in the minds of the Government in ing a decision on any particular kind goods, for these reasons. Hon. Mem- s who have been engaged in any negotiations of any kind will realise that to disclose information might very well be an embarrassment to them, and, of course, anything that I shall say to-night would have very wide publicity. Therefore I will ask my hon. Friend not to press his point as to the particular countries to which this has relation. The trades which he and the hon. Member for Hanley (Mr. Hales) have raised are very closely before the Government. In determining what action they will take, they are having full regard to the variations in duty in those trades. My hon. Friend the Member for Barnstaple has outlined, in the case of fabric gloves, the ups and downs of the movements in regard to duties over a long period of years, but we are well aware of that, and we have fully in mind the desire of the fabric glove industry to know what future is in front of them. I can assure the hon. Baronet that we have that fully in mind. I would also add that I hope that an early decision will be possible on this matter.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hanley also raised the question, in relation to pottery, of the variation of duty. I would make it plain that the abnormal import duties which were applied at the rate of 50 per cent. were for a specific purpose. They were applied to prevent forestalling while the tariff was being more carefully developed. Therefore, it was made plain at the time that it was not intended that it should be a continuing rate of duty, and the machinery which was set up in the form of the Import Duties Advisory Committee was for the purpose—and I think hon. Members will agree that it was wisely set up—of having an independent committee to examine all the aspects of the questions put in front of them. At this stage I can say no more except to assure the House of two things. One is that there will be no question of jeopardising British industries for the sake of hypothetical advantages. We shall make certain in any negotiations in which we are engaged that there must be real and definite advantages before any concessions can be given. But we shall also have in mind the value of the industries spoken of to-night from the point of view of employment. Lastly, I would like to say that from the time the Import Duties Advisory Committee makes its report His Majesty's Government assumes full responsibility for action in regard to that report, both as to publication or the Order which is made as regards increase of duties.

Sir B. PETO: May I know whether these negotiations relate to industries which have any connection with the fabric glove industry or are totally different industries?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: I have answered that in a phrase which quite purposely was a little vague and that was "the repercussions of the result of action on the recommendation." I ask my hon. Friend not to press me beyond that point. There are negotiations going on over a fairly wide range of goods, and the repercussions spoken of may not be taken to mean that a particular industry is being negotiated with, but it may be that the country with which we are dealing has a special interest in a trade, and that repercussions would have an effect. I hope my hon. Friend will not press me further.

Question put, and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Twenty-nine Minutes after Eleven o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 2nd March, 1933.

The House met at a Quarter before Three of the Clock, MR. SPEAKER in the Chair.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Private Bills (Standing Orders not previously inquired into complied with),

Mr. SPEAKER laid upon the Table Report from one of the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, That in the case of the following Bill, referred on the Second Reading thereof, the Standing Orders not previously inquired into, which are applicable thereto, have been complied with, namely:

London Midland and Scottish Railway Bill.

Bill committed.

Ministry of Health Provisional Order (Chester and Lancaster) Bill, Ministry of Health Provisional Order (Eton Joint Hospital District) Bill,

As amended, considered; to be read the Third time To-morrow.

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE COMMISSIONERS.

1. Captain CROOKSHANK asked the Minister of Labour what payments have een made from national funds towards he salaries, allowances and expenses of he various commissioners who have relaced public assistance committees; and nder what statutory authority such ayments have been made?

The MINISTER of LABOUR (Sir Henry Betterton): The payments made ut of moneys provided by Parliament p to 31st January, 1933, in respect of he remuneration and expenses of the ommissioners who have been appointed o replace public assistance committees or the purpose of determining the needs f applicants for transitional payments amounted to approximately £10,000. This sum includes the cost of the investigating staff and other staff employed by the Commissioners. The payments are made under the authority of Article 7 of the Unemployment Insurance (National Economy) (No. 2) Order, 1931.

Captain CROOKSHANK: Is my right hon. Friend satisfied that that authority is good in law, because the Orders in Council had to be passed within a month in order to deal with existing, not future, circumstances?

Sir H. BETTERTON: Yes, I have satisfied myself that I was acting within my legal rights.

36. Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Labour the name of the Commissioner appointed to administer transitional payments in Rotherham, and the amount of his salary?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The Commissioner for Transitional Payments is Mr. A. W. Basham, O.B.E. With regard to the second part of the question, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Plaistow (Mr. Thorne) on the 25th October, 1932.

Mr. McGOVERN: Has there been any reduction in the figures of unemployed in the horticultural industry in the last 24 hours?

DEWSBURY, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE, AND GATESHEAD.

4, 5 and 6. Mr. LAWSON asked the Minister of Labour (1) the number of unemployed on the register for Dewsbury on 25th January, 1932, and 25th January, 1933;

(2) the number of unemployed on the register for Newcastle for 25th January, 1932, and 25th January, 1933, respectively;

(3) the number of unemployed on the register for Gateshead on 25th January, 1932, and 25th January, 1933?

Sir H. BETTERTON: As the reply includes a table of figures, I will, if I may, circulate a statement in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Mr. LAWSON: Why is the right hon. Gentleman taking that course, when he can give details to other Members of the House?

Sir H. BETTERTON: Because the hon. Member asks substantially the same question for the three different cases, but I will certainly give the information at once. The places he asks about are Dewsbury, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and Gateshead. In Dewsbury, on 25th January, 1932, there were 4,269 on the registers, and on the 23rd January, 1933, there were 5,359; in Newcastle-on-Tyne on the 25th January, 1932, there were 33,257, and on the 23rd January, 1933, 35,322; and in Gateshead on the 25th January, 1932, there were 13,698, and on the 23rd January, 1933, 14,378.

Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS: Will my right hon. Friend say whether these figures are contained in the monthly index which his Department prepares, and whether a copy of that index is now in the Library, and in these circumstances whether it is necessary for these questions to be put on the Order Paper?

Mr. LAWSON: Is it not a fact that the same observation applies to all the questions asked previously?

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Is it not the case that in the last Government Members opposite asked about 25 questions periodically of the Ministry of Labour?

Mr. KIRKWOOD: With regard to the reply concerning Newcastle, Gateshead, and Dewsbury, how do those figures compare with the figures for the West of Scotland?

Woollen and Worsted Textile Industry.

9. Mr. HOLDSWORTH asked the Minister of Labour the total number of persons employed in the woollen and worsted textile industry on the following dates: 1st July, 1914, 1st July, 1931, 1st July, 1932, and the latest date for which figures are available?

Sir H. BETTERTON: As the reply includes a table of figures, I will, if I may, circulate a statement in the Official Report.

Following is the statement:

Comparable Statistics of the numbers of insured persons in the various industries are not available for any year prior to 1923. The following table gives figures in respect of the woollen and worsted industry in Great Britain for the end of June in the years 1923, 1931 and 1932, the last-mentioned being the latest date for which they are available.

	Aged 16 years and over.	Aged 16 and under 65.

Exchange Procedure.

10. Mr. SMEDLEY CROOKE asked the Minister of Labour if he will take steps in the new Bill to alter the regulations governing the green card and remove the existing handicap to the unemployed man who takes the trouble to find work for himself and reports it to the Employment Exchange, who then may give the work to someone else?

Sir H. BETTERTON: This matter was raised by several Members last Session, and in consequence a Memorandum was issued explaining the procedure. I believe this procedure is satisfactory, but I should like my hon. Friend to look at the Memorandum, of which I am sending him a copy. He will see from it that a man who finds a job for himself does not require a "green card" except for certain relief works to which special conditions apply, and that such difficulties as have arisen have been usually due to foremen promising jobs on relief work to men who were not eligible.

Mr. CROOKE: Is it not the case that a man seeks and gets a job and is told to obtain a green card from the Employment Exchange, and, when he gets there they say: "This job is going, but we must give it to someone else, not to you"?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I do not think that accurately represents the present situation, but in any case this Memorandum, which I drew up largely in consequence of the facts which are mentioned in the question, meets the point the hon. Member has in mind.

Mr. CROOKE: If it does not meet the point, will my right hon. Friend receive a deputation of Members of this House regarding this matter?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I am always ready to receive deputations of Members of the House.

Mr. GRAHAM WHITE: Is it not the case that the difficulty arises largely owing to the fact that many foremen adopt the procedure of telling men to go away and get green cards in order to get rid of them?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The hon. Gentleman has just stated what is the real difficulty in the matter. I think that is quite true.

TRANSITIONAL PAYMENTS.

14. Mr. SMEDLEY CROOKE asked the Minister of Labour how many cases of transitional payments have been dealt with by the public assistance committee in the city of Birmingham since 1st December, 1932; in how many cases have full benefits been allowed; in how many cases partial benefit; and how many applicants have failed to sustain any claim?

Sir H. BETTERTON: As the reply includes a table of figures I will, if I may, circulate a statement in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following is the statement:

Determinations by the Public Assistance Committee for the county borough of Birmingham on applications for transitional payments between 5th December, 1932, and 4th February, 1933.

—	Initial applications.	Renewals and Revisions.	Total.
Payment allowed at maximum benefit rates ...	1,285	9 753	11,038
Payment allowed at lower rates	1,371	11,553	12,924
Needs of applicants held not to justify payment.	1,214	1,204	2,418
Total number of applications	3,870	22,510	26,380

23. Mr. PARKINSON asked the Minister f Labour how many cases of transitional ayments have been dealt with by the ublic assistance committee in the Wigan mployment area since January, 1932, up o the latest available date; in how any cases have full benefits been llowed; in how many cases partial benefits; and how many cases have been refused any benefits?

Sir H. BETTERTON: As the reply includes a table of figures I will, if I may, circulate a statement in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following is the statement:

eterminations by the Public Assistance Committee for the County Borough of Wigan on applications for Transitional Payments between 25th January, 1932, and 4th February, 1933.

—	Initial Applications.	Renewals and Revisions.	Total.
ayment allowed at maximum benefit rates ...	2,352	23,483	25,835
ayment allowed at lower rates	1,056	10,102	11,158
eeds of applicants held not to justify payment	525	430	955
Total number of applications	3,933	34,015	37,948

24. Dr. JOHN WILLIAMS asked the inister of Labour the number of claims r transitional benefit in the Wales division, and the number of determinations granting full benefit, reduced benefit and no benefit, respectively?

Sir H. BETTERTON: As the reply includes a table of figures I will, if I may, circulate a statement in the Official Report.

Following is the statement:

The total number of applications for transitional payments dealt with by Public Assistance Authorities in the Wales Division between 12th November, 1931, and 7th January, 1933, was 1,139,404, of which 212,908 were initial applications. The determinations given on these applications were as follows:

Period.	Allowed at maximum benefit rates.	Allowed at lower rates.	Needs of applicants held not to justify payment.	Totals.
12th November, 1931 to 23rd January, 1932.*	148,867	29,509	7,551	185,927

Renewals and revisions ...	708,351	135,038	8,158	851,547

* The figures for this period include renewals and revisions as well as initial applications. Separate figures for initial applications are not available.

25. Dr. J. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Labour the number of claimants for transitional benefit in Carmarthenshire from November, 1931, to the latest available date; and the number of men who have been awarded full benefits, reduced benefits and no benefits, respectively?

Sir H. BETTERTON: As the reply includes a table of figures I will, if I may, circulate a statement in the Official Report.

Following is the statement:

The total number of applications for transitional payments dealt with by the Carmarthenshire Public Assistance Authority between 12th November, 1931, and 7th January, 1933, was 46,231, of which 9,997 were initial applications. The determinations by that Committee on the applications made by men during the period were as follows:

—	Allowed at maximum benefit rates.	Allowed at lower rates.	Needs of applicants held not to justify payment.	Total.
12th November, 1931* to 23rd January, 1932.	5,477	1,362	696	7,535
25th January, 1932 to 7th January, 1933:
Initial applications... ...	4,568	297	208	5,073
Renewals and revisions ...	28,481	3,210	677	32,368

* The figures for this period include renewals and revisions as well as initial applications. Separate figures for initial applications are not available.

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: On a point of Order. As there are about 15 questions on the Order Paper the answers to which have been in the Library for several weeks, is it in order that these questions should be put?

Mr. LAWSON: May I draw your attention to the fact that questions have been constantly put on the Paper by Members behind the Government concerning areas which suited them and that they have been answered in their favour. On investigation, it will probably be found that the hon. Member for South Croydon (Mr. H. Williams) is the instigator of those questions.

37. Mr. BATEY asked the Minister of Labour whether he will advise the commissioners appointed to administer transitional payment that an aggrieved applicant should be granted a personal interview if he so desires; and whether he will take legislative steps to provide a right of appeal from the commissioners?

Sir H. BETTERTON: With regard to the first part of the question, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him on the 23rd February. With regard to the second part, I have noted the hon. Member's suggestion.

Mr. BATEY: Are we to understand that the Minister will not even advise the commissioners to see an applicant if he wants to see them?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The hon. Member must not understand anything of the kind. I made it quite clear, in answer to a question which the hon. Member asked me the other day, that anybody who is aggrieved can see the local officer, and, if he is not satisfied, he can see the commissioner.

Mr. GODFREY NICHOLSON: Is the right hon. Gentleman clear that all applicants realise that they have these rights?

Sir H. BETTERTON: It is not my fault if they do not, and I hope that the fullest publicity will be given to this answer.

BRADFORD.

15. Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Labour how many persons were registered as unemployed at Bradford on 20th January, 1932, and 23rd January, 1933; and the number of unemployed who no longer sign on at the Exchange?

Sir H. BETTERTON: At 25th January, 1932, the number of unemployed persons on the register of the Bradford Employment Exchange was 20,395, as compared with 22,484 at 23rd January, 1933. I have no information as to the number of unemployed persons not registered.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the textile industry is not working overtime at Bradford, as has been suggested?

ESTIMATES.

16. Mr. LEVY asked the Minister of Labour what is the estimate of unemployment on which is based the estimate of the cost of his Department for 1933-34?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The provision asked for will be sufficient for the volume of unemployment equivalent roughly to that experienced last year. That is not to be regarded as an estimate of future unemployment—which, in fact, I hope will be lower—but merely as the provision which in the unavoidable uncertainty of the present outlook it is prudent to make.

Mr. LEVY: Can my right hon. Friend say on what change in the unemployment insurance system his estimate of cost was based?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I am not sure that I understand the supplementary question. The question on the Paper asked what is the estimate of unemployment on which is based the estimated cost of my Department for 1933-4, and I have told my hon. Friend that it is based on a volume of unemployment equivalent, roughly, to that experienced last year.

Mr. LEVY: Is the anticipated change going to take place during this present year, and is my right hon. Friend taking that into consideration when answering this question?

Mr. LAWSON: Can the right hon. Gentleman give a guarantee that the answer is not based upon a new system which is going to cut down the number of recipients of benefit?

IRISH WORKERS, ROMFORD.

17. Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Minister of Labour whether he is aware that Free State Irishmen not permanently resident in this country have been found employment at Employment Exchanges in the Romford area since the beginning of this year; and whether he will take steps to stop Exchanges finding work for such men in preference to British applicants on account of the low wages they will accept?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The men who have found employment through this Exchange include a small number of Irishmen who, I understand, were already resident in the area. There is not, so far as I am aware, any ground for suggesting that the rate of wages had anything to do with their engagement.

BARNSLEY.

18. Mr. PRICE asked the Minister of Labour how many persons were registered as unemployed at Barnsley on 20th January, 1932, and 23rd January, 1933; and the number of unemployed who no longer sign on at the Exchange?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The number of unemployed persons on the registers of the Barnsley Employment Exchange and Juvenile Employment Bureau was 8,629 at 25th January, 1932, and 9,544 at 23rd January, 1933. I have no information as to the number of unemployed persons not registered at Employment Exchanges.

CHESTER-LE-STREET.

19. Mr. DENVILLE asked the Minister of Labour the number of unemployed on the register of Chester-le-Street on 25th January, 1932, and 25th January, 1933?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The number of unemployed persons on the registers of the Chester-le-Street Employment Exchange and Juvenile Employment Bureau was 2,517 at 25th January, 1932, and 3,471 at 23rd January, 1933.

WOOLWICH.

20. Mr. HICKS asked the Minister of Labour the numbers of men, women, boys, and girls registered as unemployed at the Woolwich Employment Exchange on the latest convenient date in 1933 and for the same period in 1932, giving separate figures for the various trades or occupations?

Sir H. BETTERTON: As the reply includes tables of figures, I will, if I may, circulate a statement in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following is the statement:

BRIXTON.

21. Mr. HICKS asked the Minister of Labour the numbers of men, women, boys, and girls registered as unemployed at the Brixton Employment Exchange on the latest convenient date in 1933 and for the same period in 1932, giving separate figures for the various trades or occupations?

Sir H. BETTERTON: As the reply includes tables of figures I will, if I may, circulate a statement in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following is the statement:

Unemployed Persons (Insured and Uninsured) on the Registers of the Brixton Employment Exchange.

WIGAN.

22. Mr. PARKINSON asked the Minister of Labour the number of unmployed persons on the register of the Wigan Employment Exchange in anuary, 1932 and in January, 1933?

Sir H. BETTERTON: At 25th anuary, 1932, there were 12,862 unemoyed persons on the registers of the igan Employment Exchange and the cal juvenile employment bureaux. At rd January, 1933, the number was ,369.

WALES.

26. Dr. J. WILLIAMS asked the inister of Labour the number of men nemployed in the iron and steel instry, the tinplate industry, the enginring trades, and the coal-mining instry for South Wales at the latest ailable date, with the percentage of e unemployed to those in employment?

31. Mr. DAVID GRENFELL asked the Minister of Labour the figures of unemployment in the South Wales mining industry in January, 1933, and the same month in each of the preceding five years?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I am having the information desired extracted and will circulate statements in the OFFICIAL REPORT as soon as the figures are available.

28. Mr. COVE asked the Minister of Labour the number of persons wholly unemployed in the Welsh division on 20th January, 1932, and 20th January, 1933, respectively, and also the numbers partially unemployed on the same dates?

Sir H. BETTERTON: At 25th January, 1932, the number of wholly unemployed persons on the registers of Employment Exchanges in the Wales Division was 162,790, and the number temporarily stopped was 52,841. At 25th January, 1933, the corresponding figures were 188,613 and 46,730, respectively.

[Sir H. Betterton.]

29. Mr. COVE asked the Minister of Labour the number of women registered as unemployed in the County of Glamorgan and the various industries to which they were atached when employed?

Sir H. BETTERTON: As the reply includes a table of figures, I will, if I may, circulate a statement in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Following is the statement:

At 23rd January, 1933, there were 7,001 unemployed women, insured and uninsured, on the registers of Employment Exchanges in Glamorganshire. The following table shows the number of insured women recorded as unemployed in the principal industry classifications at those Exchanges:

Industry.	Number.
Distributive Trades	2,390
Hotel, Boarding House, etc., service	1,755
Tinplate manufacture	581
Tailoring	459

JUVENILES (PORT TALBOT).

27. Mr. COVE asked the Minister of Labour the number of juveniles registered as unemployed in the Port Talbot area for January, 1933, between the ages of 16 and 18, and the numbers between the ages of 14 and 16?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The available figures for unemployment among juveniles relate only to the numbers of insured juveniles aged 16 and under 18 and the number of uninsured juveniles aged 14 and under 18. At 23rd January, 1933, the unemployed persons on the register of the Port Talbot Employment Exchange included 94 insured juveniles aged 16 and under 18 and 237 uninsured juveniles aged 14 and under 18.

EX-SERVICE MEN.

33. Mr. DAVID ADAMS asked the Minister of Labour, having regard to the large number of old soldiers now in the ranks of the unemployed, if he will arrange for particulars of the special campaign pension to be posted in all employment exchanges?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I am having inquiries made into the practicability of giving publicity to this matter through the employment exchanges and will communicate with the hon. Member in due course.

35. Mr. TINKER asked the Minister of Labour whether he is prepared to introduce an amending Bill to provide that, as in the case of disability pensions, 50 per cent. of the allowances in respect of wife and children shall be disregarded in assessing the needs of applicants for transitional payment?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I am not prepared to anticipate forthcoming general legislations, but I would point out that the considerations underlying the special treatment of personal disability pensions are entirely different from those which arise upon grants for dependants.

STATISTICS.

34. Mr. TINKER asked the Minister of Labour the number of wholly unemployed and partially unemployed persons in January, 1932, and in January, 1933, respectively?

Sir H. BETTERTON: At 25th January, 1932, the number of wholly unemployed persons (including casuals) on the registers of Employment Exchanges in Great Britain was 2,232,003, and the number temporarily stopped was 496,408. The corresponding figures at 23rd January, 1933, were 2,378,836 and 524,229, respectively.

GOVERNMENT POLICY.

46. Mr. BATEY asked the Prime Minister if he will lay before this House a White Paper giving full details of the schemes for the alleviation of unemployment which the Government have now under consideration?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Ramsay MacDonald): I have already explained the policy of the Government in regard to the provision of employment. As regards the alleviation of the condition of the unemployed, I would ask the hon. Member to await the statement which will be made by the Minister of Labour in the course of the Debate this afternoon.

Mr. BATEY: Are we to understand from that reply that the Minister of Labour is going to tell us what schemes the Government are considering?

The PRIME MINISTER: I would ask my hon. Friend to wait and see.

Mr. BATEY: May I not invite the Prime Minister to tell us what schemes the Government are considering for the purpose of alleviating unemployment?

The PRIME MINISTER: Yes, that will be most appropriate to the discussion which we are to have to-day.

Mr. KIRKWOOD: Arising from the original reply, is the right hon. Gentleman not in a position to tell the House whether the Minister of Labour has anything definite to tell us regarding the schemes the Government have to alleviate unemployment?

The PRIME MINISTER: That question has been answered in the reply I have already given.

ROAD AND SEWAGE WORKS.

59. Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Minister of Health whether, in view of the number of private estates which have been recently developed without proper roads or sewerage systems, he will suggest to local authorities the desirability of improving such property by compelling those responsible to carry out the necessary works, and so to provide employment for local workers?

The MINISTER of HEALTH (Sir Hilton Young): A general undertaking to suggest to local authorities that they should force expense of this kind on private owners would not be justified. Each case must be considered on merits.

65. Mr. LIDDALL asked the Minister of Health whether, in order to provide work for the unemployed, he will consider taking steps for the provision of adequate sewerage schemes in the large number of small towns and villages which at present are without this service?

Sir H. YOUNG: The duty of carrying out desirable sewerage schemes rests with the district council concerned. I am always ready to entertain applications for sanction to loans for schemes of sewerage which are needed on grounds of public health, and my staff are constantly advising local authorities on schemes.

WATER SCHEMES.

64. Mr. LIDDALL asked the Minister of Health whether, in order to provide work for the unemployed, he will consider comprehensive plans for the supply of pure drinking water to every town, village and hamlet in the United Kingdom, including the linking up of existing supplies by the creation of a water grid?

Sir H. YOUNG: I am always ready to entertain applications for sanction to loans for schemes of water supply which are remunerative or needed on public health grounds. As at present advised, I am not of opinion that the creation of a water grid as suggested, even if feasible on engineering grounds, would be economical. The most practical procedure is the formation of advisory regional water committees, systematically to survey needs and resources, and to formulate programmes for meeting the needs in the most effective and economical way.

Mr. LEVY: Can I ask the right hon. Gentleman if I am to understand from the first part of the question that there is no intention of seeing that these localities are provided with proper water supply, unless and until the supply is absolutely going wrong?

Sir H. YOUNG: No, Sir. If the hon. Member will consider my answer, he will see that I refer to the fact that schemes for water supply should be either remunerative or needed on public health grounds.

WOMEN (NIGHT WORK).

2. Captain PETER MACDONALD asked the Minister of Labour what is the present position with regard to the night-work convention drafted by the International Labour Office?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The convention concerning the employment of women during the night was ratified by us in 1921. As to the position arising as a result of a recent opinion of The Hague Court regarding the meaning of an article in the convention, I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton East (Mr. Mander) on 9th February.

Captain MACDONALD: Can my right hon. Friend say what other Governments have ratified the convention?

Sir H. BETTERTON: No, not without notice.

HOURS OF WORK.

3. Captain P. MACDONALD asked the Minister of Labour how many nations have now ratified the hours-of-work convention put forward by the International Labour Office?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The Washington Convention on hours of work in industrial undertakings has been ratified by 11 countries; four other countries have undertaken to ratify when others do so. I am circulating in the OFFICIAL REPORT a list of these countries.

Following is the list:

Washington Hours Convention Ratified by:

Belgium.
Bulgaria.
Chile.
Czeckoslovakia.
Greece.
*India.
Lithuania.
Luxemburg.
Portugal.
Rumania.
Spain.

Ratification with Conditional or Delayed Application:

Austria.
France.
Italy.
Latvia.

* Sixty hours not 48, applicable only to certain categories of workers.

7. Mr. MANDER asked the Minister of Labour if he will consider addressing a request to the employers' organisation of each industry and to the joint industrial councils and similar bodies where they exist, asking them to conduct a scientific investigation into the cost and practicability of instituting a 40-hour week?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I would refer the hon. Member to the replies given to the hon. Member for Aberdare (Mr. G. Hall) on 16th February and to the hon. Member for Plaistow (Mr. Thorne) on 20th February, from which he will see that I propose to discuss with the Trades Union Congress Council and the National Confederation of Employers' Organisations the most appropriate methods by which this and kindred subjects may be examined in a practical manner.

Mr. MANDER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that some important industries do not belong to the Confederation, and will he consider in those cases at any rate, making a direct approach to them?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I will consider that.

Mr. THORNE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the hon. Member who put that question is operating a 40-hour week with every success?

Sir H. BETTERTON: That is another question. Every kind of operation of the 40 hours must be examined. I am well aware of what is in operation in the works to which the hon. Member refers.

POLICE ORGANISATION.

38. Sir CHARLES CAYZER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the comments of Major-General Sir Llewellyn Atcherley, His Majesty's Inspector of Constabulary, with regard to the need for improved staff organisation in the detection of crime; whether this officer has already on a previous occasion emphasised this need; and whether the authorities propose to take any action to give effect to his views?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir John Gilmour): Measures for improving police organisation in regard to the detection of crime, to which General Atcherley has referred in his recent annual reports, are constantly under review. A difficulty, as he points out, arises from the large number of separate police forces, but steps are taken as opportunity offers to secure greater co-ordination between them and I hope that still further progress can be made at no distant date.

BIRDS AND ANIMALS (CRUELTY).

39. Mr. THOMAS COOK asked the Home Secretary the number of convictions against persons found guilty of cruelty to wild birds in cages during the year 1932?

Sir J. GILMOUR: I regret that the information asked for by the hon. Member is not available. The figures in question are not shown separately in the criminal statistics or in the returns from which the published statistics are compiled.

40. Mr. COOK asked the Home Secretary the total number of convictions against persons found guilty of cruelty to animals during the years 1930, 1931, and 1932, respectively?

Sir J. GILMOUR: The number of persons convicted of offences falling under the head of cruelty to animals in the criminal statistics was 2,443 in 1930 and 2,152 in 1931. Figures for 1932 are not yet completely available.

TRANSPORT.

TAXIMETER-CABS (LONDON).

41 and 42. Captain Sir WILLIAM BRASS asked the Home Secretary (1) the number of taximeter-cabs, licensed by the Metropolitan Police to ply for hire n London, of over 20 years old;

(2) the number of taximeter-cabs icensed by the Metropolitan police to ply for hire in London over 10 years and ander 20 years old?

Sir J. GILMOUR: I am informed by he Commissioner of Police that out of ,044 motor cabs licensed by the Metropolitan Police, 211 are over 20 years old nd 1,794 are between 10 and 20 years ld.

Sir W. BRASS: Is my right hon. Friend ware that these old vehicles are sold at cheap price and relicensed, and then reate congestion in the streets of ondon?

Sir J. GILMOUR: That may be the ase to some extent, but no doubt expensive repairs are carried out in order hat the cabs may get the licence.

Sir W. BRASS: Does not the right on. Gentleman think that it is about me to get rid of the ten and twentyear-old vehicles?

Mr. HOLFORD KNIGHT: Is the right on. Gentleman aware of the very hard mes that many of these poor taximen ave gone through in the last 10 years, that they have been unable to renew eir cabs?

49. Rear-Admiral SUETER asked the ome Secretary if he will direct the etropolitan licensing authorities to range that in future all new taximeterbs to ply for hire within the Metrolitan district shall be fitted with some rm of illumination so that the hiring gs may be easily distinguished after rk by would-be hirers?

Sir J. GILMOUR: The Commissioner of Police informs me that the regulations in regard to taximeters on cabs are now being revised and that he intends to include a requirement to ensure that the flags on all new taximeters shall be adequately illuminated.

LONG-DISTANCE MOTOR SERVICES.

89. Sir W. BRASS asked the Minister of Transport whether he can state the average number of long-distance motor coaches which enter (and leave) the Metropolis from a distance exceeding 30 miles daily?

The MINISTER of TRANSPORT (Mr. Stanley): I regret that the desired information is not available.

Sir W. BRASS: Surely my hon. Friend is able to get the information from the commissioners under the Transport Act?

Mr. STANLEY: No, not without the greatest amount of trouble and expense, and even then it will only show the vehicles licensed for this purpose and not the vehicles actually running.

Sir W. BRASS: Are we to understand that there is no information available at the Ministry to tell us how many long-distance omnibuses come into London daily?

Mr. STANLEY: That is the effect of my answer.

TRAFFIC COMMISSIONERS (EXPENDITURE).

91. Lord SCONE asked the Minister of Transport if he will state for each of the years 1931 and 1932 the total expenditure, including salaries, incurred by the traffic commissioners for the Scotland (Northern) and Scotland (Southern) areas, respectively?

Mr. STANLEY: The total identifiable expenditure, including salaries, incurred in the financial year 1931-32 in respect of the traffic commissioners' organisation for the Scotland (Northern) area was £11,169 and for the Scotland (Southern) area £12,550. The estimated expenditure for the financial year 1932-33 is:

Northern area	£9,400
Southern area	£11,600

ARMISTICE DAY (POPPY SALES, HULL AND BARNSLEY).

44. Mr. GLOSSOP asked the Home Secretary if he is aware that the city of

[Mr. Glossop.]
Hull and the town of Barnsley have banned poppy day for this year; and whether he will introduce legislation giving a statutory right to those citizens who desire to pay homage to the fallen to purchase and wear a poppy on Armistice Day?

Sir J. GILMOUR: The question what collections shall be allowed in any street or public place is a matter for the local police authority, and I have no power to interfere with any decisions which may have been taken by the Watch Committees in question. The regulations which police authorities are empowered to make only apply to collections in any street or public place and would not prevent the sale of poppies by other methods than street sales.

Mr. GLOSSOP: Am I to understand from the answer that the right hon. Gentleman is not going to use his influence to try and have removed this slur which has been cast on the men of these towns who gave their lives to the country?

Mr. SMEDLEY CROOKE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the 11th November is not an ordinary flag day, but that it is a national observance, when poppies are worn as an act of homage to the dead; and will he use his influence with the local authorities to revoke their decision?

Sir J. GILMOUR: I have no direct authority, but I hope that the ventilation of this question in the House may lead to some reconsideration of the matter.

Mr. EVERARD: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman invoke the aid of the hon. Members for Hull and Barnsley and ask them to exercise their influence on the local council and to point out to them that over £8,000 was spent in Hull in the last four years, and that that is more than the amount collected in Hull?

AGRICULTURE.

MILCH CATTLE DISEASES.

45. Sir GIFFORD FOX asked the Prime Minister by what approximate date the committee which is examining the question of disease among milch cattle will issue its report?

The PRIME MINISTER: The committee are still engaged in taking oral evidence, and in view of the large number of difficult questions embraced in their terms of reference and the important interests likely to be affected by their recommendations, I do not anticipate that they will be in a position to submit their report for some time.

POULTRY DISEASE.

76. Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE asked the Minister of Agriculture what steps he has taken to bring to the notice of poultry breeders the use of accredited testing stations, with a view of preventing bacillary white diarrhoea?

The MINISTER of AGRICULTURE (Major Elliot): The Ministry issued last summer a notice to the Press drawing the attention of poultry keepers to the value of the agglutination test as a precaution against bacillary white diarrhoea among their flocks; and I am satisfied that poultry keepers generally are well aware of the usefulness of the test. Advice as to suitable laboratories can be obtained from any county agricultural organiser or poultry instructor.

Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE: Will my right hon. and gallant Friend bear in mind the fact that certain poultry keepers are not satisfied with the guarantees that have been given by various firms in accordance with this test? Could he give any information on that point?

Major ELLIOT: No, Sir.

77. Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE asked the Minister of Agriculture if he can give any figures showing the prevalence of bacillary white diarrhoea in poultry in Great Britain and Northern Ireland?

Major ELLIOT: Bacillary white diarrhoea in poultry is not a notifiable disease in Great Britain or Northern Ireland, and no figures are available as to its incidence.

BROADCAST PRICES (LINCOLNSHIRE).

78. Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE asked the Minister of Agriculture how many times agricultural prices from Lincolnshire towns have been broadcast in the last month, and what those towns were?

Major ELLIOT: The prices of livestock and other agricultural produce are not broadcast in respect of any Lincolnshire market.

Lieut.-Colonel HENEAGE: In view of the fact that Lincolnshire is the second largest county in England, will my right hon. and gallant Friend take into consideration the fact that the local farmers' prices are not broadcast?

Major ELLIOT: I shall be very glad to consider any suggestion that my hon. and gallant Friend may care to put before me.

Mr. GLOSSOP: Seeing that the prices broadcast by the British Broadcasting Corporation are very misleading, is not Lincolnshire in fact very lucky that its farmers' prices in their markets are not broadcast?

CHEESE (IMPORTS).

79. Sir C. CAYZER asked the Minister of Agriculture whether, as a result of his recent conference with the representative deputation of cheese producers, he has now been able to formulate a scheme for dealing with the present importation of cheeses from the Dominions at an abnormally low price on the same lines as the voluntary meat importation restriction scheme?

Major ELLIOT: The dairy produce situation as a whole is at present engaging the attention of the Government, and I am not in a position to make any statement on the subject.

Sir C. CAYZER: Is the Minister aware hat New Zealand cheese is now being sold across the counter at 5½d. per pound, and that, in consequence, the Cheshire heese industry has been brought to the erge of complete collapse; and will he ot immediately confer with the reprentatives of the Dominions and see if t is not possible to put in operation a striction scheme on voluntary lines for heese imports, on the same lines as the eat restriction scheme?

Major ELLIOT: That consideration is t present engaging the attention of the overnment.

Sir PERCY HARRIS: Is the Minister ware that these low prices are much preciated by the wives of unemployed en in the East End of London?

IMPORTED EGGS.

80. Captain DOWER asked the Minisr of Agriculture whether he will conder the advisability of taking steps to ensure that chilled or cold-stored eggs, imported from Australia and South Africa, are sold as Empire chilled eggs and not Empire fresh eggs?

Major ELLIOT: Eggs imported from Australia and South Africa are marked with the name of the country of origin, which in itself indicates that they have been chilled or otherwise preserved.

Captain DOWER: Will the Minister consider the fact that eggs imported from Australia are chilled for eight weeks, and are sold as fresh or new-laid, in spite of their having the name of the country of origin on them, while British eggs which have been chilled for one week must be marked as chilled; and does he not think that that is rather a deceptive marking?

Major ELLIOT: I cannot conceive that anyone could eat an egg eight weeks old without being aware of it.

CONVICTIONS (LOITERING WITH INTENT).

47. Mr. LOVAT-FRASER asked the Home Secretary how many persons under 21 years of age have been bound over, placed on probation, or sent to prison for loitering with intent to commit a felony during 1931; and how many of these were first offenders?

Sir J. GILMOUR: I regret that the only figure I can give is the number of persons under 21 who were charged with frequenting and were placed on probation with supervision: it was 236. Information is not available which would enable me to answer the rest of the question.

48. Mr. LOVAT-FRASER asked the Home Secretary how many of those who were sent to Wormwood Scrubs prison during 1931 were committed for loitering with intent to commit a felony?

Sir J. GILMOUR: The information is not available, and I regret that I should not feel justified in incurring the expenditure which would be necessary to extract it specially from the prison records.

HONOURS (PREVENTION OF ABUSES) ACT.

50. Mr. COCKS asked the Home Secretary whether his attention has been drawn to the recent proceedings against Mr. J. Maundy Gregory for attempting to obtain £10,000 as an inducement for endeavouring to procure the grant of a dignity or title of honour; whether it was drawn also to the statement made by the inspector in charge of the case that a number of similar complaints had been made to the police; whether he can state over what period those complaints extended; and whether any steps will be taken to investigate those complaints in the public interest?

Sir J. GILMOUR: The answer to the first and second parts of the question is in the affirmative. As regards the remainder, the complaints extended over a period of about three years: they have already been investigated by the Police but no sufficient evidence has been obtained to justify criminal proceedings.

Mr. COCKS: Were those complaints from people who had paid money and had not received a title, or were they about people who, having received a title, had not paid the money?

EDUCATION (TEACHERS' PROSECUTION).

51. Captain TODD asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Education whether he is aware that Mrs. K. Duncan, a school teacher under the London County Council, having been sentenced to two months' imprisonment for incitement, was only cautioned by the London County Council Education Committee and is now again teaching in a London school, and also that her husband, Mr. A. E. Duncan, having been fined in the summer for 1932 for taking part in a riot at Deptford, was also only cautioned by the London County Council and is also at present teaching in a grant-aided school; and whether he will take steps to ensure that teachers convicted of offences of this nature are not allowed to teach British children?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the BOARD of EDUCATION (Mr. Ramsbotham): My Noble Friend has made inquiries into the matters raised in my hon. Friend's question, which had not previously been brought to the notice of the Board. From these inquiries the facts appear to be as follow. Mrs. Duncan was charged with being a disturber of the peace and an inciter of others to commit crimes and misdemeanours. She was ordered by the magistrate to find a surety in £50 to keep the peace for six months or go to prison for one month in default. She chose the latter course. She has not, in fact, been employed by the London County Council since September last. Mr. Duncan was fined £5 for obstructing a police officer in the execution of his duty. I understand that in accordance with the usual practice the cases were both the subject of examination by the appropriate sub-committee of the London County Council, and that the two teachers referred to were severely cautioned by the chairman.

The Board's regulations require that if a teacher is convicted of a criminal offence the facts must be at once reported to the Board, and the case, therefore, of Mr. Duncan should have been so reported. I understand that it was through inadvertence that this was not done, and that steps have been taken to ensure strict compliance with the regulations for the future. In Mrs. Duncan's case the court did not proceed to a conviction and there was, therefore, no similar obligation on the London County Council to report the facts. The Board have now been furnished with particulars of the two cases and they are considering what further action can or ought to be taken in regard to them under their regulations.

Captain TODD: Is my hon. Friend aware that in their issue of 4th February, the "Daily Worker" published an article suggesting that they had been able to intimidate the Education Committee of the London County Council, and prevent them taking action against these teachers; and does he not consider that action should be taken to prevent teachers with such very close connection with international atheism and Communism from teaching British children?

Mr. RAMSBOTHAM: In reply to the first part of the supplementary question, I am not aware of the facts stated. In regard to the second part of the question, it would be unwise to say anything to prejudice the position in view of the investigation which is to take place.

Mr. MAXTON: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that both these teachers have very excellent records as members of the teaching profession, and will he resist the suggestion that teachers should be subjected to persecution for holding special political views?

Mr. RAMSBOTHAM: The teaching record of these two persons is, I understand, satisfactory.

HOUSING.

RECONDITIONING.

54. Viscount CRANBORNE asked the Minister of Health when the committee which he is setting up, under the Housing Bill, to consider the question of re-conditioning is expected to report?

Sir H. YOUNG: I hope the committee will find it practicable to submit a report at an early date, but it would be premature for me to attempt to fix one at the present time.

Viscount CRANBORNE: Will the Government regard this as a matter of urgency, in view of the proved fact that reconditioning can be carried out on an economic basis?

Sir H. YOUNG: Certainly, the committee will be asked to undertake the matter as one of urgency.

SLUM CLEARANCE ORDERS.

56. Mr. HARCOURT JOHNSTONE asked the Minister of Health what the average time has been during the last three years between local authorities passing resolutions in favour of clearance orders and the delivery by the Minister to the local authority of the sealed order approved by the Minister?

Sir H. YOUNG: The records of my Department are not kept in a form which enable this question to be precisely answered, but the confirmation of a clearance order would, in the absence of special difficulties, ordinarily occupy a period of between four and six months?

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the case of the last clearance order obtained by the South Shields Council eight months elapsed from the submission of the final plans to the Minister, and a further four months between the inquiry and the arrival of the sealed order at the municipality's offices?

Sir H. YOUNG: No, Sir; I do not think that is an accurate account of the transaction in that particular case.

Mr. JOHNSTONE: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries, as my information is based upon an official letter from the municipality concerned?

Sir H. YOUNG: If the hon. Member has any particular facts which he would like to bring to my attention in connection with this particular application, I will certainly give them my careful consideration.

Sir P. HARRIS: Will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to simplify the procedure?

Sir H. YOUNG: The simplification of machinery and the expedition of procedure is a matter which is always occupying attention.

CENSUS RETURNS (PUBLICATION).

55. Mr. McGOVERN asked the Minister of Health when the completed Returns of the Census taken in 1931 will become available; and what are the reasons for the delay in the publication of the figures?

Sir H. YOUNG: It is expected that publication of the County Report series for the census of England and Wales will be completed in June next. A series of subject and summary volumes will follow, the issue of which should be completed early next year. As regards the latter part of the question, I am not aware of any delay since both the estimated rate of progress and that already realised compare favourably with the experience of previous censuses and, I am advised, of other countries. As regards Scotland, the hon. Member should address an inquiry to the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. McGOVERN: Is not three years undue delay in this matter? Could there not be speeding up in some way?

Sir H. YOUNG: No, Sir; I certainly cannot admit that there is any delay at all. On the contrary, I think the work has been undertaken with great promptitude and efficiency.

[Sir H. Young.]

Mr. MAXTON: Does not the right hon. Gentleman realise that it would be most desirable to have these figures as soon after they are taken as possible, and that there must be any amount of labour available which could have been used to complete the work much more speedily?

Sir H. YOUNG: Undoubtedly these figures should be available as soon as possible and that point is always kept under consideration, but I must remind the hon. Member that the work requires a large amount of extremely skilled labour.

RATING APPEALS.

58. Sir REGINALD BLAKER asked the Minister of Health whether he is aware that by reason of the high costs of appeal from assessment committees, large numbers of smaller assessees are, in practice, without any redress, when aggrieved by a decision of an assessment committee; and what action he proposes to take in the matter?

Sir H. YOUNG: The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. It is not contemplated to alter the statutory provisions on the subject.

Sir R. BLAKER: Does the right hon. Gentleman realise the great hardship imposed upon a large number of smaller people, by reason of the high cost of appeals to Quarter Sessions, and, if not, will be consider any information which I am able to bring to his notice?

Sir H. YOUNG: I shall be most happy to consider any information which the hon. Member has in his possession.

LOCAL EXPENDITURE.

57. Mr. H. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Health the aggregate of the rate and grant-borne expenditure of the local authorities for 1929-30, together with the estimated aggregates for the years 1930-31, 1931-32, and 1932-33?

Sir H. YOUNG: The aggregate expenditure of local authorities in England and Wales falling on rates and Government grants, excluding grants for capital purposes, was £262,350,000 in 1929-30 and £271,760,000 in 1930-31. The corresponding estimated figures for the two following years are not yet available.

Mr. WILLIAMS: May I ask how the estimate of £20,000,000 given in the Debate last week was arrived at?

Sir H. YOUNG: That was an estimate of a different quantity for a different period.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Is it not the case that the expenditure for the present year was estimated by the right hon. Gentleman to be £20,000,000 below the level for 1929-30? He now tells us that the figures for the present year are not available. May I ask how the estimate was arrived at?

Sir H. YOUNG: In the present question the hon. Gentleman is asking me about a different quantity, that is, the rate and grant-aided expenditure.

POOR LAW.

EXPENDITURE.

61. Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Health how many local authorities have estimated for public assistance expenditure for the year 1933-34; and in how many cases the estimate is an increase over the year 1932-33?

Sir H. YOUNG: Local authorities are not required to send copies of their estimates to my Department. I regret that the information desired by the hon. Member is therefore not available.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Could the right hon. Gentleman state how many local authorities have intimated to his Department what the estimated increase in public assistance expenditure will be for the coming financial year?

Sir H. YOUNG: I explained to the hon. Member that there is no obligation upon the local authorities to give information to me. It is only casually, through deputations and so on, that I receive such information.

INSTITUTIONS (INMATES' TRANSFERENCE).

62. Mr. HICKS asked the Minister of Health whether he is aware that, under the new arrangements made by the public assistance committee of the London County Council, aged people, who through poverty are obliged to enter Poor Law institutions during the later years of their life, are being removed to other institutions, in some cases far from their friends; and whether, in view of the hardship this causes, he will take steps to prohibit the removal of aged persons from such institutions if they have been residents for a period of years and are over the age of 60?

Sir H. YOUNG: The improved classification of institutions, which was contemplated by the Local Government Act, 1929, and which is in the interest of inmates, cannot be effected without some transference. I understand that the London County Council are doing everything in their power to minimise inconvenience to these old people and their friends. I have, in any event, no power to issue such a prohibition as is contemplated in the last part of the question.

Mr. HICKS: May I ask the Minister whether he would be willing to recommend to the London County Council that, in the cases of aged people who want to visit their friends, and for whom it is quite a physical trial, or if any of their old friends want to visit them, the council should, in so far as is practicable, minimise any attempt to transfer those people?

Sir H. YOUNG: I think that I can assure the hon. Gentleman that careful consideration of the convenience and comfort of the particular cases is given. I would remind him that the old people will be dealt with according to the proper classification.

Mr. LANSBURY: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would ask the inspectors to go into this matter? Is he aware that there are cases of old people who are 80, 82 or 83 years of age, and who have been shifted right away from their friends? No one accuses anyone of doing that to hurt people, but it does seem that arrangements might be made to deal with these relatively few cases of real hardship.

Sir H. YOUNG: I am satisfied that the London County Council are doing everything in their power to consider the circumstances of particular cases.

CASUAL WARDS.

66. Mr. DAVID ADAMS asked the Minister of Health the number of men, women, and children who have passed through casual wards in the County of London during November and December, 1932, and January, 1933, and the corresponding periods for 1931-32?

Sir H. YOUNG: I regret that this information is not available. The average numbers in casual wards on Fridays, in the two periods named, were 714 for the earlier period, and 691 for the latter.

NECESSITOUS AREAS (DURHAM).

68. Mr. McKEAG asked the Minister of Health if his attention has been drawn to the fact that the charge on rates for public assistance in Durham county for 1933 is estimated to amount to £1,312,815, representing an increase of £100,000 in the last 12 months and £400,000 in the last three years; and whether he proposes to take any immediate steps to relieve this burden on local ratepayers?

Sir H. YOUNG: Local authorities' estimates of expenditure are not submitted to me. As regards the second part of the question, I would refer to the answer given to the hon. Member for Carnarvon (Major Owen) on the 28th February.

Mr. McKEAG: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will have regard to the absolute necessity of giving a substantial measure of relief to the depressed area of Durham County at the earliest possible moment?

PUBLIC HEALTH.

MILK (SPECIAL DESIGNATIONS) ORDER.

63. Captain McEWEN asked the Minister of Health whether he is now in a position to alter the requirement of the Ministry whereby it is laid down that the date of production must be stated on the caps of all bottles of certified milk?

Sir H. YOUNG: This matter has not been lost sight of, but, pending decisions on certain wider questions of policy, I cannot at present undertake to consider altering the relevant requirements of the Milk (Special Designations) Order, 1923.

Captain McEWEN: Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that the adjustment requested is a very small one, and could its adoption not be accepted?

Sir H. YOUNG: I am aware of the arguments in favour of the course which the hon. Member recommends, but, as I say, a decision at the moment would not be convenient, in view of certain wider decisions under consideration.

MATERNITY AND CHILD WELFARE (CORNWALL).

67. Mr. PRICE asked the Minister of Health whether his attention has been drawn to the decision of the Cornwall Public Health Committee to reduce the number of health visitors from 11 to nine, combining their work with that of inspectors of midwives; and whether, in view of the fact that he has on more than one occasion pointed out to this authority that the medical and clerical staff employed by it on the public health work of the county is insufficient and does not provide proper maternity and child welfare services, he will state what steps he intends to take?

Sir H. YOUNG: I do not find that my attention has been previously drawn to this matter, but I am causing inquiries to be made of the Cornwall County Council in regard to it.

Mr. PETHERICK: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the standard of health which prevails in Cornwall is at least as good as that which prevails in the West Riding of Yorkshire?

NATIONAL FINANCE.

BEER DUTY.

70. Major-General Sir ALFRED KNOX asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the revenue from beer excise in the nine months ended 31st December, 1930 and 31st December, 1932, respectively.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Chamberlain): The net revenue derived from the duty on home-made beer in the nine months ended 31st December in each of the years 1930 and 1932 (respectively) was as follows:

1930	53,916,000
1932	52,748,000

Sir A. KNOX: Does not the right hon. Gentleman now acknowledge that this malicious tax has been of as little use to the Treasury as it has been harmful to decent people in this country who drink beer?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not acknowledge anything.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

IMPORT DUTIES (MACHINERY).

71. Sir A. KNOX asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will consider the possibility of inserting in the Finance Act a clause making it possible to issue retrospective licences permitting the refund of the duty on specialised machinery, not manufactured in this country, which entered Great Britain in the period between the 1st March, 1931, when such duty was first imposed by the Import Duties Act, and the 16th June, 1931, when last year's Finance Act, Section 10, provided for the importation of such machinery duty free in consideration of the fact that the early importation of this machinery enabled canning firms, in particular, to employ several hundred extra hands who would otherwise have remained idle during last summer?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I regret that I cannot entertain my hon. and gallant Friend's suggestion.

Sir A. KNOX: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the facts of the case? Is he aware that these firms, owing to their keenness to employ labour, happened to import machinery in the only three and a-half months during which duty has been paid on that machinery; and would not this concession be a fair recompense to them for their enterprise in trying to cut down unemployment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I have considered that point. The suggestion which my hon. and gallant Friend makes would lead, I am afraid, to a good many other complications which, possibly, he has not considered.

Sir A. KNOX: Will my right hon. Friend receive a deputation on the subject?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I shall be very happy to receive my hon. and gallant Friend, if he likes to come and see me.

Mr. PERKINS: Is it not the case that, as a result of the tariff policy of the Government, it is now possible to purchase such machinery in this country?

PRICE LEVEL.

72. Mr. MABANE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in order to prevent the Government's policy of scientific expansion being frustrated by a further fall in the internal price level, action is to be taken to prevent such a fall; and whether he can indicate the nature of that action?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: It is impossible to isolate sterling prices completely from the effect of falling world prices, but, although world prices have dropped by some 20 per cent. during the last 18 months, the sterling price level has remained remarkably stable. I am not without hope that the policy of cheap money and plentiful credit which has brought about this result may, if continued, lead to an increase of prices, and this process will undoubtedly be greatly facilitated if international agreement can be obtained on some of the present world problems.

Mr. MAXTON: Could the right hon. Gentleman tell us if there is any money left in the Exchange Equalisation Fund?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not think it would be desirable to disclose particulars about the Exchange Equalisation Fund.

Mr. COCKS: Could the right hon. Gentleman explain what exactly "scientific" expansion is?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: That inquiry had better be addressed to the hon. Member who put the question.

Mr. MABANE: Will the right hon. Gentleman treat this matter as one of grave urgency, in view of the continued fall since the Ottawa declaration in favour of raising the price level; and is he aware that many Members of the House attribute that continued fall to the policy of restriction and deflation pursued by the Bank of England?

NEW ZEALAND (PRIMAGE DUTIES).

81. Mr. MANDER asked the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs what action he is taking in view of the raising by the New Zealand Government of primage duties on a number of products from 3 per cent. to 5 per cent., although under the Ottawa Agreement these were to be reduced?

The SECRETARY of STATE for DOMINION AFFAIRS (Mr. J. H. Thomas): I think that the hon. Member may be under some misapprehension. The primage duty in New Zealand still remains at 3 per cent. ad valorem, and only applies to imported goods, whether United Kingdom or foreign, which are otherwise free of Customs duty. A sales tax of 5 per cent. has, however, just been imposed by His Majesty's Government in New Zealand on the sale value of certain goods, and I understand that this tax is chargeable upon all goods to which it relates, whether imported or locally produced.

Mr. MANDER: Does the right hon. Gentleman consider that to be consistent with the spirit of the Ottawa Agreements?

Mr. THOMAS: The hon. Member asked me in his question what action I was taking in view of the raising of primage duties by the New Zealand Government. I have just said that that has not been done.

WAR MATERIAL (EXPORT LICENCES).

92. Mr. GORDON MACDONALD asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he will give particulars by categories and by countries, for the year 1932 and January and February, 1933, of arms and munitions and naval and military stores, not including sporting arms and munitions, destined for all countries, excluding China and Japan, in respect of which he has issued export licences?

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. Runciman): I will circulate as soon as possible in the OFFICIAL REPORT a statement giving the information desired.

93. Mr. MACDONALD asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state for the year 1932 and January and February, 1933, by categories, the declared value of domestic exports of arms, munitions and naval and military stores, not including sporting arms and munitions, exported from the United Kingdom to all countries, excluding China and Japan, and the countries to which consigned; and, similarly, the declared value of re-exports?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I am having a statement prepared which I will send to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

IMPORT RESTRICTIONS, SWITZERLAND (WOOLLEN AND WORSTED TISSUES).

94. Mr. MABANE asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Swiss Government have placed an embargo on the importation of woollen and worsted tissues of a weight exceeding 300 grammes a square metre; whether there is reason to believe this action is preliminary to the establishment of a quota for these goods; whether he can give any further information on the subject; and what action he proposes to conserve the interests of those engaged in this country in the manufacture of these goods?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: Under a Swiss Decree and Order of 23rd February, the importation from any country of the tissues referred to is made subject to special authorisation, and the competent department has power under the decree to fix quotas for each country. The position will be carefully watched and appropriate steps will be taken should any question of discrimination against this country arise.

Sir P. HARRIS: Is not this partly the result of the tariff policy of the Government, which has inevitably led to retaliation?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: No, Sir.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS.

HOURS OF DUTY.

73. Sir G. FOX asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether any comparison has recently been made between the hours worked in the various Government Departments in London and those worked by employés under the London County Council at County Hall; and, if not, whether he will arrange for such a comparison to be made, in view of the recommendations with regard to the former contained in the Report of the Committee on National Expenditure?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Hore-Belisha): Yes, Sir. I would, however, remind my hon. Friend that the conditions of employment in the Civil Service, including hours of duty, were recently the subject of inquiry by the Royal Commission on the Civil Service, whose report is at the present time under discussion between representatives of Government and of the various staff organisations concerned.

EX-SERVICE MEN.

74. Sir FRANK SANDERSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether, seeing that it is the policy of His Majesty's Government to extend preference in the matter of employment to ex-service men as messengers and paper and record keepers in the various departments of His Majesty's Civil Service, and in view of the fact that they have had continuous service for upwards of 12 years, His Majesty's Government will open up negotiations with the appropriate associations with a view to these men being granted pensionable status?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: As stated in paragraph 210 of the Report of the Royal Commission on the Civil Service, 1929-1931, the classes concerned are ordinarily organised in two grades, of which the higher is established, the members of the lower grade being eligible for promotion to this grade. Representations on the general subject of the establishment of classes at present unestablished have in fact already been made through the recognised channels, and are at present the subject of discussion.

KENYA LAND COMMISSION (REPORT).

82. Mr. MANDER asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies when he expects to receive the report of Sir Morris Carter upon the question of native reserves of Kenya Colony; and whether it is his intention to request Sir Morris Carter to forward an interim report upon the reserves in which gold working is at present taking place?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Sir Philip Cunliffe-Lister): I am informed that the Chairman of the Commission hopes the report to be ready early in June. The Governor estimates that the printing of the report, with maps and records of evidence, may take up to a further six weeks. The answer to the last part of the question is in the negative.

SCOTLAND.

ARRESTS AND DISCHARGE.

83. Mr. McGOVERN asked the Secretary of State for Scotland the names and addresses of the two men who were arrested in connection with the alleged illegal operation on Miss Catherine Hamilton Wilson Craig, Bayfield, Newmains, Lanarkshire, which resulted in her death, and what were the reasons for their release?

The LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. Craigie Aitchison): The names and addresses are: James Leslie Smith, Newmains, Lanarkshire, and Thomas Tennant Kerr, Grosvenor Terrace, Glasgow. These two men were called by the Crown as King's evidence and were thereby discharged.

Mr. McGOVERN: Were not these men arrested for a share in this illegal operation; is it not the case that, according to the evidence led, these men exerted the utmost pressure, and that, after the refusal by the women, they induced them, by offering them good sums of money, to perform this operation; and are they not the persons really responsible for the crime?

The LORD ADVOCATE: As the hon. Member will see, it is quite impossible for me to enter into any discussion of the evidence led at the trial. Of course, the men were implicated, in the view of the Crown, or they would not have been called as King's evidence. The question as to who was to be called as King's evidence was a question in the discretion of the Crown, and all relevant considerations were taken into account.

CITY CHAMBERS, EDINBURGH (ADVOCATE'S CLOSE).

85. Mr. LOVAT-FRASER asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, in the demolition now proceeding in connection with the City Chamber extension in Edinburgh, it is proposed to include the destruction of the Advocate's Close; and, if so, whether he will do anything to save this relic of old Edinburgh?

The SECRETARY of STATE for SCOTLAND (Sir Godfrey Collins): I am informed that the Advocate's Close is not affected by the alterations on the City Chambers. It is at present closed owing to operations in connection with a dangerous building which is being removed by order of the Dean of Guild Court. The Close will be reopened as soon as it is safe to do so.

MAGISTRATE'S CONVICTION, GLASGOW.

The following Question stood upon the Order Paper:

84. Mr. McGOVERN. To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has yet reviewed the evidence in the recent bribery trial in Glasgow high court; and if he is able now to announce the setting up of a judicial inquiry.

Mr. McGOVERN: I postpone this at the request of the Secretary of State, who is earnestly considering the matter and will not be in a position until next week to make a decision.

HOUSING, STRATHBLANE AND BLANEFIELD.

86. Mr. LEONARD asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is aware of the existence of basement houses in Blanefield, Stirlingshire, whose occupants have no windows to give light and air and have to rely on these necessities on partitions separating them from rooms belonging to other houses; and what steps he proposes to take?

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for SCOTLAND (Mr. Skelton): The Department of Health for Scotland have no information regarding the houses referred to, but I am having inquiries made and shall inform the hon. Member of the result as soon as possible.

87. Mr. LEONARD asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is aware that in February, 1931, and subsequent dates, groups of inhabitants of the villages of Strathblane and Blanefield, in Stirlingshire, demanded a public inquiry into the non-observance of sanitary and health regulations; and if he will state the reason for the delay in acceding to these requests?

Mr. SKELTON: I am aware that requests for a public inquiry have been made to the Department of Health for Scotland in regard to housing in Strathblane and Blanefield. As regards the latter part of the question, I would refer the hon. Member to the replies on this subject given to the hon. Member for Dumbarton Burghs on 17th and 29th November last.

PUBLIC CONTRACTS (FOREIGN NAILS).

88. Mr. LEONARD asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied that the regulations giving preference to British materials in public assistance department contracts are being observed at the Lennox Castle scheme of the Glasgow Public Assistance Committee; whether he is aware that, in particular, foreign nails are being used; and if he will state the names of the contractors responsible for this departure from the regulations?

Sir G. COLLINS: I am making inquiries and I shall communicate with the hon. Member as soon as possible.

ELECTRICITY SUPPLY, ERROL.

90. Lord SCONE asked the Minister of Transport if he is now in a position to make a statement on the proposed introduction of electricity into the village of Errol?

Mr. STANLEY: I would refer my noble Friend to the answer which was given to him on 8th February, to which I am not in a position to add anything.

Lord SCONE: Is my hon. Friend aware that the position is now very serious as regards the inhabitants of a large rural area, and will he consider the advisability of taking some definite action in the matter?

Mr. STANLEY: As my noble Friend is well aware, I have no power in the matter, as things stand at present, until agreement is reached between the authorities. My predecessor made every effort to facilitate such agreement.

JERSEY (LIGHTS AND FOG SIGNALS).

97. Mr. THORNE asked the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the report of the inquiry of the steamship "St. Patrick," which struck a rock off La Corbiere Point, Channel Islands; if so, whether he has taken any action in regard to the recommendation that additional protection should be afforded to mariners by the installation of an efficient lighthouse and fog signal at Gros Nez Point; and whether he has received any complaints that the fog signal at La Corbiere lighthouse is unsatisfactory?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: The States of Jersey are considering improvements of the existing light and fog signal at La Corbiere and have had advice from the Corporation of Trinity House on the subject. I understand that the installation of a flashing light and a fog signal at Gros Nez Point will also be considered by the States of Jersey as and when funds permit. We have not received any direct complaints that the fog signal at La Corbiere is unsatisfactory, but I am, of course, aware of the views of the Court of Inquiry on this point.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LANSBURY: May I ask what will be the business for next week, and is it possible to state when the Budget will be introduced?

The PRIME MINISTER: As regards the second question, we are still four clear weeks away from the end of the financial year. I will make the announcement of the date as soon as it can be made. The business is as follows:

Monday: Remaining stages of the Housing (Financial Provisions) Bill; Doncaster Area Drainage Bill; and Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Bill from another place.

Tuesday: Second Reading, Local Government (General Exchequer Contributions) Bill; remaining stages of the Indian Pay (Temporary Abatements) Bill; and Committee stage of a Supplementary Estimate for Dominions Services (Newfoundland Loan).

Thursday: It is proposed to move Mr. Speaker out of the Chair on going into Committee of Supply on the Army Estimates and to consider Votes A, 1, 10, 11, 13, 14 and 15.

If there is time on any day, other Orders will be taken. Private Members' business will be taken on Wednesday and Friday.

Mr. LANSBURY: Will the right hon. Gentleman take into account that we think the Housing (Financial Provisions) Bill will take up till Eleven o'clock, and we certainly think the first Order on Tuesday will take until Eleven o'clock. Will he ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury to make arrangements with hon. Members who support the Government to restrict their opposition and curb the rebellious spirits on the Government side?

The PRIME MINISTER: The latter point has not been before us, but it is not the intention of the Government to keep the House sitting inordinately late.

Mr. HANNON: When is it proposed to take the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Bill?

The PRIME MINISTER: It has no place next week.

QUESTIONS TO MINISTERS.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I desire to raise a point of Order. I asked leave yesterday to put the following question by Private Notice as a matter of urgency:

> "To ask the Secretary of State for India whether a committee of Indians is being invited by the Goernment to participate, in a consultative capacity or otherwise, in the work of the Joint Committee of both Houses shortly to be set up, and whether he can assure the House that he will in no way prejudice, by the form of the invitation, the decision of either House of Parliament upon the method of consultation or the status of such Indian nominees in relation to the Joint Committee."

I understand that you, Sir, have disallowed this as a Private Notice question. May I ask for your Ruling for the guidance of the House as to the grounds for such disallowance?

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not usual for an hon. Member to ask me a point of Order regarding a question which I have disallowed. As the right hon. Gentleman has said that he has asked me as a matter for the guidance of the House, I can but answer in that spirit, but I hope that it will be for the guidance of the House. The House, I think, is very well aware of the Rules which govern questions and the Rules which govern questions which are submitted by Private Notice. It is always for me to be the judge as to whether I consider questions submitted to me by Private Notice to be of sufficient urgency to be asked by that means and not put upon the Paper in the ordinary way. I came to the conclusion, after carefully considering the question which the right hon. Gentleman submitted to me, that it might equally well be put upon the Paper in the ordinary way and answered in the ordinary way on Monday.

Mr. CHURCHILL: Further to the point of Order, and upon the question of urgency, may I most respectfully submit that this question raises considerable constitutional issues, and, if invitations are actually at this moment being issued to Indian nominees to participate in a conference, it is surely most important that they should not be issued under a misapprehension as to what Parliament may ultimately decide as to the status of these Indian nominees, or otherwise grave inconvenience and even disappointment may arise at a later stage.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not prepared to argue the urgency of this question. I came to the conclusion, which I still hold, that the question could have been put upon the Paper in the ordinary way.

Mr. CHURCHILL: Naturally, Sir, I bow to your Ruling.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

William Dobbie, esquire, for the Borough of Rotherham.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Ordered, "That all Standing Committees have leave to print and circulate with the Votes the Minutes of their Proceedings and any amended Clauses of the Bills committed to them."—[Sir Cyril Cobb.]

PROTECTION OF ANIMALS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Order for Second Reading upon Friday, 10th March, read, and discharged; Bill withdrawn.

PRIVATE LEGISLATION PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL,

"to improve and extend the procedure under the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1899," presented by Sir Godfrey Collins; supported by the Lord Advocate, the Solicitor-General for Scotland, and Mr. Skelton; to be read a Second time upon Tuesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 65.]

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

SECONDARY SCHOOL FEES, YORKSHIRE.

Mr. HEPWORTH asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Education the school fees for secondary school pupils which have been approved in Yorkshire by the Board of Education as a result of Circular 1421, giving the actual figures in each case?

Mr. RAMSBOTHAM: The following table gives the particulars for which my hon. Friend asks.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

Potatoes (Import Duty).

Lieut.-Colonel MOORE asked the Minister of Agriculture whether, in view of the heavy importations of foreign potatoes, which occurred in the months of June and July last year, he intends to take any action to ensure that the tariff on imported potatoes shall, during the present year, be maintained until the end of August at least?

Major ELLIOT: The duty of 4s. 8d. per cwt. on imported foreign early potatoes will be replaced by a duty of £1 per ton on 1st July. As my hon. and gallant Friend is aware, the question of recommending any additional duty is one for the Import Duties Advisory Committee, which has announced in the Press this morning that an application for an additional duty on potatoes is at present under consideration.

FLOUR CONTRACTS.

Mr. HARVEY asked the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware of the nature of the contract for flour supplies pressed upon London flour factors by the Millers' Mutual Association before supplies are sent to them; and what action he intends to take to prevent such contracts impairing the effects of the Ottawa Agreement regarding Canadian and Australian flour imports?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: My attention has been called to the form of agreement into which millers are asking London flour factors dealing with them to enter. I understand that the Millers' Mutual Association as such are not parties to the agreement. I have not been able to see any ground on which I should be justified in intervening.

FOOD COUNCIL.

Mr. HARVEY asked the President of the Board of Trade what was the total cost for the year 1932 of the Food Council; and will he now take steps to dispense with this Department as redundant.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: The total cost of the Food Council for the calendar year 1932, excluding miscellaneous items such as office accommodation and postal and telephone services, the cost of which is not readily available, was £945. The answer to the second part of the question is in the negative.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

STATISTICS.

Mr. GLEDHILL asked the Minister of Labour the number of young persons added to the register during the last 12 months; the number of old persons in receipt of pensions who still continue to work; and the number of married women in receipt of unemployment benefit whose husbands are working?

Sir H. BETTERTON: Between 25th January, 1932, and 23rd January, 1933, there was an increase of 9,495 in the number of juveniles and young persons, aged 14 to 20 inclusive, on the registers of Employment Exchanges in Great Britain. As regards the number of persons in receipt of old age pensions who continue to work, I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given on 27th October, 1932, by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Health to the question put by the hon. Member for Oldham. Statistics are not available regarding the number of married women in receipt of unemployment benefit whose husbands are working.

Mr. LAWSON asked the Minister of Labour the number of persons estimated to have ceased to register as a result of recent legislative changes?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave on 27th October, 1932, to a question on this subject by the hon. Member for Aberdare (Mr. G. Hall).

ANOMALIES ACT.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked the Minister of Labour if he is aware that seasonal workers who are refused benefit under the Anomalies Act have almost all got the stamp qualification for benefit and when refused have, in many cases, no resources of their own; and if he will make provision in the forthcoming legislation to allow them to benefit and so prevent them becoming a charge on the Poor Law?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I am afraid I cannot adopt this suggestion, which would amount to the repeal of the Anomalies Act in respect of these workers.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked the Minister of Labour if he has recently made any administrative changes in the working of the Anomalies Act; if so, the nature of the same; what requests he has received from any members of the advisory committee under the above Act for any changes to be made; when he received any such request; and the nature of the same?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. It is not the function of the advisory committee to make requests such as those referred to in the question, and I have in fact received no such requests from it.

COURTS OF REFEREES, GLASGOW.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked the Minister of Labour if he proposes to make any changes in the chairmen of courts of referees in the City of Glasgow, seeing that the period for reappointment is now about due; and the nature of the same?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I know of no reason at present for making any such changes.

DARLINGTON.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Labour how many persons were registered as unemployed at Darlington on 20th January, 1932, and 23rd January, 1933; and the number of unemployed who no longer sign on at the Exchange?

Sir H. BETTERTON: At 25th January, 1932, the number of unemployed persons on the register of the Darlington Employment Exchange was 6,433 as compared with 7,824 at 23rd January, 1933. I have no information as to the number of unemployed persons not registered.

TRAINING CENTRES (INSTRUCTORS).

Sir W. SUGDEN asked the Minister of Labour if he will arrange for the present conditions of employment of ex-service instructional staff employed in the various instructional centres to be reviewed at an early date, on the basis of a memorandum already submitted by the Association of Ex-Service Civil Servants; and whether negotiations can be opened up thereon?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The Memorandum referred to by my hon. Friend relates to a number of general issues affecting the conditions of service of instructors on the staffs of the Ministry of Labour Government Training Centres. The membership, however, of the Association of Ex-Service Civil Servants at these centres is not such as would entitle it to recognition as representing the staffs in question on general issues. The Department are so informing the association, to whom nevertheless it will be open as hitherto to make representations on individual cases.

TRANSITIONAL PAYMENTS.

Mr. LAWSON asked the Minister of Labour the number of persons now receiving transitional payment in Great Britain?

Sir H. BETTERTON: At 23rd January, 1933, there were 1,074,705 persons on the registers of Employment Exchanges in Great Britain with applications authorised for transitional payment.

SWANSEA.

Mr. D. GRENFELL asked the Minister of Labour the figures of unemployment for the Swansea area for January, 1930, January, 1931, January, 1932, and January, 1933?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The following table shows the number of unemployed persons (insured and uninsured) on the registers of the Swansea Employment Exchanges.

Date.	Number.
13th January, 1930	7,521
12th January, 1931	11,771
25th January, 1932	13,082
23rd January, 1933	13,228

GLAMORGAN, MONMOUTH, CARMARTHEN AND BRECON.

Mr. D. GRENFELL asked the Minister of Labour the figures of unemployment for the counties of Glamorgan, Monmouth, Carmarthen and Brecon, respectively, for August, 1931, and for the latest available date?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The following table shows the number of unemployed persons on the registers of Employment Exchanges in the counties of Glamorgan, Monmouth, Carmarthen and Brecon.

County.	17th August, 1931.	23rd January, 1933.
	No.	No.
Glamorgan ...	125,417	140,926
Monmouth ...	33,663	44,703
Carmarthen...	10,[illegible]59	9.368
Brecon ...	2,019	3,314

BRITISH ARMY.

TECHNICAL APPOINTMENTS.

Sir E. GRAHAM-LITTLE asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether, when the scales of remuneration for junior assistant metallurgists and for junior assistant chemists in the War Department establishments were introduced in 1925 and 1920, respectively, with the agreement of the out-station committee of the War Office Administrative Whitley Council, it was contemplated by his Department that those scales should be open at the initial salary to men up to the ages of 35 and 27, respectively; and whether it was contemplated that university honours degrees should be a condition of such appointments at an initial basic salary of £160 per annum?

Mr. COOPER: So far as can be traced, no particular upper age limits of entry for these appointments were in contemplation, and, in fact, it is not the usual practice to specify any age limits in advertisements for candidates for these posts. The answer to the last part of the question is in the affirmative.

SCOTTISH COMMAND (COLONEL WATKINS).

Mr. McGOVERN asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office when, and in what circumstances, Colonel Watkins vacated the post of paymaster in the Scottish Command?

Mr. COOPER: This officer retired from the active list at his own request on 5th January last.

ARMY RESERVE (PAY).

Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he will arrange for the payments to men in the Army Reserve to be made weekly instead of quarterly, in order to regularise their weekly income?

Mr. COOPER: I regret that any alteration would be impracticable owing to the large amount of work and expense that would be involved.

INDIA.

MEERUT PRISONERS.

Dr. SALTER asked the Secretary of State for India (1) whether he is aware that the placing of the Meerut prisoners in Class B is in respect of their food and clothing only; that the other privileges of Class B, such as reading and writing, are denied them; that these conditions are hampering the prisoners in the preparation of their appeal to the high court; and if, in view of the social and educational status of the prisoners, he will arrange for their transfer to Class A;

(2) whether he is aware that the Meerut prisoners are without socks, boots, underwear, hats and sufficient bedding; that, as a result of the severe cold, several of the prisoners have been down with fever; and whether he will give directions that better provision shall be made for them?

Sir S. HOARE: As I have already informed the House, the prisoners have definitely been placed in "B" class by order of the local government, and they are receiving the treatment laid down for prisoners in that class. I am not prepared to accept as accurate the statements contained in the questions. I can assure the hon. Member that the prisoners will be given such facilities as may be proper for the preparation of their appeals.

UNIVERSITIES (MILITARY SCIENCE).

Major MILNER asked the Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India propose to take any steps with a view to encouraging the introduction of military science as an extra optional subject of study in Indian universities; and what universities have already introduced the subject into their curricula?

Sir S. HOARE: I have no information, but I will inquire if the hon. and gallant Member wishes.

RESERVE BANK.

Major MILNER asked the Secretary of State for India whether His Majesty's Government or the Government of India have taken any steps to draft the Reserve Bank Bill; and what procedure it is proposed to adopt with a view to implementing the promise made at the Round Table Conference that Indian opinion will be consulted before the Bill is placed before the Legislative Assembly?

Sir S. HOARE: I would refer the hon. and gallant Member to the reply given on 27th February to the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. D. Grenfell), to which I have nothing to add.

ARMY EXPENDITURE.

Captain FULLER asked the Secretary of State for India what contributions are paid by Indian States towards the expenses of the British Army and Indian Army apart from the cost of their own military forces?

Sir S. HOARE: No such contributions are paid directly by the Indian States, but they contribute indirectly to the military expenditure of the Government of India in a number of ways.

COAL INDUSTRY (ROYALTIES, DURHAM).

Mr. LAWSON asked the Secretary for Mines the total amount of royalty paid on coal produced in the county of Durham in the last year for which a statement is available; and the names of such royalty owners and the respective amounts drawn by them during the year?

Mr. E. BROWN: During the year 1932, the estimated amount paid by colliery owners in Durham in royalties and wayleaves, including the rental value of freehold minerals where worked by the proprietors, was £659,000. I am unable to give the information asked for in the second part of the question.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS.

YORKSHIRE.

Mr. HEPWORTH asked the Minister of Health the number and nature of the applications which have been put forward in the last six months by each of the different local authorities in Yorkshire for sanction to loans for public works with the object of directly or indirectly relieving unemployment; and whether he will in each case state the official answer?

Sir H. YOUNG: No applications have been put forward expressly for works for the relief of unemployment. A number of loans in Yorkshire have been sanctioned for public works but separate returns are not kept for local authorities by counties. The total loans sanctioned for England and Wales, including housing loans, from the beginning of April, 1932, to the end of January was £34,300,000.

WOLVERHAMPTON AND DISTRICT.

Mr. MANDER asked the Minister of Health what schemes contemplated by the county borough of Wolverhampton and the urban district councils of Willenhall, Wednesfield, and Short Heath were held up as a result of the economy policy following the crisis of 1931, with full details?

Sir H. YOUNG: The only application for loan refused by me appears to be one for a loan of £7,000 for council offices and a fire station at Willenhall. The scheme had already been the subject of a local inquiry and had been reported as not urgently needed.

HOUSING (RURAL WORKERS).

Sir P. HURD asked the Minister of Health if he will issue a statement of houses dealt with under the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926, showing the result in each housing area and the cost to the rates?

Sir H. YOUNG: I am sending my hon. Friend a statement for England and Wales of the particulars which he desires so far as they are available.

REGISTRAR-GENERAL'S OFFICE (CERTIFICATES, CHECKING).

Mr. RHYS DAVIES asked the Minister of Health whether he is aware that the final check on the validity of certificates of births, marriages and deaths issued by the Registrar-General is left to the typists to undertake in the ordinary course of their duties; and whether he will see to it that in future experienced officers are appointed to be responsible for this work?

Sir H. YOUNG: I can hardly accept the hon. Member's description of the duties of the typists in question. The nature and scope of the checks to be applied in the preparation of certified copies of birth, death and marriage entries for issue by the Registrar-General are, however, now under consideration.

POOR LAW RELIEF (LIVERPOOL).

Mr. LOGAN asked the Minister of Health the estimated expenditure for public assistance during the year 1932-33 in Liverpool and the estimate for the year 1933-34?

Sir H. YOUNG: This information is not in my possession.

GOLD (HOLDING, BANK OF ENGLAND).

Mr. O'CONNOR asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the fact that the recent additions to the gold holding of the Bank of England have created an erroneous impression in the United States of America as to the gold resources at the disposal of the Government; and whether, with a view to correcting this impression, he will arrange in future for a weekly statement to be issued showing the amount of gold which is held in the Issue Department of the Bank of England on behalf of the Exchange Equalisation Fund?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: My attention had not been drawn to the circumstances mentioned in the first part of the question, but I have in fact made it clear in a recent answer that the acquisitions of gold were connected with the temporary inflow into this market of foreign funds which may be withdrawn at any time. In reply to the second part of the question, gold shown in the weekly returns of the Bank of England is held by the Issue Department as its own property. I cannot undertake to publish particulars of the holdings of the Exchange Equalisation Account.

NIGHT-WORK (WOMEN).

Mr. MANDER asked the Home Secretary what action he is taking with regard to the request to receive a deputation concerning the Night-Work for Women Convention?

Sir J. GILMOUR: I have carefully considered the request that a deputation of women's organisations should be received to discuss the situation arising out of the Advisory Opinion of the Permanent Court of International Justice on the International Labour Convention concerning the employment of women during the night. I would point out that the decision of the International Court does not appear to create any new situation so far as this country is concerned. The Court endorsed the view previously put forward by the British Government that the Convention applies to women holding responsible positions of management and His Majesty's Government propose to recommend to the Governing Body in April that the British proposal to amend the Convention so as to exempt such women should, in view of the Court's decision, again be brought before the International Labour Conference. Moreover, the general view which I understand to be held in these organisations that restrictions such as are prescribed under this Convention should not be applied to women unless also applied to men, has been fully represented by previous deputations at the Home Office. In these circumstances, I doubt whether any useful purpose would be served by receiving a further deputation; and I have sent a reply to that effect, drawing attention to the above considerations.

CORONERS.

Mr. BRACKEN asked the Home Secretary whether, in view of the discontent aroused by proceedings in coroners' courts, he will appoint a Departmental Committee to review the powers and functions of Coroners?

Sir J. GILMOUR: I am aware that from time to time the conduct of inquests by coroners has been the subject of criticism, but, as at present advised, I do not think it is necessary to appoint a Departmental Committee as suggested by my hon. Friend.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

[2ND ALLOTTED DAY.]

Resolution [27th February] reported.

CIVIL ESTIMATES AND ESTIMATES FOR REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1933 (VOTE ON ACCOUNT).

"That a sum, not exceeding £156,423,000, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charges for the following Civil and Revenue Departments (including Pensions, Education, Insurance and other Grants, and Exchequer Contributions to Local Revenues) for the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1934."—

[For details of Vote on Account, see OFFICIAL REPORT, 27th February, 1933; cols. 31-34.]

Resolution read a Second time.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

3.55 p.m.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: I beg to move, to leave out "£156,423,000," and to insert instead thereof "£156,422,900."

After the event which we have just witnessed, namely, the very emphatic reply from Rotherham to the action of the Government with regard to the administration of the means test, this Debate ought to be of great interest to hon. Members opposite, and particularly to industrial Members who must recognise that they no longer represent the views of their divisions. In view of the statement which has been made that the Minister of Labour is to tell us about the work schemes which the Government have in hand, I am looking forward with great interest to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I regret very much that the Minister could not have preceded me. Several Debates have taken place upon the question of work finding and the problem of unemployment generally, and this Debate was intended to be one to deal exclusively with the question of administration. Nevertheless, we shall welcome the statement which we understand is to be forthcoming from the Minister, and in all probability the course of the Debate will change when the right hon. Gentleman has imparted his cheery optimism and has indicated what schemes the Prime Minister had in his mind when he spoke. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is his intention to make his speech upon schemes and proposals which the Government have produced to find work for those who are disengaged? If that is the case I am sure that all of us will be interested, especially after the chorus of despair to which we had to listen a few weeks ago in this House.

I wish to deal with one or two questions which are exclusively points of administration for which the right hon. Gentleman is responsible. His is a vast Department catering for approximately 12,000,000 people, and dealing with tens of thousands of Employment Exchanges, and questions ranging from unemployment grants to hours of labour, juvenile training, and the administration of the means test. It would not be out of place to have a general picture of the unemployment situation before our minds. The figures given by the right hon. Gentleman to-day indicate that we have 2,380,000 people wholly unemployed, and I would invite hon. Gentlemen to recognise that the number of wholly unemployed is constantly increasing, and the more rapidly since the present Government took office. There are partially unemployed approximately 520,000, making in all, with those who no longer sign on at the Employment Exchanges, approximately 400,000 more than when the present Government took office. That perhaps is not the worst side of the case. The right hon. Gentleman will observe that, month after month, the number o hard cases, of persons who have been unemployed for more than 12 months, ha continually increased, so much so tha instead of the 100,000 18 months ago, according to the figures of the Ministr of Labour, there are now 400,000 peopl who have been unemployed for a perio of at least 12 months. That is a situatio which we cannot view with equanimity and, in view of certain statements mad by the Prime Minister and the Chan cellor of the Exchequer, the statemen which the Minister is to make will b welcomed if it tends to reduce th abnormal number of people who hav been out of work for 12 continuou months.

Then the number of transitional case continues to increase. I notice tha between January, 1932, and January 1933, there is an increase in the numbe transferred from the Employment Exchanges to the Poor Law authorities o no less than 268,000, or a total in transition of 1,174,000. The right hon. Gentleman will know without my wasting the time of the House how this problem is affecting certain districts. In Glamorgan, for instance, 42 per cent.; in Monmouthshire, 45.8 per cent.; in Durham, 44 per cent.; in Middlesbrough, 48 per cent.; and in Sheffield, 40 per cent. of the workpeople are unemployed. As a result of this vast increase in the army of unemployed, local authorities all over the country are groaning under burdens which many of them are unable o bear. Since the right hon. Gentleman and the Government took office we have been producing paupers at an alarming rate. I think that the Government have been chiefly successful in that they have produced paupers at a quicker rate than ny other Government has ever produced hem.

The question of Poor Law relief is an qually serious one, I repeat, for Poor Law authorities, and I want to point out that while the average number per 10,000 f the population all over the country ersistently increases, it has increased t a more alarming rate since this Government came into office than at any ime prior to that. In Lincoln, for intance—and the Government are to an xtent responsible for these figures by heir attitude to Russia—out of every 0,000 persons resident in that ancient ty, 1,410 are in receipt of public assistance; that is, out of every 100, no fewer han 14 are paupers. At Liverpool the umber is 901 out of every 10,000, in heffield 1,141, in Manchester 735, and in arnsley 907. The point I want to mphasise is that the Government have tremendous responsibility for dealing ith the problem of unemployment, and r seeing that our large local authorities re not sent into a state of insolvency.

The first question I want to ask the ght hon. Gentleman, therefore, is, hat steps, if any, are the Government king to assist local authorities when ey are burdened with increased sponsibilities by the administration of e means test? The right hon. Gentlean knows that it is a mere transfer om national funds to local funds, and also knows that rate burdens are real rdens upon industry, because they ve to be paid out of industry, while, any rate, Income Tax is not paid unless the income has actually been obtained. Will he tell us, therefore, when he comes to reply, just what assistance is going to be made available to places such as Liverpool, Manchester, Barnsley, Lincoln and the rest which are confronted with a Poor Law rate of anything from 6s. to 7s. or 8s. in the pound, while residential areas, where are the homes of the people who make the profits but never live in industrial areas, are approximately rated at 9d. or 10d.

The next thing to which I want to refer is the very cheery statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer a fortnight ago. Although the Government were returned in order to restore industrial prosperity, indeed to resolve all the problems confronting the State and nearly all the world, the figures given us show that the situation to-day is infinitely worse than when the present Government took office. The Prime Minister talked about 2,000,000 men whom he termed "scrap," but the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, if I may say so, much more honest than many hon. and right hon. Gentlemen when they are talking about this question of unemployment, for if the Chancellor visualises a perpetuation of this profit-making system, which has no relation to human needs or human desires, I agree with him that there will be no material reduction in the army of unemployed within 10 years. Indeed the Chancellor went on to state:

> "If anybody expressed any hope that improvement was in sight or was about to set in that could only be set down to a sort of dogged optimism which refused to take into account the evidence."

Well, the Chancellor has got the evidence, and he gives little or no hope either to the unemployed or to those who may presently be unemployed. Again he said:

> "There must be a transition period in which things will be very difficult and unemployment will be largely increased."—[Official Report, 16th February, 1933; cols. 1216 and 1223, Vol. 274.]

He went on to suggest that four things were required—restoration of confidence, increase in wholesale prices, cheap money and international co-operation. If you increase the prices of commodities to be purchased by the unemployed, whose benefits you have reduced by 10 per cent., will you create confidence in the hearts and minds of the 3,000,000 unemployed?

[Mr. Williams.]

The Chancellor states that we must have international co-operation. Having watched this Government very closely during the past 18 months, it seems to me that if they have been striving for anything at all, it has been nothing but international isolation. They have done their best to prevent any sort of movement in trade. Whenever an international movement in trade has been proposed for dealing even remotely with this colossal human problem, the Government have done their very best to prevent any progress being made. We have been told by Ministers that all these work schemes are hopeless failures. Export credits, unemployment grants, housing, drainage, roads and so forth are of no service in this problem. The Government have economised on wages, work schemes and the rest, and they have added approximately £30,000,000 or £40,000,000 in direct taxation on the consumers of the country, and to that extent have reduced the spending power of the poorest of the poor.

If, as the Chancellor truly states, there is no likelihood of any material reduction during the next 10 years in the army of unemployed, what are they going to do with the unemployed if they are unwilling to do anything for them? Twelive months or so ago the International Federation of Trade Unions raised at Geneva the question of the 40-hour week. It was at that time turned down by two votes. Italy resurrected the question later, and it found its way on the agenda of the Preparatory Conference for Technical Problems. A representative of the Government went to Geneva and represented the British Government's point of view. When we challenged the right hon. Gentleman by stating that his instructions must have been to oppose the 40-hour proposal by any and every means, the right hon. Gentleman engendered some heat and indeed, on occasion, some indignation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, a fortnight ago, read out the following quotation:

> " The British Government delegate stated that his Government considered that the question of the compulsory limitation of the hours of work to 40 a week had not yet been sufficiently examined to warrant a definite conclusion being reached, and that therefore his Government were opposed to proceeding at the present time with the project of a draft convention. He pressed for a comprehensive inquiry into the whole question before any definite action was taken."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 10th February, 1933 col. 1224, Vol. 274.]

When the Chancellor quoted that h appeared to think that it was conclusiv and that the Government had not in fac opposed the 40-hour Convention. I wil give another quotation. I will not selec a sentence or two from the context, an I apologise in advance for a long quotation, because I want to give the fu statement made in " Industrial an Labour Information," published by th International Labour Office, League c Nations. This was the statement mad by Mr. Norman, the Government representative, when intervening in the di cussion. Mr. Norman said:

> " At this stage he would deal only wit that aspect of the problem which related t wages. Grave as was unemployment, it wa necessary to bear in mind that the numbe of employed persons still exceeded the num ber of unemployed, and any proposal likel to result in lowering the standard of li of those now in employment ought to b subjected to the most critical examinatio The British workers were in favour of reduction of hours provided that it was n accompanied by a reduction of individu earnings. The generality of British en ployers, for a variety of reasons—technica financial, economic, etc.—were opposed t the imposition of a 40-hour week by legi lation; further, if legislation were impose they held that they would find it impo sible to retain earnings at their prese level, and would be compelled to reduce t individual earnings of the employed peopl If in these circumstances the British Go ernment did impose a limitation of hou to 40 per week, the result would be indu trial strife over wages, the setting aside collective agreements, confusion and co troversy of a very dangerous kind. Th being so, the lot of the unemployed wou not be assisted in any degree."

He concluded:

> " It had been proved conclusively by D Sitzler, in an article which appeared in t December issue of the International Labo Review, that in present circumstances would be hopeless to attempt by intern tional convention or by national legislati to control wage rates so as to prevent ear ings from being reduced coincidently wi hours. Apart from technical, economic a other obstacles in the way of an acceptal 40-hour Convention at the present time, t wage difficulty was conclusive. The Briti Government therefore suggested that t Conference should look to other and mo helpful fields of inquiry and not waste ti and energy in pursuing the phantom of 40-hour Convention."

I would ask whether that statement do not represent the point of view of M Norman and, presumably, of the Minist of Labour and the whole of the Gover ment. They are entirely opposed to a 40-hour week. While every other industrial State in the Conference voted for the second of the two resolutions at Geneva, the British Government, the most important one in Europe, was the only Government to oppose that second resolution. That is by no means a new standpoint for the Conservative party. When we listen to the Minister of Labour we always feel that he is the very essence of sincerity, but we cannot forget the attitude of the Conservative party when they were in office from 1918 onwards. We had the Eight Hours' Convention which was passed at Washington in 1919. Did the Conservative Government do anything to ratify that Convention at that time? No. We had also a Conservative Government in 1923. Did they take any action to examine the problem, or even to think about it? Dominated then, as they are to-day, by representatives of the employers, they did nothing. We had a Conservative Government from 1924 to 1929. What action did the Minister of Labour at that time take to initiate an inquiry so that the delicate agreements on wages and hours could be carefully examined and the problems smoothed out and the Government could ratify the Washington Convention? They did nothing. They never even felt that they ought to take any steps in that direction. They left office in 1929 with nothing done in regard to hours, because they had not in the Government a Minister of foresight or any person capable of visualising the problem.

Sir ARTHUR STEEL-MAITLAND: As the hon. Member has referred to me, may ask why, in those circumstances, the ucceeding Socialist Minister of Labour rst undertook to ratify and then in the urse of two years did not do so?

Mr. WILLIAMS: I am much obliged the right hon. Gentleman for having ised that point and I will deal with , but the point at the moment is this —[Laughter.] If hon. Members will ntain their souls in patience for two three seconds, I will turn to the right n. Gentleman's question. Perhaps it puld satisfy hon. Members and check eir amusement if I deal with the point w. The moment that the Labour Government took office one of the first oblems with which they tried to deal was the problem of the Washington Convention. Sir William Jowitt spent a month with his coat off, so to speak, dealing with the problem. [Interruption.] Well, at all events, the Labour Government produced a Bill, and we said then, as we say to-day, that as near as it is humanly possible to obtain agreement on such a comprehensive Measure outside a Committee room of the House of Commons, agreement was obtained, and it only required numerical strength in the House of Commons to carry it.

Mr. MANDER: You had that, but you never gave it a Second Reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS: The hon. Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Mander) has pursued this question very tenaciously, and I am proud of his persistence, because I am equally persistent, but I would remind the hon. Member that in 1929-30 he did not control the Liberal party. He could never guarantee that the Government of that day had behind it sufficient Members of the Liberal party, with the Members of the Labour party, to make a majority and to carry the Bill. There was another reason why we did not carry the Bill, and that was that we were not aware at that time that we had so many Conservative Ministers in the Labour Government. Whatever the right hon. Gentleman may say, he must bear that fact in mind. We have had to shed a good many of our misfortunes which prevented action on that occasion. Let me summarise the position. From 1918-1922 nothing was done in regard to ratifying the Convention. In 1923 nothing was done. From 1924 to 1929 nothing was done, and now in 1933, with 30,000,000 unemployed, for 3,000,000 of whom we are responsible, when a proposal is made for a 40 hours week, the right hon. Gentleman says that we cannot deal with that matter because we have not had time to consider it.

It appears that the Government are anxious to do as little for the unemployed as possible, if their actions are a true guide. Three or four weeks ago the right hon. Gentleman made a statement in the House that in the short space of time before July there is no hope of examining this problem and making a good job of it at Geneva in July. Is that to be the Government's attitude towards the Convention? Have they made up their minds in advance that they are going to be as unhelpful as they possibly can? Germany and the other Governments are anxious for such a proposal. Their representatives spoke in support of it. Are we to be the only Government who have no desire to deal with the new social problems which have arisen, and which will have to be dealt with sooner or later?

I know the old argument. It will be equivalent to the argument that was raised when the hours were 10 per day. It was then said that the employer depended upon the last hour for his profit and that if we reduced the working day from 10 hours to nine we should rob the employer of his profit. The same statement was made when the hours were nine. We are now down to eight hours a day. Those reductions were made on ethical and humanitarian grounds, but future reductions will have to be made on social grounds. When one visualises the effect upon juveniles between the ages of 14 and 21, for whom no adequate arrangements can be made, it becomes a real social necessity for us to examine the advisability of an international convention on this subject. One of the four things which the Chancellor of the Exchequer considers to be necessary is international co-operation. Will the Minister of Labour take up the challenge of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and make a convention in regard to a 40 hours' week the starting point for international co-operation? If it is possible to have international cartels, international restrictions and the ramifications of international financiers, it ought not be impossible to have an international convention for the purpose of dealing with working hours.

My third point is this: What is the Minister going to do with the victims of an economic system over which they have no control? Transitional benefit has been administered now for 18 months and we have had a good deal of experience of it. Until recently in the West Riding of Yorkshire we had few complaints, but the situation has been different since the Minister intervened. He sent Mr. Basham to Rotherham and he helped to bash the Government in the by-election there. The West Riding County Council have been told that unless they administer transitional benefit mor harshly—that was not the actual wor used—or more in accordance with th Order in Council, the right hon. Gentl man will have no alternative but t supersede them. The West Ridin County Council, dominated by Co servative and Liberal members, not wis ing to undergo the indignity of supe session, responded to the threat of th right hon. Gentleman. They set up sub-committee to consider the questio and see what could be done. That su committee has made certain recommend tions and there are two paragraphs their report which finally and definite demonstrate that transitional administr tion means a destitution test. Whatev the right hon. Gentleman may say, will be difficult for him to escape fro the words in the sub-committee's repo where they say:

> "Your sub-committee deem it essenti > to remind the public assistance committe > and through them the several guardian > committees, that in the administration > relief there is no authority to do more th > relieve destitution, and any allowance whi > may be more than sufficient for that purpo > is illegal, and the scale suggested in t > restrictions recommended has been form > lated with due regard to the legal limit > tions imposed."

In another paragraph the sub-committ say:

> "Such restrictions, if imposed, would > directed primarily to applications f > public assistance, but they would ha > equal effect upon applications for tran > tional payments."

Therefore, it is a pure, unadulterat destitution test that is being applied, a we have had some early results of it the West Riding. For approximately months I do not think I have h occasion to write one letter to t Minister of Labour or his Department, his officers, for whom I have very p found respect, complaining of administration, but the moment Minister insists upon the West Rid County Council going near to the let of the Order in Council, we find that the Don Valley area 25 per cent. of t total cases have been re-examined in t light of the recommendations of sub-committee. If the remaining 75 cent. of the cases for examination dealt with similarly, the increase determinations where the applic receives nothing at all will be rou about 14 or 15 per cent.

I want to give a few cases and to ask the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members whether they really think that these determinations should have called for the threat of supersession from the Minister of Labour. Here is a case of a miner working one week out of every two, through no fault of his own. It is an order of the management and presumably it is suitable to them. There is the man and wife and the gross earnings, according to the colliery wage return, have been £1 5s. 3d. per week. The deductions at the colliery for rent and other stoppages is 13s. 6d., leaving the man with only 11s. 9d. to take home each week. The public assistance committee therefore granted the man 10s. a week, r slightly less than the maximum benefit payable. He had, therefore, £1 1s. 9d. a week to keep himself and his wife, to provide clothing and to meet all the needs f the home. Does the right hon. Gentleman think that such a person is not ntitled to 10s. a week? I ask any hon. Member to put that question to himself. ow that the county council have devised scheme what is that man's position? e works at the colliery for one week but unable to work the next week through o fault of his own. His net receipts rom the colliery are 11s. 9d. a week. Can he right hon. Gentleman or any hon. Member say that men are going to continue working down the coal mines for s. a week. After having paid their eekly contributions, as they must by w, to be denied the right of receiving ny sort of benefit, is the last word in ggravation and is calculated to produce n atmosphere that will reflect itself dversely, sooner or later.

Here is another case of a man who has wife and two children. He works one eek in two and his earnings average 30s. r week. The deductions for rent and her stoppages amount to 15s. 5d., leavg 14s. 7d. for the man, his wife and o children. The public assistance committee awarded 12s. transitional payment. that too much? It means 26s. 7d. per eek to maintain four persons. The ght hon. Gentleman and his Department think it is too much and have browaten the county council into taking it ay. Here is a man and wife and two ildren who are to maintain themselves 14s. 7d. per week. There is no reason, mmon sense or fair play, in an adminration of that character. Here is another case, a man and wife with three dependent children, two girls, one of 15 years and one of 17 years, and a boy 19 years. The man himself is unemployed, and the boy's earnings are £1 9s. 3d. per week. There are deductions amounting to 15s. 4d. for rent and other things, leaving the boy 14s. 6d. to take home each week. The public assistance committee have reduced this man's benefits, which ought to be £1 9s. 3d. per week, to 16s. per week. Therefore, a man and wife with three dependent children and two girls 15 and 17 and a boy of 19 working in the pit, eight persons in all, are now told that they must exist on 30s. 6d. per week.

That sort of thing will not bear scrutiny. I need hardly give further similar cases. If we are in the position which the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggests, that there is no hope for 3,000,000 people for 10 years and if this is the sort of treatment they are to expect from a National Government in their hour of direst need, I suggest that such conditions are calculated to create communism and rebellion, to which I am the last person to look forward with equanimity; but at the same time it does suggest to decent men that they may by force get better conditions than they do by decent conduct. I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he thinks that this public assistance committee, this county council, or for that matter the Rotherham and Durham committees are doing their job as we would have them do it? Question and answer in this House have left hon. Members in a state of confusion. We do not know to whom we ought to appeal when we receive letters complaining of the methods of administration. Have we to write to the right hon. Gentleman or have we to write to the commissioner? We have reached a terrible stage if hon. Members have to write to a Commissioner, the employé of the Minister, to ascertain whether or not such methods are justified. The right hon. Gentleman told us that he gave the commissioner no instructions, he had no power, but in the next sentence he told us that the commissioner was responsible to the Minister of Labour. We want to know exactly who is responsible for this deadly work of the commissioner and to whom we may appeal when we find ourselves confronted with individual problems.

[Mr. Williams.]

I know that hon. Members are looking forward to hearing of the work schemes about which the Minister of Labour is to tell us and I will not, therefore, unduly prolong my speech. I should like to have made some observations with regard to juvenile training and educational facilities but I will conclude by asking the right hon. Gentleman to reply to three specific questions. Some local authorities have to budget for an annual expenditure and they do not know whether to estimate it at the rate of 4s. or 6s. If he can tell them, or give them a hint as to what the Government are going to do, whether the public assistance committee is to increase the rate up to 1s. and what assistance the Government is going to give; if he will enlighten them on that point then the chancellor of the exchequer of a local authority will be able to do his job more effectively. We also want to know whether Mr. Norman was speaking for the right hon. Gentleman, and that he has made up his mind that the Government are going to take no positive action to reduce the hours of labour in this country.

It is no longer an ethical or humanitarian problem, it is a great social problem. If you solve your problem of War Debts and Reparations, your currency problems, and many others, there is still the technocracy problem, the mechanical problem, which is producing unemployment daily and which must be dealt with in some way. You will have to consider how to reduce hours of work without reducing wages. You will have to share the work and increase the spending power of the working people. Instead of giving temporary educational facilities at juvenile centres we shall have to think of increasing the school leaving age. The Minister is responsible for hours of labour; and we want to know what his attitude is going to be. We want to know whether he considers the sort of administration now in progress in the West Riding justified, and if not whether he will tell the commissioner and the public assistance committee that they are too harsh with the people just as readily as he has told those people who he considered were too sympathetic towards poor miserable wretches who have been denied the right of earning their own livelihood.

4.48 p.m.

The MINISTER of LABOUR (Si Henry Betterton): Let me congratulat the hon. Member for the Don Valle
(Mr. T. Williams) on his speech and als thank him for putting down this Vot to-day. I do so for two reasons, on because I want to say something abou the work of the Department and secondly, because I am glad to have a opportunity of correcting some seriou misapprehensions under which the hon Member is labouring. If hon. Member will be good enough to listen to th answers I am going to give I think th Debate will serve a useful purpose. I regard to the work of the Departmen the House will remember that when was appointed some 18 months ago I expressed the view that the Ministry Labour was too often regarded by th public as merely a bureau for payin benefit. I feel that the constructiv work of the Department, about whic the hon. Member for Chester-le-Stree
(Mr. Lawson) is just as proud as I an is too little recognised and too littl known. The Ministry of Labour is, i some respects, in a different position any other Department. Sometimes, as result of highly controversial legislatio which is passed, it may fall to the lot the Ministry to administer the Act, an when controversial questions arise th Minister of Labour is the proper perso to bear the responsibility for such a ministration. In so far as I am co cerned, I hope hon. Members do n think that I have ever tried to shi that responsibility.

A good deal of the work of the Mi istry is not political at all and, furthe more, a good deal of it would not b possible unless we had the help and c operation of many people quite i dependent of any political consideration who by their aid and assistance mak our administration as helpful as it h been. The hon. Member for the D
Valley said one thing with which I agre
He referred, pointedly, to the sympath of the officials of the Ministry of Labo in carrying out their duties. Having r gard to the difficulties of their task, th carry out their duties with a sympath which is universally recognised, pa ticularly towards that section of the co munity which is most in need of it.

When the Ministry of Labour w formed some 14 years ago one of t

principal duties, perhaps the principal duty, of the Department, in the eyes of those who set it up, was the placing in work and the finding of jobs for those out of work. That I still regard as one of the principal duties which the Department perform, and I can assure the House that we have spared no effort to develop that side of our work. It has been the subject of a constant and sustained effort throughout the whole of the last 18 months, and I am glad to say that I do detect a growing appreciation of the value of the employment exchanges, a value which is becoming more and more obvious. In the last two years we have found places for nearly 2,000,000 cases in each year. That to me is gratifying evidence of the usefulness of the work which we are trying to do. I will give just one example of the versatility of the Ministry of Labour in placing work. Last summer we had a request from the potato growers in Jersey to find them labour with which to get in their crop. Formerly it had been done by Frenchmen. One of our officials ook in hand the duty of recruiting for his work, and I saw a report of that work when it was completed; it was a most interesting document. The experiment was a complete success; the experience of all those who went to Jersey was satisfactory and out of the 3,000 who ere found places very few failed to ake good.

I want to say a few words about the venile placing. It is, of course, a uism to say that the most impressionble age in anyone's life is at the time leaving school. I suppose that almost Members of this House through the ance of circumstances were able to ake their own choice of the calling that ey proposed to follow; but there are any who are less fortunate, and it is ose whom we want to help, if we can, this juvenile placing work. Two ings are obviously necessary if you are help a boy or girl to get a job. First all we must know something of the aracter and capability of the boy or l, and, secondly, we must know the dustrial prospects of the district in ich the boy or girl lives. Through the al committees for juvenile employment have been able to do a work of very at value in assisting boys and girls, l in partnership with the local educan authorities we have been able to place a great many boys and girls in employment.

I would take this opportunity of paying a tribute to those public-spirited persons who have helped in this matter, and who have given much of their time to the work. In addition to the local committees for juvenile employment there is a committee in London, the London Juvenile Advisory Council, and there are special committees dealing with secondary school boys and girls, set up by the Ministry in co-operation with the two Associations of Headmasters and Headmistresses, both in London and in the provinces. The hon. Member for Chester-le-Street will remember that in England and Scotland there are also two national Advisory Councils which during the last five years have made many reports on this matter, which have been of the very greatest use to the Ministry and some of which have been accepted.

I want to speak about the question of training. It will be seen in the Estimates, on page 5, that there is an increase for the training of young unemployed men, and an increase for the improved course of instruction for unemployed juveniles. With regard to both of these Estimates, clearly in these days of financial stress and difficulty it is essential that we should justify any increase of any estimate. The House will remember that the other day it was stated that the policy of the Government was to encourage works of an economic character. What work could be more economic in a period of unemployment than any effort to prevent the deterioration of those who are out of work, and particularly the deterioration of the young. Therefore I feel that that item of increased expenditure is justified to the full. It has been my endeavour to provide instructional centres in as many industrial areas as possible, and I am in a position to say that there are very few industrial areas now where such facilities have not been provided. It is estimated that during the last 12 months something like 150,000 juveniles have attended at these centres.

Another item relates to the scheme of training under the heads of "training centres" and "instructional centres." The object of the training centres is to improve the chances of employment of unemployed men who, either because of their lack of skill and experience or because their skill has lost its marketable value, have little expectation of further regular employment. These training centres provide a training for six months, and from the point of view of training they have been successful. The numbers who will pass through the nine centres will be something like 4,000 in the year. In addition there are the 11 instructional centres, through which about 9,500 will pass in the year. With regard to the instructional centres the recruitment is on a voluntary basis amongst unemployed men in the depressed areas. The response of the volunteers has been extremely satisfactory. I have visited many of the centres myself and have found that they are really doing a useful work. Therefore, this increased grant is justified on every ground, both social and economic. With regard to the training centres our policy has been not to take more men than those for who we can reasonably expect to find jobs. A very large proportion indeed—I think it is something like 90 per cent.—of those who have passed through the training centres have been found jobs. With regard to the instructional centres, their work is regarded as reconditioning, without the practical certainty of a job being found.

Mr. ANEURIN BEVAN: Has any attempt at all been made to follow up the history of the lads who have been placed in these jobs? A figure can sometimes falsify the whole of the facts. Is it the case that the boys get into jobs and almost immediately are out again?

Sir H. BETTERTON: We have in fact had samples taken, which show the subsequent history of those who have been through the training centres. I have not the detailed information here, but I know that these samples, speaking broadly, justify the view I have just expressed, that this work ought to be carried on, and that it is serving a useful purpose in the country. Therefore, I have no hesitation in commending it to the House.

Mr. KIRKWOOD: Will the Minister say whether it is the case that young men who refuse to go to these training centres are cut off from the Employment Exchanges?

Sir H. BETTERTON: In one of th recent Acts, I think it is the Act of 192
there is a provision which enables th Ministry to say that unless they go these centres they will be cut off. It is fact, so I am informed, that th volunteers are sufficient to fill th centres, and in practice that Act has bee applied very little in this respect.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Only in certa places.

Sir H. BETTERTON: I am statin broadly what is the position.

Mr. KIRKWOOD: In the case of m young men, for instance, in Dumbarto and Clydebank, I want to know wheth
it is the case that those who have r fused to go to the training centres hav been cut off.

Sir H. BETTERTON: I have told th
hon. Gentleman what the law is. Th law does give that power to the Ministe
The numbers of those who have actual been so cut off I could not state withou notice. Another question with which want to deal is that of training fo women. The amount of the Estimate £81,000. The training for unemploye girls and women is carried on by th
Central Committee for Women's Trainin and Employment, on behalf of an financed by grants from the Ministry Labour. In the last 10 years or so some thing like 60,000 women have passe through these centres. The work of th central committee I personally hav followed very closely. We have two type of centres, one residential and one non residential. There are 26 non-residentia centres, and about 2,700 women a trained during the year. There are seve residential centres, and there are 1,70 trainees admitted annually. I have mad inquiries in order to ascertain wheth the expenditure is justified. I visite some of the centres and made person inquiries. I am satisfied that this is charge which I am justified in asking th House to meet. About 80 per cent.
those who have passed through th centres have been settled satisfactoril in their occupations.

One other item to which I must refe is the grant for assisting the voluntar provision of occupation for unemploye persons. I say quite definitely, wit regard to this voluntary work that i eing done up and down the country, that have not claimed, and do not intend o claim, the slightest political credit for . I regard it as a work done by people ho want to help their fellows and I do ot suggest that it should be, or that it being, regarded by me as a substitute r something which the Opposition think e ought to do, but which we have left ndone. I wish to make it clear that the emendous success of the voluntary fort is the result of work for which I, ersonally, at any rate, claim no political dos. It is quite obvious to everybody ho has been reading the papers and atching what has been going on roughout the country that there has en a very remarkable movement in the st year even in the past few months nong a large number of people who are ncerely anxious to help if they can in me way or other those who are unfornately unemployed.

I need not go into the activities of rious bodies in this connection. They e well known to hon. Members of this ouse but work of some kind has been rted in approximately 500 areas and at work covers at the present time out 150,000 persons. When there was increase in this work it became clear at there was considerable need for a ntral body to collect information and nerally to guide and assist voluntary ort. The Government accordingly ided to recognise the National Council Social Service as the body which uld most appropriately undertake this rk and they have made a grant for purpose to the National Council. terms upon which that grant is made y be described, roughly, as pound for nd within a limit, that is to say the ount given by the Government is ed to, pound for pound, from the anisation.

r. BATEY: Will the Minister tell us he proposes to make it £25,000 next r?

ir H. BETTERTON: About £7,000 or 00 of the £25,000 will be devoted to sting the National Council of Social vice in what we may call its adminisive work—in other words, in enabling o assist voluntary organisations, as nstance by preventing mistakes made ne place from being repeated in anr, and in enabling it to collectination and, in general as I have said to guide and assist voluntary effort. It is proposed to grant £15,000 of that sum to enable the Council to provide assistance in promoting, in areas suffering from severe and prolonged unemployment, schemes of occupation for unemployed persons, either directly or through the organisation of national or regional bodies which they may invite to act on their behalf.

Mr. LAWSON: Are these the schemes that the Prime Minister said that the right hon. Gentleman was to describe?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I have the Prime Minister's answer here. The right hon. Gentleman, I find, said:

> "I have already explained the policy of the Government in regard to the provision of employment."

What I am sure he had in mind there was the whole question of relief work which I certainly am not going to deal with to-day. Then he went on:

> "As regards the alleviation of the condition of the unemployed, I would ask the hon. Member to await the statement which will be made."

That is the statement to be made by me. What the right hon. Gentleman had in mind I have no doubt was the general work of training and placing which I am dealing with to-day.

Mr. LAWSON: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman again but if he will look at the question which was put to the Prime Minister he will see that it asked the right hon. Gentleman to lay before the House a White Paper giving full details of the schemes for the alleviation of unemployment which the Government have now under consideration. The Prime Minister in reply said that the Minister of Labour was going to give us those schemes.

Sir H. BETTERTON: I think the hon. Member has entirely misunderstood the Prime Minister's answer. At any rate I am not going to repeat in the Debate to-day what he and I have said on many other occasions, namely, that with regard to these relief schemes we think they would be worse than useless.

Mr. BATEY: I hope the Minister will excuse me for intervening again but this is an important matter. Several supplementary questions were put to the Prime Minister and, in answer to the supplementary questions, the Prime Minister said very distinctly that if we waited we would hear the schemes of employment for the purpose of relieving distress announced by the Minister of Labour. I hope that the Minister is going to give us that information.

[Mr. Batey.]

Sir H. BETTERTON: The hon. Member knows as well as I do that what the Prime Minister had in mind and what he understood this Question to mean—[HON. MEMBERS: "No!"]—obviously was the question of relief schemes—a matter which has been discussed over and over again in this House and which I certainly am not going to discuss today, if for no other reason than that it would be out of order to do so because it would need legislation.

Mr. BATEY: Are we to understand then that the Minister of Labour is not going to carry out the promise of the Prime Minister to give us information about these schemes. In that case I think we are entitled to move the Adjournment of the House, and if you, Mr. Deputy-Speaker, will accept such a Motion, I am prepared to move, "That this House do now adjourn," in order to give the Prime Minister an opportunity of attending and telling the House what he did mean this afternoon.

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER (Sir Dennis Herbert): This is not the proper time to move that Motion. The hon. Member ought to have done so at the conclusion of Questions. I am afraid I could not accept that Motion now.

Mr. LAWSON: On a point of Order. I think it will be within the memory of hon. Members who were present at Question Time that this was a very explicit question addressed to the Prime Minister and placed on the Paper. It was not a mere general question. It asked for a White Paper giving details of the schemes for the alleviation of unemployment which the Government have now under consideration. The Prime Minister did not give a general answer, but stated very definitely that the Minister o Labour in this Debate would give a clea answer on the question. It appeared t us therefore that the Minister of Labou was going to make a statement of ver important Government policy here thi afternoon. I intervened previousl because when the right hon. Gentle man began telling the House about th schemes run by voluntary organisation dealing with a handful of people, I bega to think that those were the scheme which he was going to tell us abou rather than the schemes alluded to in th question. I submit that there is groun for moving the Adjournment. If th right hon. Gentleman opposite is righ the Prime Minister has not only misle the House but has knowingly misled th House.

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER: I was n quite sure what kind of Motion the ho Member for Spennymoor (Mr. Batey) ha in mind when he raised the point. thought he desired leave to move th Adjournment in order to discuss a pa ticular matter under Standing Order 1 In that case the proper time to ha asked for leave would have been at th conclusion of Questions. But it is op to any hon. Member to move, if the Cha accepts the Motion, either "That th House do now adjourn," or "That th Debate be now adjourned." That is different matter altogether.

Mr. A. BEVAN: If the Motion h been moved I beg to second it—th is, if you Mr. Deputy-Speaker accept t Motion.

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER: I have n accepted any Motion. At the mome no Motion has been put to me.

Mr. BEVAN: I beg to move, "Th the Debate be now adjourned."

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER, being of opini that the Motion was an abuse of t Rules of the House, put the Questi thereupon forthwith.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
Sir Victor Warrender and Major
George Davies.

Question again proposed, "That '£156,423,000' stand part of the Resolution."

5.22 p.m.

Mr. LANSBURY: I want to ask your guidance, Mr. Deputy-Speaker. As you are aware, a question has been raised concerning the Prime Minister's statement this afternoon in reply to Question No. 46, put by my hon. Friend the Member for Spennymoor (Mr. Batey), asking that "a White Paper giving full details of the schemes for the alleviation of unemployment which the Government have now under consideration" should be published. The Prime Minister made the quite definite reply that the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Labour would put before the House this evening those schemes—that that would be part of his statement. We now know from the Minister that he has no such statement to make. The Prime Minister is not here, and I respectfully ask you, Sir, what steps the Opposition can take to bring the Prime Minister to his place here to explain the position. We think you will agree, Mr. Deputy-Speaker, that the word of the Prime Minister in these matters ought to be sacred and that there ought not to be any question as to misleading the House or anything of that kind. We are not wanting to make those charges, but what the Prime Minister said is within our recollection quite definitely, and we put it to you, as Deputy-Speaker, that you should, if possible, advise us what we can do in order to protect the rights of the minority in this House and also to give the Prime Minister the opportunity of defending his own honour in this matter.

5.25 p.m.

Sir H. BETTERTON: In my submission to you, Mr. Deputy-Speaker, this appeal made by the other side completely misinterprets both what the Prime Minister obviously meant and what he said—[HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] Well, with the permission of the House, I will state what he did say:

"Mr. BATEY: Are we to understand from that reply that the Minister of Labour is going to tell us what schemes the Government are considering?

The PRIME MINISTER: I would ask my hon. Friend to wait and see."

Mr. LANSBURY: No, before that.

Sir H. BETTERTON: I will continue:

"Mr. BATEY: May I not invite the Prime Minister to tell us what schemes the Government are considering for the purpose of alleviating unemployment?

The PRIME MINISTER: Yes. That will be most appropriate to the discussion which we are having to-day."

HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Sir H. BETTERTON: May I say, in answer to that, two things? The first is that that policy which I have already elaborated is the policy for alleviating unemployment and, secondly, that such schemes and such a policy as hon. and right hon. Members may have in mind would be in any case out of order in this discussion, because they would need legislation. Therefore, I am confining myself quite strictly to the answer which the Prime Minister gave, and in my submission it is perfectly clear that I am carrying out the answer which he gave. If, as hon. Members seem to think, this was to be the occasion for again re-discussing and re-debating the whole question of relief works, I can assure hon. Members that that was neither in the Prime Minister's mind, nor is it my intention.

5.27 p.m.

Mr. LANSBURY: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman has no intention of miseading the House, but he has only given a portion of the reply, because he has not read the original answer. [Interruption.] The hon. Member opposite is very fond of interrupting, and it is quite unworthy of him or of any other Member of the House. I am putting a perfectly clear question to Mr. Deputy-Speaker. I am asking that the answer o the original question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Spennymoor hould be given. The question put to the Prime Minister was:

> " If he will lay before this House a White Paper giving full details of the chemes for the alleviation of unemployment which the Government have now under consideration."

He was referred to the right hon. Gentleman's statement to-night for an answer to that question, and it is really ust getting round and begging the whole uestion to take up the attitude that the ght hon. Gentleman has now taken. Everybody at Question Time took the Prime Minister's answer to mean that he Minister of Labour would tell us hat schemes the Government were proposing.

29 p.m.

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition asked me, so far as I am concerned, what steps he could take to bring he Prime Minister here to answer certain uestions which would be put to him. I think the right hon. Gentleman will ow that I have no power to assist him that matter. If he wishes to address special question to the Prime Minister, if he wishes the Prime Minister's esence in the House on any particular casion, no doubt he will communicate ut to the Prime Minister in the ordin- way, and I have no doubt it will be alt with as far as possible. I do not e that any question arises now where e Chair can assist the Opposition. ey have made their protest by moving e Adjournment of the Debate, and I not think there is anything further at they can do.

0 p.m.

Mr. LANSBURY: I am much obliged you for your courtesy in considering question, and we understand the diffi- ty. The point is that this is a case so eptional, where the Prime Minister promised the House——[HON. MEMBERS: " No! "] We are content to base our case on the Prime Minister's answer to the question and even on the answers that the right hon. Gentleman has read. The intention of the Prime Minister was that the right hon. Gentleman should answer the question. We, of course, cannot force the Prime Minister to act as a Prime Minister should, and defend his own action. We can only emphatically protest against this gross travesty of a Prime Minister's duty.

Sir H. BETTERTON: After that interlude, I may perhaps be allowed to resume my speech. I want to come to the first point raised by the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. T. Williams).

5.31 p.m.

Mr. A. BEVAN: I want to raise a point of Order for your guidance, Mr. Deputy-Speaker, as to the course of this Debate. The right hon. Gentleman has just left that portion of his speech in which he was dealing with a grant of money from public funds to various charitable organisations, and he intimated that he did not intend to accept responsibility for the administration of those organisations or any political kudos which might accrue from whatever they might do. May I ask you, Sir, in what way this House is to retain control over the expenditure of public money if the Vote from which the payment is being made is not to be the occasion upon which the administration is to be questioned? We understand that last year the maximum amount was £10,000. This year it has been increased to £25,000. This is not a definite lump sum, for the amount which the Exchequer will give will be determined by the contribution made by private persons, so that it is indeterminate up to a maximum of £25,000. Are we entitled in this Debate to bring the administration of those societies which receive these grants of public money under review in this Debate, and, if not, on what Vote are we to have those discussions?

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER: I do not think that there is anything in what the hon. Member says which calls for a Ruling from the Chair. It appears to me that all those matters which have been the subject of discussion in the last few minutes are matters of debate. It is not a matter on which I am called upon to give any particular Ruling.

Mr. BEVAN: Are we entitled to expand the scope of the Debate so as to bring under review the acts of omission or commission of the organisations receiving this money?

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER: That is a point of Order which should be dealt with when it arises. If and so far as grants have been made to particular bodies simply as grants under arrangements which do not impose on the recipient the obligation to submit their methods of dealing with those grants to this House, it is not a matter which can be discussed here in the same way as a Vote.

Sir H. BETTERTON: After that second interlude, which had no more in it than the first, I will resume my speech. The hon. Member for Don Valley raised the question of the Government's attitude with regard to the proceedings at Geneva in relation to the 40-hour week, and he criticised the Government on two grounds. The first was apparently that they did not agree to pass legislation before there had been an adequate examination of the subject. His second ground was that the Government had insisted on the necessity of proper examination of the facts before giving their support to the proposal for an immediate international convention. This question of a 40-hour week and the discussions on it are not new. The Trades Union Congress in 1931, and again in 1932, passed a resolution calling for a reduction of weekly hours of work to 40 without a reduction of earnings. The General Council set up a special committee to investigate the application of the principle of the 40-hour week in industry. The committee issued a questionnaire to all the affiliated unions asking for information regarding the method of applying the 40-hour week, the existing hours of labour, the probable effects of the 40-hour week upon wages and costs, and other relevant considerations. It is perfectly obvious that the General Council took a very wise and necessary course realising, as they do, that that information is necessary for their own guidance. It is curious, therefore, that the Government should be criticised for insisting on this information before they themselves frame a policy.

I ask, do hon. Members opposite want propaganda and politics, or do they want business? If this is going to be made merely a question of political propaganda, then, indeed, it will be pretty hopeless. I fully recognise that all means by which employment in industry can be increased requires the most careful consideration in association with responsible industrial organisations, and although this particular aspect of it has been isolated, the necessity for a proper examination still exists. I have therefore asked the Trades Union Congress and the National Confederation of Employers' Organisations to meet me in order to discuss this matter and the methods by which the absorption of workers into industry may be examined in a practical manner. To commit yourself to a convention without knowing beforehand what will be the inevitable reactions of such a convention, and without knowing the consequences upon wage agreements and the like, would be absolute folly. So far the overseas countries have not been able to supply information to the International Labour Office. In view of the serious effect of the competition of Eastern countries on such industries as cotton, it is unthinkable that this country should be willing to agree to a form of international regulation which left those countries out of account. What I have just stated is entirely consistent with the attitude of my representative at Geneva. What he said was this, and I am going to repeat the statement which the hon. Gentleman has already read:

> "The British Government delegate stated that his Government considered that the question of the compulsory limitation of the hours of work to 40 a week had not yet been sufficiently examined to warrant a definite conclusion being reached, and that therefore his Government were opposed to proceeding at the present time with the project of a draft convention. He pressed for a comprehensive inquiry into the whole question before any definite action was taken."

I say again that to proceed on a matter of this enormous importance without making ourselves fully acquainted with what the consequences would be, and without knowing all the facts so far as we can ascertain them, would be the height of folly; and it would be doing exactly what the Trades Union Congress is wise enough not to do. I hope that hose interested in the matter will meet ne. The Trades Union Congress have ccepted my invitation.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Are we to undertand that at long last in 1933 the Govrnment have made up their mind to xamine this problem, and that they are eally seriously trying to do something ositive in place of the negative position hey have taken up for so long?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The hon. Gentlean must not use the word "negative." he policy of the Government is exactly hat I have said. It is not to commit emselves to a convention until they now what that convention is and what s effect would be if it were ratified.

The next point to which the hon. entleman referred was the administraion of the means test in the Don and other Valleys. His charge was that the ounty council of the West Riding had ade regulations at my instigation and at what was going on in the Don and other Valleys was satisfactory. The osition is this. There is a guardians mmittee of the county council in both e Don Valley and the Rother Valley. oth those committees were, prior to the cidents to which I have referred, exersing their duties in a manner inconstent with the Order-in-Council. As I ve said before in the House, that Order an Act of Parliament for which the ouse is responsible. Hon. Members ay not like it, but the position in which am as Minister of Labour is that the sponsibility of carrying out my duties imposed on me clearly by that Order, d I should be false to my position and ould not carry out the responsibility ich has been thrown upon me unless saw to it that the law passed by this use was carried out. Let me state w these two committees were carrying t their duties in a manner inconsistent h the Order-in-Council which was ssed in this House. They disobeyed Order because quite clearly they made differentiation of treatment between se in receipt of relief and those in eipt of transitional payment. The use will remember what the Order-in-uncil said:

> A committee or sub-committee in demining any question under the last preing paragraph (paragraph 1 of the Order) ll make such inquiries and otherwise deal h the case as if they were estimating the need of unemployed able-bodied persons who had applied for public assistance."

Mr. LANSBURY: Boards of guardians and public assistance committees had a very wide margin of discretion. The assistance given differed in various places, and the only person who interfered was the auditor of the accounts; but now the right hon. Gentleman interferes in the matter, and has really taken on himself to decide what is and what is not sufficient for an applicant. Under the Poor Law the guardians decided it, and the Minister of Health always said that he could not interfere, and the only person who had control, a very full control, was the Poor Law auditor. Now the Minister of Labour usurps that position —or he and the Minister of Health.

Sir H. BETTERTON: Let us see how far that is so. Quite obviously that clause in the Order was inserted because the local authorities were spending Exchequer money and not money raised from their rates, and there had to be some check and safeguard in respect of the Exchequer money. On 3rd November reports were received from the general inspector of the Ministry of Health saying that in the Don and Rother Valleys effect was being given to determinations which could not be justified by reference to the authority's public assistance practice. I will give illustrations of the decisions made. I have a good many cases, but I do not wish to take up too much time in dealing with them. Here is the case of a single man with a father and mother and two brothers. The amount coming into the house was £6 0s. 10d. and he was allowed 13s. a week by the committee. The right hon. Gentleman had a very long experience of administration by local authorities. May I remind him that in his own Government the right hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Greenwood), when he was Minister of Health, felt so strongly on this question of the family income that he issued a Circular on 3rd January, 1930, in which he said that certain specific points had been called to his attention and that he desired to offer his observations for the guidance of boards of guardians.

Mr. LAWSON: What were the points?

Sir H. BETTERTON: This is guidance which he offered to the boards of guardians.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether this was issued confidentially to boards of guardians or was a public document? In view of the fact that it may raise urgent matters, will the right hon. Gentleman make it available to Members of the House? When a Minister quotes a document it is the general custom to make it available to the House.

Sir H. BETTERTON: This document has nothing on it about its being confidential. It is Circular 1069, dated 3rd January, 1930, from the Minister of Health. There is nothing secret about it.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I take it that it will be available for any Member who wishes to see it? In Scotland we do not always follow these Circulars, because we have a different Ministry there.

Sir H. BETTERTON: I have no doubt at all that it is available for anybody. This is what the right hon. Gentleman says in that Circular:

"In assessing the amount of relief to be afforded the general principle is that income and means from every source available to the household must be taken into account."

Mr. LAWSON: That was the law.

Sir H. BETTERTON: Under the Order-in-Council, also, the law is that in assessing transitional payments they must assess them, as I have already explained, as if they were dealing with able-bodied persons applying for public assistance. Therefore, it is perfectly clear that in this case and many others from the Rother and Don Valleys which I have before me there had been infringements of the statutory duty of the authority.

Mr. LANSBURY: Not necessarily.

Sir H. BETTERTON: We pointed out to the appropriate authority, the county council, what was happening. The county council drew up a scale which was binding upon all their guardians committees, including those in the Rother and Don Valleys. I had no voice in those scales at all, and I have not interfered. I understand that the scales do not differ substantially from those in operation under public assistance authorities over a large part of the country. Therefore, with regard to the points raised by the hon. Member in the Rother and Don Valleys cases, I say that my duty to this House was absolutely clear. I could do no other thing than take note of the matter. The other case about which I want to say something is, the House will be surprised to hear, the case of Rotherham.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman but before he leaves the West Riding I would like to ask whether, if he has any experience of the scale they are now applying, he agrees that that scale is consistent with what he regards as the spirit of the Order-in-Council?

Sir H. BETTERTON: What I have said was that I understand those scales do not substantially differ from those in operation by public assistance authorities over a large part of the country.

Mr. LUNN: May I intervene? Are not those scales a change, absolutely, from what was the position previously under all the guardians' committees in the West Riding; and have not the guardians' committees been placed in the position that they have no power whatever except to grant what has been laid down by the county council through the Ministry of Labour and the Ministry of Health?

Sir H. BETTERTON: Frankly, I cannot answer the first part of the question, because I do not know. The answer to the last part of the question is that the county council are responsible for the scale. As I have said, I had nothing to do with drawing it up, nor have I made any representations about it. It is really a matter for the county council. As I said before I was interrupted, I would like to say a word or two about Rotherham. Very soon after the coming into force of the Order of 1931 we had reports from the Ministry of Health that the administration in Rotherham was not in accordance with the law passed by this House. Before the introduction of transitional payments there was no definite scale at Rotherham at all, but when this Order was passed a scale was drawn up for both public assistance and transitional payments. I gather that it was within the law; it made no difference between transitional payments and public assistance.

Quite soon, January, 1932, to be exact, a report revealed that in practice there was a wide difference in administration s between public assistance cases and ransitional payment cases. I will give n example. A single man, aged 25, pplied for public assistance. I would emind the House that if he got it it would be paid out of the rates. He was ving with his father, who was unem- loyed, his mother and his sister. The otal income of the household was 47s. 3d. week. He was granted 7s. 6d. relief. he sum of 7s. 6d. was regarded as roper relief when the money was coming ut of the rates, but let the House bserve the difference in the attitude of e authorities at Rotherham when they ere dealing with a transitional pay- ents case—where the family was sub- antially the same—in which the money me out of the Exchequer. In this se a single man, aged 31, was living ith his father and mother and two rothers, with a household income of 10s. 6d. a week, and he received the ll determination of 15s. 3d. I ask hon. d right hon. Gentlemen "How could responsible to this House for the ministration of this Order, allow that scrimination between relief and transi- nal payments?"

Mr. A. BEVAN: How many were in the use?

Sir H. BETTERTON: The number was actically the same in both cases. In public assistance case there was a gle man living with his father and his ther and his sister. In the transitional yments case there was a man, his her, his mother and his two brothers. ere was one more in the household in s latter case.

Mr. BEVAN: Adults?

Sir H. BETTERTON: Yes.

Mr. BEVAN: Ah, adults.

Sir H. BETTERTON: The difference allowance where the income was 6d. and the money came out of the s and where the income was 10s. 6d. and the money would come n the Exchequer was, of course, oosterous. I will take another case. ingle man, aged 27, was living with father, two brothers and a house- per. The total family income was s. 8d. He received 10s. as public stance—from the rates. In a transi- al payments case a single man, aged 20, living with his father, mother and two brothers, with a family income of £7 a week, received the full determination of 12s. 6d.

Another class of case concerns grants out of public money, not out of the rates, where an applicant had really substantial means of his own. I agree that those cases are much more common where a transitional payment is sought, because, obviously, there is less likelihood of a man having means of his own seeking public assistance. A single man, living with a brother in receipt of 15s. 3d. unemployment benefit, had £530 in the bank and £50 on loan and received a full determination of 15s. 3d. Another applicant, a married man whose wife was in receipt of an old age pension, had £950 in the savings bank, and was given out of the Exchequer money a determination of 10s. These cases having been brought to my notice, it was impossible to allow them to pass by without some effort on my part to secure that the law was obeyed. What happened was this. Representations were made in March, 1932, and the authority was warned that its administration was not in accordance with the law. Then they agreed to a scale—this is very important—in consultation with the Ministry of Health, and that scale was adopted by the Council on 2nd August. That scale was no sooner agreed to by the Council than it was most flagrantly broken.

Here, again, I have a number of cases showing that determinations were made, in one case where there was an income of £7 17s. 2d. coming into a house, and in another case where there was an income of £6 9s. 10d. The Commissioner now at Rotherham has adopted the scale which was actually agreed by the Rotherham authority after consultation with the Ministry of Health in August last, and therefore there is no ground for saying that the scale which he adopted is unreasonable because it is, in fact, the very scale which was adopted by the Rotherham authority.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Will the Minister tell us how the scale compares with the scale paid to those who do not come on that benefit and who are on what we call able-bodied relief?

Sir H. BETTERTON: I have not the scales before me, so I cannot say. I think that it is just as well that these facts should be stated. I have attempted to put them without undue heat or prejudice, and they ought to be known both inside and outside this House. I have already taken up a great deal of the time of the House and I am only just going to say a word or two more in conclusion. I have now ascertained the figure which was asked for by the hon. Member for Gorbals (Mr. Buchanan). I am told that the public assistance authority in Rotherham are applying the same scale as the Commissioner.

Mr. LANSBURY: The right hon. Gentleman will admit that all public assistance committees, like the old boards of guardians, administer relief subject to the auditor, who has tremendous powers of surcharging them.

Sir H. BETTERTON: The answer that I have given was in reply to the question put by the hon. Member for Gorbals.

Mr. LANSBURY: They are not free to give what they like.

Sir H. BETTERTON: I want to say a word about the figures which were given by the hon. Member for Don Valley in regard to unemployment. I must confess that I did not follow his argument. What I want to point out is that nobody pretends that the register is not at a terribly high level, and it is not to be thought for a moment that I am complacent as to the position. Nothing is further from my intention and nothing is further from the impression that I want to give, but while not being complacent, I have a right to make comparisons. Comparisons do not necessarily follow complacency. I will mention one comparison. The last figures which this country had of the state of the Register were those for January last. In February last year there was a decrease on the January figures of 27,000. That was the first time for three or four years that there had been a decrease in the figures for the month of February.

In 1931 there was an increase in the month of February as compared with January of 23,000. In February, 1930, there was an increase of 51,000. In 1929 there was an increase of 32,000. Last year, for the first time, there was a decrease in the figures for the month of February. I do not know what the figures for February this year will be because they are not yet verified and collated, but I can state, without being too optimistic, that I shall be disappointed if there is not a further decrease in the figures over January. Should that turn out to be so, it will be observed that there will be a decrease in the figures for the month of February, while in the years 1929, 1930 and 1931 there was an increase. I do not mean from that that we are justified in building high or extravagant hopes, but it is an indication that the progressive increase has been checked, and I am sure that hon. Members opposite will be just as glad of that as I shall be if that should turn out to be permanent.

Mr. LAWSON: Do I take it that the Minister means that the figures that he has already assembled justify him in expecting a reduction in the figures for the month of February?

Sir H. BETTERTON: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: I asked the right hon. Gentleman that question because he will remember that only a month or two ago there was sent out what seemed to be a semi-official statement which led everyone to believe that there was going to be a reduction, whereas there was an increase. We can only hope that the right hon. Gentleman is right.

Sir H. BETTERTON: I am glad to be able to assure the hon. Gentleman that I had nothing whatever to do with the semi-official statement. The hon. Gentleman has been at the Ministry of Labour, and he knows exactly what I mean when I say that the preliminary figures that I have justify me in expecting that there will be further decrease in February over the figures of January. I have dealt, I hope, with the points that have been raised, and I must apologise to the House for taking up so large an amount of its time.

6.8 p.m.

Mr. DOBBIE: As a newcomer, I would crave the indulgence of the House for intervening in what is to me a very important Debate. I have come from a centre and from a constituency where the ruling questions that were paramount during the election were the means test and unemployment. I am staggered at the complacency with which hon. Members talk about those great problems and their effect upon the struggling men d women of the country. I have heard atements here in relation to Rother- m. At Rotherham during the elec- on, in the midst of snow storms, I saw omen with boots that were a travesty d a tragedy; and men who were going out in clothes that were a disgrace our civilisation. When one remembers at those were men and women who, like were made in the image of God, with e same God-given right to live decently any of us here, one is staggered and azed at the complacency, the cool- ss and the coldness with which this blem is discussed in this Assembly.

Vhen Rotherham had been referred I wondered whether the Minister took o consideration the name of the com- ssioner whom he sent down to replace public assistance committee. They him Basham, and he has done it, a way one would hardly believe one man being capable of perpetrating at, in my opinion, is injustice upon ers. I have known not one but many es in Rotherham where homes have n broken up because of the applica- of the means test by the commis- ner. Over 400 cases have been re- ed, and over 1,100 cases have had the efit cut down considerably. There are dreds of citizens in Rotherham to-day ng in fear and dread of the commis- ner.

y election was fought and won on test question of the abolition of the ns test, the right to work and the t to maintenance without the Poor taint. The result of Rotherham, as was the case with Wakefield and lnesbury, is a warning to the Gov- nent. It is a definite challenge to Government of the day in regard to treatment of the unemployed in this try. That has been verified not by herham alone, but by the scores of grams that I have received, yester- and to-day, from industrial con- encies, wishing that they had the opportunity to give their verdict he conduct of the Government and reatment of the unemployed. I ask Minister to review the situation. I the Government to recall the com- ioner and to reinstate the public tance committee with full power to heir work in a proper and humane ner.

The election at Rotherham was fought, as I have said, on the question of the abolition of the means test, and no one looking at the result can misunderstand the verdict of the electorate. I make bold to say that that would be the verdict of the electorate throughout the length and breadth of this country if given their opportunity. The abolition of the means test, the right to work and the right to maintenance on a proper, decent and humane standard without Poor Law taint were the questions at the election, as were the social services and the Government's attitude to them. I hope, that as I am a new Member, you, Sir, will forgive me if I am not just correct in my designation, but I believe that the Lord President of the Council was the title of the right hon. Gentleman who yesterday said:

> "I want the House to remember that there is one method of reducing taxation, and that is by reducing it at the expense of the social services, and this Government will not do that."—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 1st March, 1933; col. 446, Vol. 275.]

I hope that that is the statement and the assurance of the Government of the day to the people of this country. I hope that the statement made by the Lord President of the Council yesterday is one that will be honoured by the Government in their conduct towards the social services during the future.

6.14 p.m.

Captain Sir WILLIAM BRASS: I should like to congratulate most heartily the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Dobbie) on the speech to which we have just listened. I am naturally sorry that we did not win Rotherham, but I was interested to hear the hon. Member after the very pleasant fight that I had with him in Clitheroe in 1929. I hope that we shall hear him on many occasions in this House. It is quite easy for anyone at the present time to fight an election especially in a constituency like Rotherham on the question of the means test. If one went to a constituency where there were vast numbers of unemployed, and asked them this question as to the means test, naturally the principle of whether there should be a test or not would be received by them in the way in which it was received at Rotherham.

I want to put a few questions and to make a few points on the administration of the means test and on the question of unemployment benefit. I would ask my right hon. Friend to consider two points. In the first place, there is no doubt that this means test, or need test, is a very sore point indeed at the present time in most industrial constituencies. Certainly it is in mine in Lancashire, and I am not at all satisfied with the present administration of the test. I realise that the Minister of Labour has gone a long way to help in the matter. By the Act which was passed not very long ago he has brought more uniformity into the question of disability pensions, workmen's compensation and savings, but still he has left out of account the all-important question of the rates of benefit which are being paid. Those rates show a lack of uniformity all over the country. I would like to quote one or two as examples. The rate of benefit for a man, his wife and three children at Manchester is 39s. At Salford it is 36s., at Warrington 34s., and in my constituency, which is in the Lancashire County Council area, it is only 29s. In the town of Darwen, which is partly in the borough of Blackburn and partly in the Lancashire County Council area, the rates actually vary from one side of the road to the other. That, I think, one cannot possibly allow.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Do the rates quoted by the hon. and gallant Gentleman include money earned?

Sir W. BRASS: No; these are the rates that are given assuming that there is no money coming into the home. They are the rates given to a man, his wife and three children—the full rates in cases in which there are no resources at all.

Mr. BUCHANAN: They are as much as 36s.?

Sir W. BRASS: Yes, that is so. I stand to be corrected, but that is the information that is given to me. I think that this lack of uniformity in the giving of benefit to people receiving transitional payments is due to the dual control. It is due to the fact that the public assistance committees have to administer two things. They have to administer the Poor Law, and they have also to administer transitional benefit, which latter does not come from the rates, but from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The result is that, where you have a county council or a county borough which gives a more generous scale as far as the Poor Law is concerned, the public assistance committee there can also give a more generous scale as far as transitional benefit is concerned. The fact is that the county councils or borough councils that have these higher rates for poor relief are able to get from the Chancellor of the Exchequer more money for their people who are unemployed and on transitiona benefit than is obtainable for people who happen to live in an area which is poorer, and unable to pay the same amount of poor relief as the richer area. That, I think, is entirely wrong. I see no reason at all why the people in my constituency should not receive just as much transitional benefit as people in any other constituency. I think they have a perfect right to receive just as much benefit as anyone living in a borough abutting on my constituency, or in any other part o the country, because that money is not raised locally; it comes from the genera taxpayers of the country. There ough to be uniformity over the whole country. I would appeal most earnestly to my righ hon. Friend to do away with this dua control, and to put the whole thing unde the Ministry of Labour, so that there may be uniformity over the whole country and we may be able to say, whether the benefit be low or high, that people are being treated properly and alike.

There is another point which I should like to raise, and that is in regard to the question of earnings. I am sure my righ hon. Friend is aware of this. I will take the Lancashire County Council area as an example. Suppose that one membe of the household—possibly a son, or daughter, or brother of the householde —is in employment, while all the rest are unemployed. In the Lancashire County Council area, in assessing the amount of transitional benefit to be paid, the public assistance committees have been instructed that the amount that is to be allowed free before the family income is to be assessed is 6s. or 25 per cent., whicheve is the less. Assuming that a man is earning £2 a week, 25 per cent. of that is 10s. and 6s. is less than 10s., so that he would be allowed free only 6s. In a borough which abuts on my constituency, the amount allowed free is one-third of the earnings. Consequently, assuming tha in this borough a man is earning £2 week, he is allowed free 13s. 4d., wherea n my constituency he would only be llowed 6s. That shows a complete lack f uniformity, and is most unfair. The esult is that in that particular borough he people are able to draw from the Chancellor of the Exchequer more money or their benefit than can be drawn in my onstituency.

With regard to the payment of unemloyment benefit, we know that employés n the greater part of industry, with cerain exceptions such as agricultural orkers and so on, have to pay premiums or unemployment benefit, and, conseuently, we expect that, when those eople become unemployed through no ult of their own, they will actually ceive unemployment benefit, because y law they have been asked to pay remiums for the benefit which they xpect to receive. I want to point out hat happened during the recent cotton spute in Lancashire. I assure the ouse that I do not wish to take any side that question at all; I have no brief ther for the employers or for the emoyés; I am merely going to point out hat has happened. In Burnley, the nstituency next to mine, where there e 16 mills, people were thrown out of ployment owing to intimidation by a owd. The mills were closed because it peared that they might be burnt down casualties might occur. The operatives o wanted to work were unable to get rk, because the mills were closed by owners. They claimed benefit, and y got benefit.

n my constituency there are 30 mills der similar conditions. The mills were sed through intimidation, the operaes claimed benefit, and it was refused them by the insurance officer, under ditions identical with those in the 16 s in Burnley, where benefit was wed. There was an appeal to the erees, and the referees allowed benefit. insurance officer then appealed her to the Umpire, and the Umpire ersed the decision of the referees and sed benefit. He did so on the ground there was a dispute between worker worker, between striker and nonker. In fact, however, that was not dispute at all. The dispute was that ertain number of people wanted to k, and a large crowd of people, who not even in the same trade, came my constituency and intimidated the workers and threatened all sorts of things, with the result that the mills were closed.

Now that the Umpire has given his decision, it is law, as though it were a decision of the House of Lords, and I cannot go into it, but I would appeal to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to put up another case to the Umpire in order to make quite certain that the rule which has been laid down is not to be interpreted in the way that it obviously will be, namely, that if you can get a sufficiently big crowd together, and get that crowd to intimidate the people and the owners of mills and workshops, you can force the people out of employment, and, although they have been compelled to pay premiums for unemployment benefit, they will not be allowed to get benefit. I think that that is a direct premium on mob law, and I would appeal to my hon. Friend to consider putting another case to the Umpire in order to see whether this decision cannot be revised. If he cannot do that, I appeal to the Minister to change the law, so that the real, genuine worker who wants to work, and who has paid premiums for unemployment benefit, shall be allowed to receive benefits when mills or workshops are closed, not owing to his fault at all, but because the owners have been compelled to close them. That is all I have to say on the subject, and I appeal most earnestly to my hon. Friend to mention this subject in replying.

6.30 p.m.

Mr. TINKER: The Debate has been rather wider than we expected when we began. First of all, we have had the victor of Rotherham bringing a message to the Commons of what the people think outside, and one expects that their message will be taken notice of by the Government. The second interesting point is in regard to the Prime Minister's statement at Question Time. I thought he was rather saying something that he could not carry out very well. I was wondering what would happen. I thought it was probable that we might be able to get something done, because the Prime Minister was quite definite in what he said. I am sorry that he has not been able to come back to face the Committee and tell us exactly what he meant when he spoke of the Minister of Labour being able to give some definite statement on a scheme for work. However, he has not come, and we are left to go on with the Vote as best we can and try to find out what is in the mind of the Government. The Minister did not make certain things clear to me. I should like to ask: What is the number of juveniles registered at the Employment Exchanges in receipt of unemployment benefit and how many are attending instruction centres—not those who have passed through, but the number attending at present? I should also like to know how many training centres there are for adults, where they are situated, and what is the method of dealing with people when they go to instructional centres away from their homes.

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY OF LABOUR (Mr. R. S. HUDSON): Is the hon. Member referring to residential or non-residential?

Mr. TINKER: When they are sent away from home, they either live in or are lodged out. I believe both systems are in operation. I should like to know what actually takes place, what payment is given, and what is the mode of lodging? I should like to know the same about girls and women and how they are dealt with? One of the main points that I want to bring forward is in regard to Circular LA 16 giving instruction to public assistance committees how to deal with certain recommendations. It says:

> "It should be noted that a pensioner in receipt of disability pension may also be drawing allowances in respect of his wife and children. The rule under the present Act applies only to the personal disability pension."

I want that point cleared up, because, when the amending Act was brought before the House, most of us thought it applied to the allowances as well as to the pension itself. The matter was never mentioned, but it was taken for granted. The Lancashire County Council is always the first to take advantage of a chance like that. I think it is the worst county council, so far as applicants are concerned, in the whole of Great Britain. I think it would be a very good place for the Department to get commissioners. It must be a good training ground for them. If ever the right hon. Gentleman is short of a commissioner, he will always get a suitable person there. They construed the Minister's letter as he intended it t be construed, that they must leave the allowances out of the question. I d not think the House of Commons ever meant that, and I should like the Minister to make clear his intentions on tha point, or is he going to bring in some amending legislation to put it right o give the House a chance to express it opinion? I should like hon. Member opposite to give their opinions on tha later on, when the Minister has replied because this is what is being don throughout the country. They are takin a lead from the Minister, which I believ he had no right to give, to disallow thes allowances.

Another point arising under the sam county council is in reference to singl young men and women. Many of ther are being treated in the matter of transitional payment in the way that th hon. Member for Clitheroe (Sir W Brass) mentioned. Where there is father working, all the means of th household are taken into consideratio Many of them in their distress, rathe than live on their parents or brothe and sisters, went into lodgings an thought that they had met the situ tion. However, the Lancashire Count Council, ever ready to help the Gover ment, set about reconsidering the cases, which had already been grante by the public assistance committees, b were subject to their review. I hav here a report from the Lancashi County Council which has gone int these matters:

> "The special sub-committee beg to repo that they have held four meetings and the decisions, which have been put into forc are as follows: Transitional payments u altered in 27 cases."

These are cases of young men and wome who have left home and gone int lodgings:

> "Transitional payments reduced in cases. Transitional payments disallowed 182 cases. Cases not reviewed in con quence of applications not being renewed 87 cases. Decisions deferred in three cases

Here is the tragic side of it:

> "It is reported that some of the sing young persons who had left homes whe the family income was adequate for suppo of all members of the household, and w have now been determined to be not need of transitional payments have appli for relief and have been offered admissi to the public assistance institution."

So we have the tragedy now of young men and women being told that they an have nothing because other members f the family are bringing in money. It s not a question of having reserve funds r anything like that, but simply of the arnings of the family. If there is one ragedy worse than another, it is that. A ountry that is driven to that state of hings deserves all the condemnation that an be applied to it. No wonder Rotheram and other places are venting their isgust and anger on the Government. Whenever a chance is given in any inustrial constituency, the Government ill not be safe in any seat with a ajority under 10,000, and no one can ay they deserve any better. It is all ery well for Members of the Government address public meetings, as the Minisr of Labour did not long ago and say: "We are the envy of the world." When oung men and women are sent to public stitutions, there is not much to be vied from my point of view.

I trust the Government will take this a warning and will bear in mind what e Lord President said yesterday, that was not going to cut down the public rvices any lower. I would advise the inister also to pay attention to transional payments. The Lord President id yesterday that for 11 years he had en battling with unemployment, and e Chancellor of the Exchequer not long o said that we should not get rid of employment for 10 years. So we are the middle of 21 years of a lean period, d at the end of that time it is expected at something may mature. If the Govnment have any hope in their policy all, any belief in what they are putting ore the House of Commons, any belief the revival of trade, they ought to try ring that period to keep those who not get work in something like decy. They are an asset of the nation, d they will remember how they were ated in a time like this. The country ill afford to be harsh with its zens at a time when there is plenty money to meet their needs. My appeal day is that, when the chance comes— hink it is here now—the Government review not only the social services all other ways of dealing with the mployment problem.

should have been very glad had it n possible to get some indication from the Government as to what line they intend to take to meet the situation. I should like to deal with the shorter working period. I see there is an amount here paid for a delegation overseas which has been sent to deal with that matter. We were told that, if other countries dealt with this matter, we were prepared to deal with it. I expected from that that our delegation at Geneva would have said it was the only way to deal with the present economic situation, and were ready to join with other Governments. The Minister has tried to explain that they have to be very careful of what they do. I should have thought that, this being the leading country of the world and the envy of all other countries, the Minister of Labour would have given instructions to the delegates acting on his behalf to give a lead to the world with regard to shorter hours. He has not done so, and to-night we on this side of the House will go into the Opposition Lobby to see how many we can get with us to show disgust at the present treatment of the unemployed.

6.46 p.m.

Mr. MANDER: I desire to associate myself with the attempt which was made a few hours ago to move the Adjournment of the House in view of the situation which had arisen. There is no doubt at all that the Prime Minister, at Question Time to-day, did, intentionally or otherwise—whether he quite realised what he was saying or not I do not know—convey the impression that the Minister of Labour was about to lay before the House an important statement of Government policy showing the schemes by which the unemployed were to be absorbed. I was rather surprised to hear him, I must say, but he did say it, and he made the statement over again in reply to supplementary questions, and I feel that the Prime Minister has let down the Minister of Labour very badly. I hope that we shall have the promised statement, if not to-day, at the earliest possible opportunity. I assume from what the Prime Minister said that there are schemes of some kind in somebody's brain in the Government which are coming out some day. We were promised them this afternoon, and I only ask that we may have them at the very first opportunity.

I desire to say a few words on the subject of the means test. I represent the town of Wolverhampton, which has just had a long controversy with the Ministry of Labour and has refused persistently and consistently up to the present time to administer the means test on the lines demanded by the Ministry of Labour. The remarkable thing about it is that Wolverhampton is a very steady and moderate town, with a Conservative majority on the town council, and on most occasions when this question has come up there has been unanimity, and in other cases a majority of all parties, including the Conservative party, voting in resistance of the demand made upon them by the Ministry of Labour. They have taken the view that the scales which they were asked to administer were so harsh and unreasonable that they, as humane and reasonable citizens, could not be asked to carry them out, and, in fact, would not carry them out. It was only when, a week or two ago, they received a definite intimation from the Minister that he was about to send a commissioner to take over their duties, that by a majority they decided, in the circumstances, that it was better to give up the struggle. I know that at the present time negotiations are proceeding, and I hope that something satisfactory will be arranged. But I am very much afraid that it will not be satisfactory from the point of view of the unemployed of Wolverhampton. To show the attitude that this Conservative majority felt obliged to take up, I will quote the resolution sent to me by the Town Clerk of Wolverhampton on 27th September last, which says:

> "I am instructed by my council to transmit to you the following resolution passed by them at their meeting yesterday.
> 'That this council, having made every endeavour to meet the wishes and instructions of the Ministry of Labour in the matter of the administration of the means test, and realising out of past experience thereof the hardships entailed upon many of the applicants for transitional benefit and the increased and increasing cost of the local Poor Law rates resulting therefrom, calls upon His Majesty's Government to take immediate steps to abolish the means test in the administration of unemployment benefit.'"

Whether they really quite meant all that, I do not know, but with two dissentients they passed the Resolution on that date asking for the total abolition of the means test in the way it was then being administered. It is an expression of revolt against the administration. I will quote two examples showing the difference in the scale between what Wolverhampton were administering and what they were asked to do by the Ministry of Labour. In the cases where there is no income, persons and their dependants, and single persons living with persons other than relatives, and single persons over 18 living with relatives, present scale 15s., Government proposed scale 10s. In the other case, cases in which members of the household are earning, ascertainment of income for man, wife and two adults, the equivalent present rate is 30s. and the Government ask for a rate of 23s. 3d. It is right to bring these facts to the attention of the House because they show a very remarkable outburst of responsible and sober opinion in a town which is not accustomed to take wild or extreme courses of any kind. [An HON. MEMBER: "They elected you."] I think it shows that the Government will have to take into serious consideration the great feeling existing throughout the country in regard to this subject, and no doubt they will be dealing with it in a Measure shortly to come before the House and to which, of course, I cannot refer to-day.

I believe that there are certain steps which even now the Government might take by administrative action to ameliorate some of the harshnesses of the present system. For instance, there is such a comparatively small matter as giving a personal hearing. People on the means test attach enormous importance to the right to maintain personal contact with those administering it, and to be able to put before the committee individually their own personal circumstances. There is no statutory right enabling a person to appear, but I suggest that in this and in other cases, the Minister, while he cannot give a definite instruction or make it mandatory, should issue a circular to the authorities pointing out that from his experience and in his judgment it was wise, sensible and a humane thing to carry out certain practices in the course of their administration. Reference has already been made to the question of a uniform scale and to publicity being given. The scale is regarded as confiential at the present time. People ave the greatest difficulty in finding out hat the scale is supposed to be, or ithin what limits there can be varia- ions. I suggest that the Minister should ive some guidance upon this matter to he different committees by way of rcular in which he should suggest rtain maximum and minimum scales nd give the committees the discretion act between those scales, and then to ublish it so that everyone might know xactly the suggestions.

There is the question of rent. The in- stigator goes round and makes inquiries to the rent which is being paid, and ou will find that, in spite of the varia- on in rent—the council houses being uch more, of course—no different allow- nce is made. They are all treated actly the same. Therefore, again I ink that a word or two from the inister might have very happy results. ere is the question of dating back. I not know whether it is possible under e present law for such a thing as extra owance to be dated back from the date birth. It is reasonable in a time such that to which I refer that if within the st fortnight application is made, it ould be allowed to date back to the date birth. At the present time it is erating very harshly in many cases be- use there seems to be no elasticity.

nother matter which causes a great l of feeling is the question of what is ss income. There, again, I suggest t some ruling ought to be given. There many who ask whether it is the whole ome which comes in, or whether there not be some allowance for things such hospital contributions, insurance of erent kinds, trade union contributions travelling allowances. Members of family may have to go away and k in a different town and have to go rain. These are deductions from in- e and yet they are treated differently ifferent places. Sometimes they are uded, and sometimes they are not. re can be no case at all for differ- ating as regards different ways reatment. The Minister could do a t deal even at the present time to gate and to moderate the undoubted rity of the system as it is now ating.

wish to ask the Parliamentary Secre- a question with regard to something which was said by the Minister just now. He referred to the success with which instructional classes for juveniles receiving unemployment benefit were being carried out. He said, I believe, that 150,000 had come under its operation during the past year, and that it had gone about as far as it could go. But that does not seem to be quite consistent with a reply which he gave me a few days ago when I asked him for a list of the places where no such courses were being carried out. I will not mention the names of any of those places, because there may be some good explanation in individual cases and I do not want to pillory them, but I would point out that there are 18 counties in which no arrangements are made. There are 14 county boroughs, 50 boroughs and 13 urban district councils where no arrangements of any kind for the training classes are in operation. While I know that the excuse given is that in some cases the number of unemployed is very small and that it would not lessen them, and that in others the juveniles are being dealt with in classes of another authority, I do not think that it can possibly explain the very large figures which I have just read out, and I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to give us some more information about the matter.

My hon. Friend who opened the Debate to-day referred to the long and sad history of the Washington Hours Convention, and naturally did not stress, perhaps, what happened between 1929 and 1931 quite as strongly as what happened between the years leading up to that time. I pointed out to him in an intervention that the Labour Government, unfortunately, did not themselves ratify, and did not even bring the Bill forward for a Second reading. The Conservative party certainly did not do it, but they did not promise that they would. The Labour Government promised that they would do it, but they did not do it.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS rose——

Mr. MANDER: My hon. Friend may be satisfied with what I am going to say. He gave two reasons. One was right, and, I think, the other was wrong. He said that they did not do it because they could not rely upon the support of the Liberal party. The Liberal party kept them in office for a short period, and we received a lot of abuse for it. I think that we were right in doing it. As far as I know, no suggestions and no requests were ever made that we should support the Second reading of the Bill. There is no doubt at all that we should have supported the Second Reading of the Bill, and it is not fair to throw upon us such a responsibility when it was due to the failure of the Government of the day. The real reason was given by my hon. Friend when he said that he did not realise until now how many Tories there were in the late Labour Government. I think that that is the real explanation; that some of them had such a reactionary tendency that they were not sufficiently keen about it.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: May I recall to the mind of the hon. Member that the statement which I made at first was that the Labour Government, or at least the Ministry of Labour at that time, did produce a Bill for the purpose of giving effect to the Washington Hours Convention. The Bill was introduced into this House, printed and made available to Members. Subsequently we learnt, rightly or wrongly, from official sources —a source no longer available to this party—that after the usual feelings had taken place they were assured that no majority could be obtained and that consequently it would be a waste of time securing a Second reading. My only reason for intervening is to absolve all those back benchers of the then Labour party, and some perhaps on the Front Benches, from any sort of blame, which I want to be transferred to where it belongs.

Mr. McGOVERN: I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman a question, because we had better have the matter cleared up now. A statement has been made in official circles that the reason for not proceeding with the Bill was because the Liberal party had definitely refused to support it. Can he tell us whether that is accurate or not?

Mr. MANDER: It is entirely untrue. There was no meeting of the Liberal party. The Chief Whip informs me that he has no knowledge of anything of the kind. I think that the statement by the Chief Whip of the Liberal party can be taken as correct. On many occasions I pressed the Labour Government to sa whether they were going to bring a Bi forward, and there was always the usua reply one gets from the Government. hope that the hon. Member will adop his own suggestion, which is the tru one, and not try to throw the respons bility on us. With regard to the attitud of the representative of the Governmen at Geneva on the 40-hour week, I regre that the Government were not repr sented there by a responsible Ministe Surely the Minister, or the Under-Secre tary, who have ably represented thi country when they have been at Geneva might have gone on that occasion. Surel the matter was of sufficient importance t this country, and the whole world. The should not have sent an official howeve competent.

From all the evidence we have, it clear that the attitude of the Gover ment on this proposed convention ha been, from the beginning, one of defini and deliberate obstruction. They hav been driven on and on until they hav got into the position that they a obliged to say they are willing to discu it, and to make inquiries and other i vestigations as to carrying it out. The have done that only because they hav been driven by the pressure of oth countries. I believe that the only su porter was Portugal, which is not great industrial country. Instead taking the lead we were waiting at th very back, and trying to delay as mu as we possibly could. In the years come—it may be a great many years the hours of work will be shortene There is not going to be enough wo to go round for everybody. The soon we get down to the study of the immen difficulties involved in this question t better it will be. It has been found th no conference can succeed unless the is sufficient technical preparation befo hand.

I am sorry the Government have alli themselves with the Employers' Associ tion, who, throughout, have taken up t attitude that they are opposed to a consideration of the 40-hour week. Th is a quite impossible situation to defer I agree that we certainly do not wa a convention to be drawn up, like many are, which will be signed and r ratified. The Government having got this point, am I sure they will stu he question carefully, so that when e finally come to a convention—it ay be some years hence—we shall be ple to sign it, and every country will e able to carry it out. I hope the nder-Secretary will bear in mind the uestion I put and not be satisfied with king the employers Federation their ews, but go directly to some of the dustries and put it to the joint indus-ial councils of representatives of em-oyers and employés, who are very osely interested in a thing of this kind. e Government, I hope, will not allow to be pushed aside by those having re-tionary and antiquated points of view.

There is a possibility of introducing, on limited scale in this country, the hour week, without reduction of wages where rationalisation is taking place, rrying with it reduction of employment. concurrently with that, the industry, employers, will arrange to reduce the urs to 40, we can maintain the same e of wages but can restrict, and limit, amount of discharges otherwise in-table. I know this matter has been, is being, considered by many indus-s in this country. It is perfectly cticable from the business point of w. I hope to see it widely extended the years to come. Such action is olly dependent upon rationalisation ing place concurrently with reduction hours. In sheltered industries some-g of that kind can be done. In pro- work it is often found that Saturday ning is an uneconomic unit.

would like to refer to a question with h the Minister dealt—the grant made ne National Council of Social Service. Under-Secretary in replying will, I be able to tell us rather more of schemes contemplated, and exactly is being done. While I quite agree any effort of that kind is merely ching the surface of a problem and ot relieve the Government of their onsibility, I do believe that through organisation most admirable work be and is being, done. I wish the rnment well in the efforts they are ng and in anything that can be done ghout the country to make the un-oyed feel they have something to py their minds and hands, instead of ling idly by. That is going to make at deal of difference to their lives. rtain places, and I may give as an example the Good Companions Club in Wolverhampton which was inaugurated by the Mayor, there are occupational centres where all sorts of activities are carried on in a voluntary spirit. These make a great difference to people who have nothing to do but sit at home or walk about the streets. To sit in rest rooms, or other places provided, has less value than the occupational centres working under this scheme. In pressing forward with that work I wish the Government every success, believing it can bring a few rays of hope to the darkest night of unemployment.

We have, unfortunately, not received to-day the proposals of the Government for dealing with unemployment, which we were led to believe at Question Time would be given to us. The Government will be judged by their failure or success in dealing with the unemployment problem. They have abundantly failed up to the present time. The situation has got worse. Their policy is an unimaginative, defeatist policy. They are prepared to accept the situation as it is and make no bold step to get out of it. If that is what they are going to do for the rest of their period of office, we shall see no more of them in the next House of Commons. For the sake of the unemployed, whose interests are above any party or the men who sit on these benches, I hope the Government will change their attitude and, instead of being a weak and feeble Government as at the present time, they will become a really constructive, able, National Government worthy of the name they do not deserve at present.

7.10 p.m.

Captain HAROLD BALFOUR: I think the speech we have just heard from the hon. Member who was elected to support the National Government is scarcely one which we can regard as really helpful and constructive. Carping criticism——

Mr. MANDER: I was elected to support the National Government as it then was, with my trusted leaders in that Government. I have no allegiance to the Government except when they are doing right. Then I wish to support them.

Captain BALFOUR: It is always easy to give support when times are good. One wants friends when up against difficulties. Then it is we know the real mettle of supporters, because they will stand up when the storm is blowing and not desert the deck and leave navigation to those on the bridge.

Mr. MANDER: You are going on the rocks.

Captain BALFOUR: If the hon. Member sights the rocks it is better to stay on deck rather than to skulk below to save his skin at the next election. We have heard from him a loud voice and shallow proposals. I would have confined that definition to the speech of the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. T. Williams). It was loud in declamation and contained little constructive criticism, but he is now allied to the hon. Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Mander) and is in the same camp. Without being like the last Socialist Administration, which was always willing to make promises, in order to take advantage of a momentary opportunity. We are endeavouring to take a long view. I am not ashamed to use the words the Government have had thrown in their faces—we are "pegging away." There are worse things than that, but it is a policy that opportunist Oppositions have not been famous for in the past.

The hon. Member for East Wolverhampton did deal with one subject, although some do not agree with the way he proposed it should be carried out. I believe there is a general body of support in the House of Commons for the idea that by some means or other, at some time, we are going to solve a great deal of our industrial troubles by a shorter working week. My friends and I support the common-sense point of view of the representative of the Government at Geneva. When the patient is ailing, and failing, then is not the time for very experimental remedies. When, with patience, we have got the world into a better way again we can seriously take an appreciation of the situation, and see whether we cannot then have the shorter working week. We have got to wait possibly one, two or three years until we have got the industrial life of this country running not in a series of jerks and crises, but running more on oiled wheels than it has been in the last few years. Then, I believe, we are going to have a solution of much of the problem by the shorter working week. We are not ready for it yet. We have a long way to go in educating the people of this country to enjoy the greater amount of leisure which will be given, and make sure tha the country is going to have nationa benefit from the increased leisure which will eventually come about when th shorter working week is introduced.

There are two particular points in the administration of the present Unemploy ment Insurance Act to which I would like to draw attention. It would be ou of order for me to make proposals which would involve legislation, but I believe that the Minister of Labour by issuing a general direction with regard to sub stitution work could help in the faire administration of the present Act. We find in every shop window, and on every hoarding, posters telling us to "Spend for employment." Many people are endeavouring to take an unemployed man for a short period of the day especially a man who has a family to support, and are trying to help such men by giving them a little extra work. The majority of these men are genera labourers—a varied category. Their hours are considered to be from 8 o'clock to 5 o'clock or 8.30 to 5.30. If a shop keeper wants to employ a man cleaning windows, or the doorstep, between 8 o'clock and 5 o'clock or between 8.3 and 5.30, and gives him 1s., he is deprived of benefit for the whole week for which he daily pays him that sum. If I like to tell that man to come after hours, afte general labourers' hours are over, he i not penalised, because he comes unde the heading of subsidiary work. I believ the Employment Exchange managers ar giving the widest possible interpretatio on this matter. By some encouragemen from the Minister in the way of a genera direction a great many men would not b penalised when they are given work a the present time, as they are bein penalised unintentionally now by thos who are trying to do them some good.

A second point is the general disco tent as regards the administration of th present Act to seasonal workers, pa ticularly those who are employed a seaside resorts in hotels, on season employment. The very word "insurance denotes a risk. The trouble with thes seasonal workers is that there is ver little risk about them, because during th ason they are virtually certain of nployment while during the off season ey are virtually certain to be unem- oyed.

Mr. HUDSON indicated dissent.

Captain BALFOUR: The Parlia- entary Secretary shakes his head. At y rate, in my area, where there are proximately 1,000 seasonal workers o have been struck off at the present ne, a very considerable percentage, up the nineties of those men and women continuous employment during the son. Equally a very high percentage them were struck off, although as sonal workers they are not employed ring the off season. They are only itled to benefit if they can show what called substantial employment during off season in two previous years. I nk that 15 stamps are usually taken indicating substantial employment. ese men and women to-day cannot w those 15 stamps. Nevertheless, y are paying all the time that they in employment, and the result is that have people paying stamps all the e compulsorily, and yet they are un- e to draw any benefit during the iod when they are unemployed. It is good the Minister telling me that y are good risks and that those are sort of risks he wants for his fund it is no comfort to these people to w that the fund is bankrupt. They not get benefit in the off season when are unemployed, which is to them main factor.

ere are two suggestions that I should to make. One is that the benefit ld be paid in relation to the actual loyment year, not on the theoretical loyment year of January to January, on an employment year beginning in case of the seasonal worker at Whit- ide and lasting until the 15th Octo- which is the season in my particular . At the present time they are not ved benefit unless they have 15 ps for the previous 12 months and tamps for the 12 months before that od, and it can safely be assumed that of these people will be unemployed ng the winter. If the employment could be altered in the way I sug- you might have to give these people wer benefit, but at any rate they d be getting something for the employment stamps that they pay at the present time. Alternatively, I hope to see one day some co-relation of the benefit to the number of stamps paid, but I cannot enter into that subject now, because it would be out of order. The alteration that I have suggested could, however, be carried out now under the present administration. I should like the Minister in his reply to deal with these two points, that of the general labourers and subsidiary work and that of the seaside seasonal workers.

Finally, although there are anomalies and difficulties in the administration I think that most of us find that the managers of the Employment Exchanges have the general confidence of the unemployed. The hon. Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Mander) made a suggestion about a greater personal touch, and I heartily agree with him on that point. It would help tremendously a great number of unemployed if the Minister would send forth a general direction that Employment Exchange managers should have two or three hours in the week set apart when they would not discuss individual cases with any particular man, but the men could go to them and ask for general guidance and knowledge about the law as it stands. All of us in our constituencies come up against cases where the man is puzzled and does not know where he stands. In such cases I take the man to the Employment Exchange manager, and I do not think that there has been a single case where, after a talk with the manager, the man has not come away, if not satisfied, at any rate clear in his mind. We owe a great debt to the administration of the Employment Exchanges. Hard as is the lot of the unemployed, there is no monopoly of consideration for them on the Labour Benches. There is consideration for them in all parts of the House. We are all trying to do our best and shall continue to do so, regardless of the taunts of the Opposition.

8.20 p.m.

Mr. McGOVERN: I have listened with interest to the speech of the Minister of Labour in regard to the application of transitional benefit, and I want to say at the outset that I, like other hon. Members, have no complaint to make of the officials of the Ministry in the area that I represent. They are discharging a difficult and thankless task in a manner becoming people who hold a very difficult position in the community. As far as my area is concerned, I think the officials almost to a man are considered white in their character as regards the application of the Act. My difficulty in approaching the subject matter to-night and the points that arise in connection with ordinary transitional benefit is in knowing exactly who is responsible for the application of the benefit to the great mass of the people of this country. When one goes to the ordinary inspector and raises points of difficulty he says: "I am not responsible. You must see the divisional supervisor." When you go to the divisional supervisor, he says: "You must go to the area supervisor." You march to the area supervisor, and he says: "I am sorry, but you will need to see the head inspector of public assistance, because I am acting on the directions that have been handed to me."

You go to the head inspector of the public assistance committee and he says: "The public assistance committee have made a decision and I cannot alter it or modify it in any way." When you approach the members of the public assistance committee, and the Labour or Independent Labour Members raise the issue, the chairman of the committee says: "I am sorry, but the Ministry of Labour are responsible for all the laws laid down here." You may then go to the manager of the local Employment Exchange to point out the difficulties, and he says: "I am sorry, but the officers in Edinburgh have handed me my instructions, and I have only to carry them out." You write to Edinburgh, and they say: "We are sorry, but it is the Minister of Labour who is responsible." You approach the Minister of Labour in the House and he says: "I am sorry, but it is the public assistance committee who are responsible." You go right round, like hobby horses on a fair ground.

One cannot approach this subject without knowing that there are difficulties thrown up at every turn and that the ordinary Member cannot get to grips with the problem. We have heard references to a promise made at Question Time today by the Prime Minister. I listened attentively to the Prime Minister, as I have done since I was 20 years of age, and I say quite frankly that if Members of the Opposition read the question and the answer, together with the supplementaries, they will, after applying their reason to those answers, come to the opinion that no one can tell what the Prime Minister did mean when he gave his answer this afternoon. I will give him the credit for this, that he can be very definite when he desires to be definite. He was very definite when he joined the National Government. He made no doubt about that. These indefinite statements that are always made by the Prime Minister are made for the purpose of refusing to get to grips with the problem that is being put up to him at the moment. Anyone who has read his books and other writings must know that he has always written in the same manner as he spoke this afternoon. He said that the Minister of Labour would throw up schemes of work this afternoon, but anyone who applies his reason to the matter knows that the Minister of Labour and no Member of the Government will throw up any schemes during their period of office that are going to be beneficial to the working classes. We have at the present time on the Front Bench relics of the stone age, who are not going to apply their minds to the problems which society is entitled to demand should be dealt with.

I am always told that a mere denunciation of the Government is the wrong way to treat the House of Commons. I do not agree with that point of view, but I am always willing to try various methods. I am not too conservative in my ideas. I like to have regard to the needs of the time, and I am going to try to get some concessions from what may be termed a hard-faced, business Government. Here is one problem that arises in the application of ordinary transitional benefit. Take the case of a family. The son is out of employment. He draws 15s. 3d. a week ordinary benefit, and goes to a home where there may be the case that is very often cited by members of the Government, where the family income is £10 a week. He pays in his 15s. 3d., or retains it, but that is not the point; he gets the benefit of his 15s. 3d. during his period of ordinary benefit. But a son who draws his ordinary benefit and pays it into a home where the father is on transitional payment has immediately deducted from him part of the ordinary benefit. Whether he is on transitional payment or ordinary benefit, there is no difference. I want to know whether the Government are prepared to deal with cases of hardship of that sort. I should like to know whether the Government are prepared to modify their instructions to the extent of giving an applicant who is drawing ordinary benefit the full benefit of his 15s. 3d. per week during the period he is drawing ordinary benefit.

I want the Parliamentary Secretary to take note of these points—I am not so much a rebel to-night as a statesman—and I want definite replies to these points because they are of interest to a number of my constituents and to the working classes throughout the country. The Glasgow Public Assistance Committee are, as I conceive it, committing an offence against the State in their application of State funds. Take the case of a boy who is excluded from the home; the father says that he is not prepared to retain him in the house because he is receiving nothing at all. He tells him that he had better get outside into a room or lodgings and get ordinary benefit. If the son or daughter is definitely excluded from the home the public assistance committee are refusing, if the income is of the bare amount which excludes him from any kind of benefit, to give a son or daughter outside the home any benefit at all. Since this policy has begun to operate we have had a considerable number of cases in the city of Glasgow where young men have been charged with house-breaking and other offences against society. I went down to the ordinary courts the other day and I found that during the week there had been over 70 cases of persons charged with housebreaking, and that a number of these were young men who had been refused benefit. The Secretary of State for Scotland and the Under-Secretary of State must know the great effect this exclusion from benefit is having upon young men and young women. I maintain that if a father or mother definitely excludes a young man or woman from the home because of the lack of any income that the Minister of Labour must see that ordinary transitional benefit is paid to them to keep them out of crime.

There is also the question of the family with a number of sons and daughters who are working out of town. I maintain that within the confines of the means test or transitional benefit that conditions might be laid down which would be absolutely fair without asking the Government to go outside the Act. There are three sons at home working, and drawing £1 per week from their employment. They may be working very near to their own door and are able to go home for their meals. They have no travelling expenses. You may have three members of a family working in an area like mine. They would have to spend 4s. per week in travelling expenses, that is 12s. less per week than the three members of a family who are living on their own doorstep. There are also other incidental expenses in the way of meals, and I suggest that it is wrong for the public assistance committee to rigidly apply the Act in this way and not give any consideration at all to home circumstances. Such an application of the Act may work unjustly in some cases, and there is no reason for making it more unjust than it was originally intended to be even by this National Government.

There are other cases. Take the case of a son in my area who is getting £3 10s. per week; his father and mother are unemployed. They are assessed at 23s. 3d. A sister 21 years of age is assessed at 10s., and another sister of 19 years of age is assessed at 10s., that is a total of £2 3s. There are three children under the age of 14 assessed at 2s. each, which makes a total charge of £2 9s. 3d. against the £3 10s. of the son. The son is 24 years of age and has been going with a young women for three or four years. He is preparing for marriage, but he is left with a margin of £1 0s. 9d. to keep himself, pay his travelling expenses, his insurance, his trade union fees, his meals and other incidental expenses. It is absolutely outrageous for the Act to be applied in such a way as to compel a boy of 24 years of age, who is perfectly willing to contribute to the upkeep of his father and mother and brothers and sisters, to contribute £2 9s. 3d., and who is definitely prevented from getting any surplus with which to furnish a house and prepare for his marriage. He is faced with the alternative of walking out of the house or of incurring tremendous debts in order to furnish a house. That is outrageous. We ought not to allow a man in one area 12s., in another area £1 and in another area 25s. We ought to have a rule applied by the Ministry of Labour or by some responsible person, and there ought to be greater elasticity than is in evidence at the moment.

Here is another case of two brothers living in the same house, but not in the same room. They pay 7s. 6d. per week for light, coal and rent to the tenant of the house, and they are treated by the public assistance committee on the same scale as husband and wife. They are paid 23s. 3d. because the Glasgow Public Assistance Committee lay it down that father and mother, brother and sister, or two brothers or two sisters, who are adults shall all be assessed and paid at the same rate as man and wife. The two brothers pay 15s. per week for rent out of their 23s. 3d., and they are left with 8s. 3d. with which to provide the ordinary essentials of life. If they have three meals each per day, or twenty-one meals each per week, at 2d. a meal, surely not an outrageous amount, considerably less than the amount which hon. Members would give as a tip to a waiter in London, 42 meals at 2d. each, is 7s. per week, which leaves these two with a balance of 1s. 3d. for insurance, clothes, boots and all the ordinary incidentals of life.

Future generations if they look back on the horrors and tragedies of the present generation will wonder at the spirit of toleration exhibited by a large number of people in this country. An hon. lady Member of this House gave an entertainment last week which I am told cost £2,000, and hon. Members of this House who were present will presently come in from the Lobbies, and from all over London, not knowing the question under discussion, and will cast their vote for the Government. The case of the two brothers is not a matter which affects a large number of people, but because of its smallness I wonder the Minister is prepared to tolerate such a policy at all. There is also another point in regard to mother and son. The son draws transitional benefit—a new dodge has been adopted here. They are beginning to eat into the ordinary Poor Law relief paid to the mother. If the son does not live in the house a woman of 68 years of age is entitled to 12s. 6d. per week, plus 2s. 6d. because she is an old age pensioner, that is 15s. per week; and 5s. for rent, a total of 20s. per week. But if the son is on transitional benefit they put him on ordinary benefit and pay 23s. 3d. to him; they pay this 23s. 3d. to maintain the mother and son. The son himself is entitled to 10s. and, therefore, the mother now gets 3s. 3d. Something like 6s. 9d. is taken off the Poor Law pay of the old person in order to maintain the son in the home.

Surely that was never the intention of this House. Surely it was never the intention that we should go to an old person of 68 years of age, who has lived a useful life and given to the nation and the locality the best she had, and say to her in her declining years that we are going to take 6s. 9d. per week out of her old age pension in order to maintain a son, which we, an incompetent Government, cannot provide with ordinary employment to carry him through life. Actions such as this are generating in this country a feeling not only of distress but of actual contempt for the ability of any Government to deal with the question. I am not going to say that the present Government have failed or that a Liberal Government would be a great deal better, or that a Labour Government would be a great deal better. They are all inclined to play the same game. The Minister of Labour quoted from a circular issued by the right hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Greenwood) when he was Minister of Health in the Labour Government. In this circular the right hon. Gentleman said:

> "In assessing the amount of relief to be applied the general principle is that income and means from every source available to the householder must be taken into account. It should, however, be remembered that when certain classes of income are concerned, such for example as disability pensions or blind pensions, the disability in respect of which the pension has been awarded may be such as to call for a greater measure of assistance than would normally be appropriate."

That means that the disability and blind pensions certainly have to be taken into consideration. Then there is the further point, which is a perfect gem.

> "Again it is proper that the earnings of widows and children should be taken into account when relief is assessed."

That is, the 2s. 6d. of the milk boy and the 2s. of the paper boy have to be taken into account, according to the instructions of the late Labour Minister when the income was being assessed. We have heard recriminations to-night. We have heard how the Liberal party were supposed to have prevented the Labour Government from carrying out the Washington 48-House Convention. The Liberal Members jumped up with indignation, and their Chief Whip, the right hon. Member for Caithness (Sir A. Sinclair) said: "I was the Chief Whip, and it is untrue that we prevented the Labour Government from passing the Convention. We were never consulted and never asked to support the Convention." I was always led to believe that the Liberal party had been a little more progressive than the Labour party, and we were rather surprised to be continuously reminded that they had prevented the Government from carrying this Bill. Liberal and Tory and Labour have all had their opportunity of modifying or abolishing unemployment, but they have made no inroad into it at all, and it has gone steadily up and up.

I remember listening to the speech of the Prime Minister when he was providing money to patch old trousers or something of that kind; £25,000 they were to give in order to carry out various schemes. After I had heard his speech about the societies that were to deal with the welfare of the country, I said to myself "My ——, is that the man who is running the destinies of the nation? Is that all he can suggest for dealing with unemployment?" An hon. Member said just now that the Government had their backs to the wall. They will be very lucky if they do not finish up with their backs to the wall and a firing squad in front of them, and I would be delighted to be the man who had charge of that firing squad. All the meannesses and the tyranny and the cunning application of the Act that are being employed are disreputable to a Government that boasts periodically of the wealth it commands and controls in the country. The Government have reached the stage of always taking the penny out of the blind man's tin in order to save those who are at the top of the social tree.

The Government are not only failing to deal humanely with the unemployed of the country, but they display neither the desire nor the capacity to deal with the unemployment problem. They are not attempting to deal with it. They are like mummies in a museum. They are like so many Micawbers waiting for something to turn up. It will turn up. A reckoning will take place. One cannot fail to see the evidence in every country of the world to-day, the grumblings and rumblings of discontented and impoverished classes who are in open revolt against a system that can go on piling up wealth and reducing to penury and starvation the large mass of the people. Quite frankly we look forward, not to a change from a Tory or Liberal Government to a Labour Government, because they have all been tried and found wanting, but to a social revolt and social revolution to clear away the debris and ruin of the present system.

7.50 p.m.

Mr. DORAN: I do not wish to identify myself in any way with the observations made by the hon. Member for Shettleston (Mr. McGovern). He has referred to a revolution in England, and I would remind him that a couple of policemen and a shower of rain will kill any revolution in this country. I want to remind the hon. Member, who is seeking to spread the fire of revolution, that he merely represents one ten-thousandth part of a very small element in this country. I have criticised the National Government and I will continue to criticise it. I have in the course of my letters to the Press challenged the Prime Minister in far more vigorous terms than hon. Members on the Opposition benches have ever dared to use.

Mr. BUCHANAN: You forget that the Prime Minister has been ill.

Mr. DORAN: At any rate I congratulate him upon the fact that he confesses that he is ill. Hon. Members opposite are ill and do not know it. I do not think that the present situation in this country lends itself to any kind of banter, or rancour in any sense of the term. I am just as well aware of the evils that prevail in this country as my hon. Friend the Member for Shettleston. I have gone through just as hard a mill as he has, and I have just as much sympathy for the downtrodden worker as he has manifested in this House to-night. But I am a supporter of the National Government. If I have criticised that Government, if I have taken the Prime Minister to task—and I have—I have done it from the purest and best of motives, in order to save the National Government and to try to lend a spur to its endeavour.

[Mr. Doran.]

This afternoon we have seen a wonderful display of red rosettes on the Opposition Benches. Hon. Members have been celebrating their victory in Rotherham, and quite rightly too. I want to pay a compliment to the victor of Rotherham, and say that this man has arrived in the House of Commons as a warning to the Government. Rotherham is a lesson to the Government, and I hope the Government will take it as such. I would rather see Rotherham lost to-day than see the entire country lost to-morrow. I hope the Government will take the hint that the public opinion of this country is changing. I am defending the National Government because I realise, as many in this House realise, that if this National Government fails it is the end of our parliamentary institutions. The people will never trust a Government again of any shape or colour. If this Government fails we are going to put Communism in the saddle, or a dictator, and Great Britain does not require either. As a friend of my country and defender of my Empire I am going to see to it that, as far as my power in this House is concerned, something will be done to justify the existence of the National Government.

I know that I might easily outline schemes to cure unemployment, as other hon. Members have done. Everyone to-day has a scheme to cure unemployment. We have midget Mussolinis, neurotic Napoleons and washed-out Wellingtons at every corner. We know that everyone to-day has a cure. We are told by people outside what we ought to do for unemployment. I might even suggest, as I have suggested, that we could fill up our obsolete canals with concrete and make a road for the carrying of heavy transport. I might suggest that we remove the slag heaps outside Newcastle and Manchester and Middlesbrough and Birmingham and Wednesbury, and fill up the terrifying gaps that we find in the Cotswolds and in Derbyshire. I might suggest that by doing this we could reclaim land equivalent to two counties in England. I might even suggest that we electrify the railways coming into London. I might even suggest that we knock off the beer duty and put the people back into work again. I might even suggest that we reduce Income Tax and thereby leave more money to be devoted to real industry. A little later on I will tell you why I do not make these suggestions.

We have seen other countries progress. We have seen the Dutch people reclaim the Zuyder Zee. They have given work to their people and they have added value to their country. I wonder if any of us has heard of that wonderful statesman Mussolini, belonging to Italy. He has rebuilt an entire nation. He has put into operation principles of reconstruction, and he has made his country one of the foremost countries in the world. I see this and many of you see it. The Prime Minister this afternoon gave a very negative answer; he was very evasive; he seemed to have no policy at all. I am willing to agree with the Opposition that he certainly let the Minister of Labour down very badly. We have heard a great deal of talk about Geneva and about Lausanne and about Palestine. I want the Prime Minister to think of London and Liverpool and Manchester. I want the right hon. Gentleman to try to forget his foreign comrades and to concentrate on the people of England. I am not concerned about any foreign countries, but I am concerned about what I have seen when I have gone through some of the districts which my hon. Friends opposite know. I have gone through the Cowcaddens and the Gallowgate districts of Glasgow. I have gone down the High Street of Edinburgh. I have gone through Ancoats in Manchester; I have gone through Aberdare and Rhondda and Rhymney, and I have seen the destitution and the misery of millions of our fellow-citizens who are just as good as we are here. I see our industries perishing, our machinery rusting and the look of hopelessness in the eyes of our working people. Is it beyond the power of our statesmen to devise a scheme that will revive national industry? Is it beyond their power to rebuild this old country which is going to disaster? When I go from Rotherham to Sheffield I find out of 121 furnaces only three working. One recalls what Goldsmith said:

> "Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey, > Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

We want men of courage, imagination, sympathy, vigour and determination to bring this country back to solid foundations and take advantage of the wonderful potentialities of the Empire which are at our beck and call. I know that I may be smiled at, but any Member of this House who dares to come forward with a new idea has to take that risk. I realise that and I care not for the risk, because I feel that the time has come for straightforward speaking. The time has come when real men have to assert themselves, party or no party, and tell the country where its salavation lies. I only hope that other Members of this House will give me some little encouragement.

I care not what kind of Government is returned—a Government may label itself "Labour" or "Conservative" or "National" but every hon. Member knows, and every one would confess it if he spoke from his heart that whoever comes here in charge of a Government is the slave of the permanent official. There is no Minister on the Front Bench; there was not one in the party opposite when they were in office, and there will not be one to-morrow, whatever kind the Government may be, who will dare to go against the advice of the permanent official in Whitehall. When the permanent official advises, the Minister follows his advice. When the Minister is handicapped in some way and wants advice he goes to the permanent official. The permanent official is not the man to risk his job. He will undertake no new adventure that is likely to imperil his position. So, he writes to the Minister and tells him that certain things are impracticable, are impossible, and the Minister in turn is without the courage to say what he thinks himself and is guided by the permanent official.

I do not care what votes the people record or what shade of politician they elect—as between the Minister who has no courage and the permanent official who will not venture to take any risks, the people of England and their destinies are crucified. If you had a Labour Government to-morrow you would be in just the same boat, and that state of things will continue until we have a sufficient number of vigorous, enterprising, fearless men in the Cabinet who will tell the permanent officials exactly where they get off. Until then you will never make one inch of progress in national policy. As things are, in four years time you will be exactly where you are to-night. I am warning the Government as a well-wisher, as one who wants to see the National Government succeed for the sake of the generations which are following us in this vale of tears.

Looking throughout the country to-day mothers may well ask themselves what hope there is for their children. They are in a channel of disappointment and despair. No hope has any father or mother for the children to-day. The ranks of industry are closed, and on the workshop gates we read "No hands need apply." Yet we are importing from foreign countries £428,000,000 worth of materials and food that we could produce at home. Are Lancashire Members who represent the cotton industry aware that Chinese and Japanese goods are being dumped into Manchester and Liverpool throwing thousands of Lancashire people out of work? [An HON. MEMBER: "Why do you not stick to Newcastle?"] I do not wish to stick to Newcastle, for the obvious reason that I represent a London constituency but I happen to know Newcastle better than some of the Newcastle Members. The man who knows London is generally a provincial and not a Londoner. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about Scotland?"] I know Glasgow very well and I may be allowed to say that the last time I had occasion to go to Glasgow I met with a serious accident. A Scotsman asked me to have a drink and I did not hear him—but that is only by the way.

Mr. BUCHANAN: So was the drink.

Mr. DORAN: I want to make this appeal to hon. Members. Never mind party, never mind any particular incident in politics. I ask the Opposition—and by that I mean the Labour party and the Liberal party and the Members of the Clydeside group—if they are concerned about the welfare of this country, why should they be content to gibe at the Government and put obstacles in the way and attempt to score political points when they know that if they were given full power they could do nothing better? Why cannot we put our heads together to do something in the way of national reconstruction; something to alleviate the terrible distress and suffering which exists throughout the country? We have the finest workpeople in the world. I play second fiddle to no one in my admiration for the British working man. He is our greatest asset. The other day I listened to a very able speech by the hon. Lady the Member for Cannock (Mrs. Ward) in regard to Empire settlement. I appreciate her outlook and I admire the thoughts which inspired that speech, but I would remind that hon. Lady that the other countries of the Empire are only willing to take our best. They will not take our worst, and as an Englishman I say that we cannot afford to part with our best.

If we are to generate prosperity in this country, if we are to revive industry and compete with the rest of the world, we must have vigorous, healthy men and women and children. It cannot be done with half-starved and weakly people. To-day one must admire the wonderful patience of our people when we see what is being suffered by men and women of the finest character. The men who made sacrifices, who went over the top: who stood for this country in the great catastrophe of 1914, deserve better treatment than the treatment which they are receiving to-day. I do not stand for any general distribution of doles. I hate the word "dole." But the time has come for the Prime Minister to lay down a vigorous, brave, far-reaching policy of reconstruction, to set our works going again, to have the smoke belching from the factory chimneys once again.

Let us first and foremost prevent this country from being any longer made a dumping ground for sweated products from all over the world. To-day in my own division I can walk round the market place and see Russian timber —manufactured, shall I say, under slave conditions—and Chinese and Japanese goods for sale while thousands of our own people are out of work. I ask the Prime Minister: is it not possible for him to come forward with a great constructive policy? I do not want to see everybody put on the roads, for I know that many men cannot do this work. If a man is a carpenter or a joiner or an electrician, you will only ruin him if you put him on to the roads, but surely out of the £130,000,000 that you are whittling away—for the last 10 years £1,000,000,000 have gone into the gutter—you can use some of that money to subsidise your smaller and semi-large manufacturers, help them to take men on at their own occupation, give them £1 for every £2 which they can provide in wages, and save it at the Employment Exchange. You can do this, and you will get a return for your money, and your men will be in their right occupation.

Again, I come back to the point that it all depends upon the permanent official. If he says "No," the Government is finished; he is the boy who has the casting vote. Did I not see it only last week, when all the minions of the British Broadcasting Corporation came down here? Did I not see them lobbying in the most disgusting fashion in this House? Did I not see their little pundits running about all over the place, and the Postmaster-General, like a monkey on a stick——

Mr. CAMPBELL: On a point of Order. Has the hon. Member any right to make remarks like that about Ministers of the Government? May I ask him to withdraw that observation?

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER (Captain Bourne): I do not think that the remark was in the best of taste, but I cannot rule it out of order as definitely unparliamentary.

Mr. DORAN: In view of your opinion, Sir, I will withdraw the statement. We have been told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that we can hope for no improvement with regard to unemployment under 10 years, or words to that effect. [HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] At any rate, I have followed his remarks, and that is the popular impression that he has caused throughout this country, and it has taken the heart and soul out of millions of our workpeople, it has cast a blight upon them, it has disheartened them, and the feeling to-day in regard to the future of this country is a very poor one. I am not a believer in optimism if that optimism is not guided by intelligent direction. I believe in intelligent direction. This National Government has the greatest responsibility that has even fallen to any Government. Not only is it the custodian of 50,000,000 people in the British Islands; it is at the same time the one receptacle of the world's liberty and peace. If this Government fails, you can say goodbye to your constitution, and to your Empire, and to all the things that you hold dear; and the man who is really a patriot, the man who has a love for his country and a veneration for its institutions, will do all that he can to inspire this Government, to give it encouragement, and, even although he may be called rude at times to tell it in plain English what it has to do.

I know that I am in a wonderful Chamber, where giants once stood. When I go back to the period of Gladstone and Disraeli, and when I recollect such great men as Redmond and Carson, I feel that those men were giants. They took chances and risks, and because they did so they made this British Empire the finest Empire the world has ever seen. Are we going to replace those giants with Lilliputians? Have we not got statesmen to-day with backbone, not wishbone? Have we not got men who can really understand the principles of the British Empire, not men who are seeking their own ends and ambitions? I am not concerned about the personal ambition of any man. I am going to speak without fear or favour, and I can only say, in conclusion, that if this National Government fails, if our national courage is destroyed, if our bauble of Empire is smashed through our incompetence and because of our lack of courage, the forgiving British people may say, "Father, forgive you, for you know not what you do."

8.21 p.m.

Mr. MAITLAND: Those of us who have listened to the last two speeches have been left with the impression that their main difference lies in the fact that the attack on the Government by the hon. Member for North Tottenham (Mr. Doran) was in the first part of his speech, whereas the attack on the Government by the hon. Member for Shettleston (Mr. McGovern) came in the second part of his speech. I was very sorry that the hon. Member for Shettleston did not give us a little more of his early promise. He started his speech by saying that he was appearing to-night, not as a rebel, but as a new statesman, and I was rather looking forward to the new method which we were going to have from the hon. Member. I do not know whether it was his proximity to his hon. Friends, but certain it was that in the latter part of his speech—and I say this very kindly —he reverted to type, and he finished what was to be a conciliatory appeal to the Government by the expression of a pious hope that he should be the leader of a firing squad to bring about their decease. The hon. Member for North Tottenham has entertained the House, and in that respect I cannot hope to follow him, nor can I hope to follow him in some of his conclusions, and certainly not in some of the condemnations which he has made of those Members of the Government whom presumably he was elected to support. Even comrades in the same party must have at times differences of opinion, and we will just leave it at that.

I was rather struck by the suggestion of the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. T. Williams) in opening this Debate, and very sorry that in opening it he got back so immediately to the effete type of Debate which we have had for so many years in this House—regrettably so, too—on the subject of unemployment. Because of what he said, I took the trouble to go to the Library and look up some particulars. I did so for one simple purpose, and that was to demonstrate the futility of such an argument as that the present Government is responsible for the present state of employment and that the present Government alone is responsible.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: I did not say that.

Mr. MAITLAND: The burden of the hon. Member's speech was to that effect; in fact, he used the phrase: "This Government has brought about great poverty and great distress." If that is not saying that the Government is responsible, I do not know what is. However, I went to the trouble to see exactly what was the record of the last Government in terms of unemployment. According to the figures given in the Unemployment Index issued by the Ministry of Labour, the percentage of unemployment in January, 1929, for Great Britain was 12½. In January, 1931, after two years of Socialistic rule, it was 22. Let us look at the figures at the end of two years of the present Government. The percentage of unemployment to-day is 23.4. If the Socialist party are going to use as an argument the fact that unemployment has gone up during the reign of the National Government, and to place the whole burden of it upon the National Government, they defeat themselves because of the figures during their period of office. May I remind the House that in Durham the unemployment figures were increased from 22.8 in 1929 to 33.6 in 1931. It is no consolation to admit that since the present Government came into office that increase has been only 7 per cent., but if we are arguing on comparisons we are entitled to say that we have beaten the Labour Government by 3 per cent. In Glamorgan we find similar figures. They are staggering and astonishing. In January, 1929, the percentage was 16.2; in January, 1931, 31.4, and in January, 1933, 40. I do not submit these figures as an answer to the Government's action in dealing with unemployment, but I say that if the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues criticise the Government on the figures we are entitled to reply with a statement of their own record.

We are entitled to assume that the hon. Gentlemen who are sitting on the Opposition Benches are serious and responsible opponents of the Government, and that they are presumably the alternative Government. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] I am glad to see that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for East Bristol (Sir S. Cripps), who is the Leader of the party at the moment, assents to that. May I, therefore, ask him this question. We have heard to-day an interesting speech from a new Member, the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Dobbie). The House is always very generous, and we are glad to welcome the new Member, and we hope that he will play his part in our deliberations. In explaining his recent election, he said that it was won because he fought upon the question of the abolition of the means test. I want to ask the hon. and learned Member for East Bristol, as a responsible Member of the Opposition, if that is the declared policy of the Labour party?

Sir STAFFORD CRIPPS: Yes.

Mr. MAITLAND: If that is the declared policy of the Labour party, what would they substitute for the means test if they were placed on the Government Benches to-morrow? It is no use saying that they would substitute a change in system and in ownership; they must deal with the position as it is to-day. I put it to the hon. and learned Gentleman that no matter what Government is in power they hold a trusteeship for the people of the country. This document which deals with the Ministry of Labour Vote is a tragic document. It represents in terms of pounds, shillings and pence indescribable suffering. The Government must be, and must take the responsibility of being, the trustee of the disposition of such funds as the nation can afford to those who are in distress. We accept that responsibility and do not apologise for the means test. It is the only equitable test which we can possibly have. How are we to find the position of a person without an inquiry? Suppose any hon. Member were asked to distribute £100 to the poorest families in his division. He would have to make inquiries as to the needs of the poorest people in order that he could distribute the money equitably. That principle applies just as forcibly to the disposition of national funds. In certain cases the administration may be wrong but the principle is right. We understand, however, that it is the accepted policy of the Socialist party to do away with the means test. I am anxious to know, and I shall be glad if any of the hon. Gentlemen who are in a responsible position in the councils of the party will pay me the compliment of telling me, what is their alternative policy and how they will discriminate between the needs of one person and another.

We have had in other respects a very interesting Debate, and I should like to join my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Captain Balfour) in what he said about the 40-hour week. It is the easiest thing in the world for hon. Members opposite to distort what has been said about the Government's policy.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: The hon. Gentleman does not suggest that any statement I made distorted the statement of the Government representative? Did the hon. Gentleman listen to the quotation I gave from the official document of the International Labour Office, to which I did not add or detract anything?

Mr. MAITLAND: The hon. Gentleman will accept my assurance that I was referring more particularly to what was said by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Isle of Thanet, and that I was not thinking in any sense of the hon. Gentleman's speech. In the Press and elsewhere we have seen distortion of the real policy of the Government. In a matter of this magnitude we must be guided by previous experience, and we recall what happened in the case of the 48-hour week Convention of Washington. We understand now that the reason why that Convention was not adopted here was that there was a misunderstanding between the Members of the Labour party and of the Liberal party as to whether it should or should not be submitted for approval to the House. If the Labour party believed in it it was their bounden duty to submit it and leave it to the judgment of the House. However, I do not want to go into past history, and would rather say that on the general subject of a 40-hour week they will find, perhaps, a measure of sympathy and agreement coming from quarters least expected. But in the state of the country to-day it would not be a kindness to the workers to introduce a 40-hour week until we were satisfied that there would be no change in the standard of living of those workers. If we were to put into operation a system which involved a reduction of hours in this country without a corresponding reduction of wages, the immediate effect would unquestionably be to impose a greater handicap upon our export industries. It could only be avoided by having a reduction of pay in proportion to the reduction of hours, and I would ask hon. Members of the Labour party if they are satisfied that that is what the workers want.

It is difficult for a private Member to do more than make general statements in these Debates. I have always felt that any descent to details, to a specific proposal, is of no avail, but I understand it is the fact that the Civil Service always give attention to proposals which are submitted during these Debates. In mentioning the Civil Service I would like to dissociate myself entirely from the attack made upon them by the hon. Member for North Tottenham (Mr. Doran). I do not think it is right and fair to attack in this House people who are not able to speak in defence of themselves. I believe it is the fact that the Civil Service take the trouble to fillet all the Debates on unemployment and all other matters in this House and pick out any proposals which are capable of being useful, and so it may be that some suggestion of a specific kind may some day find the light in legislation introduced by a Department. I will venture to make a specific proposal. We have had three days of Debate on unemployment, and we cannot forget the question of unemployment on this Vote. We had a non-party Debate, and many good suggestions were made, but when all is said and done the initiative for introducing legislation to give effect to any proposals, however excellent they may be, must come from His Majesty's Government. I beg the Government to consider whether we could not now have some sort of non-party discussion, lasting for a day or two days or three days if need be, in order that we might deliberate over and consider the views of the Government on any proposal which they thought could possibly be adopted.

Sir S. CRIPPS: They have not got any views.

Mr. MAITLAND: The hon. and learned Gentleman says they have not got any views. I think it is quite unfair of him to say that. They have got suggestions and they have got proposals, and as he is not at the moment a Member of the Government he is not in a position to say whether they have not any views.

Sir S. CRIPPS: The Prime Minister told us this afternoon that the Minister of Labour was going to give us those views in the course of this Debate. They have not been forthcoming.

Mr. MAITLAND: I was in the House when the Prime Minister spoke, and I have a very clear impression of what happened. The Prime Minister was asked Question 46 by the hon. Member for Spennymoor (Mr. Batey), and said there was to be a Debate to-day upon the question and that would provide an opportunity to raise those points. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] The OFFICIAL REPORT will show what was said. Then an hon. Member asked if the Prime Minister would give a definite statement, and the Prime Minister said, "Wait and see." I never got the impression that there was going to be a specific statement on the part of the Minister, but I got what the Prime Minister said—the fact that it was an opportune time for hon. Members to raise those points during the Debate, and they have been raised. But may I come back to the suggestion which I was putting forward, for I find myself, quite against my inclination and desires, involved almost in a party squabble. I make the suggestion most seriously that we should have a Debate of one, two or three days in which we might have submitted to us the considered and deliberate views of the Government on the subject of unemployment.

I will risk making a proposal and would like to suggest a simple form in which something might be done. It is my conviction that valuable as are the schemes of work initiated by the Government, and valuable as are the schemes put forward by the local authorities, in the long run it is beyond the power of Parliamentary Government or of local government effectively to solve the question of unemployment. We can do a good deal in that direction, but in the long run we must depend upon the trade, industry, commerce and agriculture of our country. I would like the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider this one point as a means of encouraging the chiefs of industry to extend their operations and employ more people. At the present time manufacturing concerns get certain reliefs under the Income Tax Acts in respect of depreciation and of repairs and so on, and I suggest that the Chancellor should consider the possibility of extending those reliefs at the present time, because I feel certain that would give an incentive to people to expand and develop their works. Money is available for the expansion of well-founded industries, and it would be forthcoming. Maybe my suggestion would not amount to much, but any contribution that would help is very worth while considering. I am glad that the Government have recognised the very excellent services which have been done in this direction. We sometimes criticise each other, but I am sure that we are all agreed that the present tragic situation may be summed up in this way: The amazing thing to anyone unacquainted with our country must be the generosity of the people who are anxious to help the unemployed, and the spirit and the patience of those who are unfortunately unemployed.

I hope that the Government will not rely too much upon the outcome of the coming World Economic Conference. That would be a mistake. I recognise that we cannot look for any permanent prosperity in industry by acting alone, but prosperity in this country is to some extent dependent upon our own efforts, as well as being dependent upon a proper appreciation of the world position on the part of other countries. I venture to say to the Government that the internal position in this country is one wherein we can do a very great deal almost immediately to help our own people, and I beg the Government that, while they are looking forward hopefully, in a way in which we all must join, to good results ensuing from the coming international conference, they will not overlook those internal possibilities and lose no opportunity of putting into operation every scheme likely to help the unemployed. I am satisfied that if they will act courageously and boldly, and not hesitate to bring in schemes that may be subject to criticism, but will initiate proposals, they will have the warmest support from all quarters of the House.

8.48 p.m.

Mr. EDWARD WILLIAMS: I have listened with attention to a number of speeches in this House to-day, and especially to that of the hon. Member for Faversham (Mr. Maitland) who has just spoken. A remarkable change has taken place in this House in the last 18 months. The Government came in with the greatest majority in the history of Parliamentarism in this country, and for the first few weeks it was evident, from the speeches and from the jubilation of hon. Members who were supporting the Government, that they had at last achieved their ambition of sufficient strength to advance their cause of tariffs, presumably for the purpose of solving the unemployment problem. We have witnessed that tariffs cannot solve the unemployment problem, and the speeches that we have had from the supporters of the Government are not only the greatest possible indictment of tariffs, but of the system that this Government is out to foster.

Mr. MAITLAND: I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not apply that observation to what I have said. If we had not had the application of Protection in this country for the last 18 months, the number of unemployed would have been still more.

Mr. WILLIAMS: The hon. Member may examine the facts of the last 18 months, and if he or any Members of the Government can find satisfaction from them, and not from rhetoric or theoretical differences, they are entitled to have all the advantages that they can from that examination. However, I am not concerned with tariffs, but with unemployment. I question very much whether the supporters of the Government regard tariffs as a means of solving unemployment. One endeavours to give as much credit as possible to the intentions of Members of Parliament, but hon. Members have to confess that they believe in the stabilisation of the present system of private enterprise. He that believes in the stabilisation of this system of political economy is not out to solve the unemployment problem. A labour market is essential for the prosecution of this system. The motive at the back of hon. Members' minds cannot be the solution of the unemployment problem. It is true that it may be possible to bring unemployment to what may be described as comparable proportions, which would be very nice, but for hon. Members to say that they are out to solve the unemployment problem is not true to their own philosophy and their own acceptance of political economy. The thing which amazes me most is not the thing which amazes the hon. Member for Faversham. It is that we have in this country, at a time when great poverty faces millions of people, such an enormous preponderance of wealth, and that there is no attempt on the part of statesmen to bring that wealth into the hands of the people who actually require it in order to satisfy their needs. Hon. Members cannot put up, as a defence for the present Government's ineptitude in this matter, any reference to the Labour Government. That Government never satisfied me, but I realised that it was in a minority and that it was subject to the whims of the Liberals and of any people who were prepared to bargain. I am not putting up any defence for that Government, particularly on the question of the 48-Hour Convention at Geneva. Surely it is a very poor argument to relate the present situation, when we have a Government with such an enormous majority, to the situation when there was a Government that had no power, and at all times was subject to the whims of other people, who obviously were not prepared to support it in the solution of the unemployment problem. The people upon whom they depended were people who believed in vested interests—the very people who are supporting the National Government; and, because they believe in this philosophy, they are prepared to accept this system of political economy. Surely such people would not support Labour in any attempt to apply the principles which we believe to be the only principles by which it is possible to solve the unemployment problem.

The hon. Member referred to the means test, and asked what would the Opposition be prepared to do if they came back into office, or, rather, became the Government, because I presume he means, not merely office, but with authority and power. The first thing that we would do would be to abolish the means test. The hon. Member for Shettleston (Mr. McGovern) made reference to a circular issued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Greenwood) when he was Minister of Health. That circular, however, had no reference at all to the means test. It was issued in 1930, and merely asked the public assistance committees formed under the Local Government Act, 1929, to be far more sympathetic under the Poor Law than they had been. The circular was issued at a time when the means test did not apply to transitional payments, and, consequently, had no reference to it. I think the Minister will accept my statement that the means test did not then apply to transitional payments.

Mr. BUCHANAN: It is a perfectly legitimate defence to say that the Minister was carrying out the law, but is not that just what the Minister here has said? He has said, "The House of Commons has passed a law, and I am carrying out the law with the means test." If that argument is adopted, both Ministers are carrying out the law. I do not accept the argument of carrying out the law, but, if the hon Member accepts it for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wakefield, he must inevitably accept it in the case of the present Minister.

Mr. WILLIAMS: I am certain that the hon. Member is finding himself in some difficulty. The opposition expressed by the hon. Member for Shettleston against the Labour Government was on the ground that one of its Ministers had issued a circular. That circular had reference to the administration of a law which had obtained in this country for scores of years, and which is common knowledge to every person who is interested in public life. The circular was issued in order, if possible, to modify the harshness of the application of certain legal enactments. I agree that the Minister is helpless so far as the administration of the law to-day is concerned, but to-day the law is "means test," and, surely, the opposition to the Labour Government is not opposition to circulars issued at a time when there was no means test.

Sir H. BETTERTON: I should like to get this perfectly clear. According to the argument of the hon. Gentleman, he suggests that it is perfectly right when we are dealing with the money of a local authority, but it becomes monstrous, according to him, when we are dealing with the money of the national Exchequer. My point was that, if it is right in the one case, it is equally right in the other. The question put to the hon. Gentleman by the hon. Member for Gorbals (Mr. Buchanan) is unanswerable.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Really, we cannot accept that from the Minister. The Circular applied to destitute poor, to people who had received outdoor relief under legal enactments for scores of years. We never believed in such Poor Law principles; we do not believe in a system which involves extremes of poverty and plenty, but such extremes have obtained in this country for scores of years. We do not believe that legitimately unemployed persons who are deprived of their employment through the operation of this system, and who have contributed to a scheme which undertook the same contractual obligations as benefit societies and so on, should have to take the risk of loss. Once a man is under a scheme, we believe that that man is entitled to the benefits of the scheme for all time, if he is rendered idle through causes over which he has no control.

Sir H. BETTERTON: That is no answer to the point put by the hon. Member for Gorbals.

Mr. WILLIAMS: It certainly is an answer. I am not going to enter into a wrangle as to the difference between rates and taxes; I am just meeting the point that was put forward in opposition to us with regard to the issue of the Circular. The opposition of the hon. Member for Shettleston was not in regard to the administration of the law, but on the question of the means test. However, I do not want to carry that any further. The last speaker asked us what we were prepared to do if we had any authority in this country. The first thing we would attempt to do would be to see that the £200,000,000 which is now lying idle in the banks of this country should be so utilised as to ease the burden which is now falling upon the shoulders of the unemployed. There is an adequate amount of money to enable the unemployed to have a greater payment. That, in itself, to use the technical phrase, would cause a certain amount of inflation, but it would be immediately spent on absolute necessities, and thus of itself would partially solve the unemployment problem by setting factories to work to produce the things that could be bought. That £200,000,000 has been saved at the expense of the poor by cuts—unemployment cuts, education cuts, cuts in all directions. It is now lying idle. It certainly would be spent, if we had some authority, without the application of any means test in this country. Further, we should certainly tackle very seriously the other aspect of the matter. Yesterday my hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Cove) was dealing with the question of taxation. More than £300,000,000 in this country is handed over to people every year without any means test being applied, regardless of their income. Many of them receive unearned increment, and at the same time they receive interest upon war stock—for what? During the War period we lent a certain sum of money. The same principal may have been turned over many times. Without the application of any means test whatever these people are draining the nation dry. The unemployed, and persons engaged in industry, have to make their contribution and those who make it, if they become unemployed, are subject to this miserable means test by people who mainly represent the rentier class, those who drained the country by taking this unearned increment.

Captain PETER MACDONALD: There are over £500,000,000 in the Post Office Savings Bank and another £500,000,000 invested in War Savings Certificates by working class people. Do not they receive unearned increment, and would the hon. Member confiscate that?

Mr. WILLIAMS: Surely the hon. and gallant Gentleman can appreciate the difference between that and the matter that I have put before the Committee. The Minister referred to the numbers who have been drawn into the juvenile centres and said that about 90 per cent. of the 150,000 juveniles were obtaining employment. Reference was made to Jersey where 3,000 have been engaged in producing potatoes. If such persons are taken to Jersey or anywhere else for two seasons, will they not be put in the category of seasonal workers and deprived of unemployment benefit?

Mr. HUDSON: They will certainly not be described as seasonal workers if they have only done two seasons.

Mr. WILLIAMS: I think we could adduce evidence that they are likely to be so designated. If the umpire has to decide it in accordance with recent rulings, we are certainly inclined to believe that such persons will be deprived of benefit. Can we receive a definite answer, or shall I receive an answer from the Parliamentary Secretary when he replies?

Mr. HUDSON: I will answer it.

Mr. WILLIAMS: We are not satisfied, either, with the part that the Government have played with regard to the Forty Hours Convention. We know that with mechanisation in industry unemployment is bound to increase unless the Government are prepared to do something radical at least to replace that which mechanisation is likely to discard, and, if possible, increase the number brought into industry. Within two or three years in my own area in South Wales 11 collieries have gone into liquidation. The men will never be re-absorbed in those collieries. In the other collieries, which have not gone into liquidation, we have had the introduction of machinery on an extensive scale, reducing the number of men and they cannot be re-absorbed except by a reduction in working hours. We want to know whether the Government are prepared to face up to this which is, after all, the most difficult of all questions that we have to deal with. In other countries the 40-hour system is being seriously considered. At Geneva the other Governments were prepared to give it support, and, from the document read by the hon. Member who opened the Debate we are obliged to accept the fact that our representative deliberately opposed it and that the Government are not attempting to face up to the results of mechanisation not only here but in every country in the world.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that in 10 years unemployment will not be less. One has to assume that he believes that the present Government will be in power and that he will be Chancellor of the Exchequer for the next 10 years, in which case it is pretty certain that the number will not decrease but substantially increase. We had a statement from the Lord President last night indicating that the economy stunt has now come to an end and that there will be no further cuts in the social services. We have had a confession that the policy of economy has completely failed. Shall we have from the Minister to-night a confession that the means test has completely failed, that it is driving young men and women from home, and that it is causing extreme hardship in the households of decent people? Shall we have some indication that men of 60 and over may be dispensed with, and given adequate pensions, in order that young men, scores of thousands of whom have not done a day's work since they left school, may be engaged in industry? These are some of the questions to which we should like the Minister to endeavour to reply. There are 3,000,000 unemployed and 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 in a position of complete destitution. It is only a matter of time when those who are on standard benefit will have to receive transitional payment. It is only a matter of time when the persons who are in receipt of standard benefit, with permanent unemployment increasing as it is, will fall into the category of paupers in this country. Meanwhile the Government apparently sit and look on, trying to find out whether their tariff policy is becoming fruitful, and local authorities are being faced with bankruptcy. Liverpool, Glamorgan, Monmouthshire, all the centres where industry has been vital are being paralysed.

[Mr. Williams.]

In the South of England rich boroughs like Kensington merely have to pay coppers in support of public assistance, while the great industrial areas have to pay five and six shillings, and in Glamorgan more than 8s., in every pound in aid of public assistance. It is increasing year after year; the budget this year is higher than last year.

The Government should face up to this very grave situation. Industrial areas are becoming completely paralysed. The policy of the Government, with their enormous majority, has become a complete fallacy and they do not appear to have the will to do anything. In the Far East we see certain things going on, and it may only be a matter of a few years when England may be brought into the trouble. Wealth will then easily be obtained in this country. We had a blizzard over the week-end which damaged many townships in this country and rendered idle large numbers of people. Money will have to be found to put matters right. The House will sit and talk, but it will not advance money to do this sort of work. Yet if war broke out in which we were inveigled we should at once find the money. There is plenty of cash. There are plenty of willing men prepared to do something. There is plenty of cheap raw material. There are millions of acres of land running to waste. The Government certainly ought to bring all those things together. If only they would do so, they would find employment tending to increase. The country, when it gets its opportunity, will throw the Government out, and they will get their deserts for having failed to fulfil the promises which they made.

9.19 p.m.

Mr. CROSSLEY: The hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. E. Williams) certainly outlined a national policy which would require a very considerable amount of increased taxation. It is the claim of his party that direct taxation does not fall upon industry. Yesterday the hon. Member for Aberavon (Mr. Cove) took four years as a basis for proving that there was no direct connection between Income Tax and unemployment. The four years he took were from 1926 to 1930. During that time Income Tax was stable and unemployment was oscillating, and he may have forgotten that during that period we had the General Strike. If he had taken the years 1921 to 1924, he would have found that in 1921 the Income Tax was 6s. in the pound and that the figure of unemployment at Christmas, 1921, was 2,000,000. In 1922 the Income Tax was 5s. in the pound, and the unemployment at Christmas, 1922, was 1,400,000. In 1923 the Income Tax was 4s. 6d. in the pound, and the unemployment at Christmas, 1923, was 1,100,000. If the hon. Member will look up those figures he will, perhaps, change his ideas as to whether there is or is not a direct connection between taxation and industry. The hon. Member has an excuse because at the beginning of his speech he said that he did not understand finance and currency.

Mr. COVE: I am a modest man.

Mr. CROSSLEY: So am I, but I do not move financial Amendments. I am not one of those who want to make it harder for my right hon. Friend on the Front Bench to run the most difficult department in the Government. Nobody has such a thankless task as he has for all the time he remains in office. He had a good word to say about the public assistance committees. There is nobody who needs a generous word as much as the public assistance committees. They have to stand up and tackle this matter week after week. The public assistance committee in my division had for a considerable time to do without the assistance of the Labour party. It may have been to their credit. I am not saying it was or it was not, but I know one man on the public assistance committee there who had to sign 2,000 or 3,000 determinations every week. He had that task, and if he had not carried it out those people would have been thrown on to the Poor Law. You may say that my right hon. Friend went with a pocketful of pistols. The choice he had was to appoint a commissioner. If he had appointed a commissioner at that time it is clear that the people in Oldham would not have had such a good rate of transitional payment as they received from the local public assistance committee.

Mr. A. BEVAN: The commissioner would have to carry out the law. Do we understand that the public assistance committee is carrying out a different law from the one the commissioner would have to carry out, or is the commissioner to carry it out differently?

Mr. CROSSLEY: I am not saying that at all. I am saying that at this time we have public assistance committees carrying out the law, and although there is considerable difference between district and district, the public assistance committees are doing their best for the people in their district—most of them. The commissioners under the present Act have, I understand, to be paid out of the amount of money spent, or what would be spent in that area. I sincerely hope that the whole cost of this administration will be borne by the Government and by the taxpayer.

Mr. A. BEVAN: The hon. Member has made a most extraordinary statement. Do we understand that the unemployed would be worse off under the commissioner than under the public assistance authority, and that the commissioner would have to collect his salary out of unemployment pay? Is that what the hon. Member says?

Mr. CROSSLEY: That is not what I said at all.

Mr. BEVAN: Then what did you say?

Mr. CROSSLEY: It is not what I intended to say; what I intended to say was that a commissioner was appointed in different places in order to administer the law which public assistance committees had refused to administer.

Mr. BEVAN: The same law?

Mr. CROSSLEY: Yes, but which public assistance committees had not been administering at the appropriate rate. I am very much hoping that in the near future the administration will take into consideration two principles which remain very important in our constitution. The first is that in the national administration of national money we should not delegate our responsibility for spending money to local authorities, and the second is that every employable man who is now unemployed and wants to be employed should be on the Employment Exchange registers. You should bring into your scheme those people who have, perhaps, bought a little shop and gone out of insurance, and who go on to the rates and not on to the Employment Exchanges. At the same time, all those people who have been in insurance but who are no longer employable should not be a burden on the State.

Let me turn to another subject. I have just been in Germany, and, by the kindness of the German Minister of Labour, I was allowed an interpreter to take me round a good many of the labour exchanges. They have some things in Germany which I should like to see in this country. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hitler!"] No, not Hitler. I have no doubt my hon. Friend is delighted that Hitler is not here. If he were, he and his friends might not be present with us. They have at the big labour exchanges in Berlin food canteens. I do not know whether my right hon. Friend has considered that one of the great difficulties about unemployment is that by buying food on a small scale they have to pay comparatively high prices. Our local authorities provide meals for schoolchildren at 2d. a head, and I believe that if the Employment Exchanges could undertake the provision of meals to be paid for at cost price, that would leave something more in the budget of the unemployed man for clothes and boots.

Another thing in Germany which impressed me very much was that every labour exchange kept two files for each man out of work. One file showed the length of time he was out of work, and the second an alphabetical list to which the employer could look for a particular man. On each of these cards there was a list of numbers and each number represented a qualification. It might be that a man had a blue pencil mark through Nos. 13 and 15 showing that his profession was a builder, and that would mean he was also expert as a plasterer. He might also have a red pencil mark through 37 and 42, and that might mean he spoke French and had some knowledge of political economy. They showed me a card in which there was a blue pencil mark through political economy, which meant that the man was perfect in that subject. I asked them if there was anybody who was perfect in political economy, and they answered in true German philosophy that all things were relative. There is one other thing in Germany which, I think, the Minister might consider. There is a scheme of providing credits for those who wish to forgo some of their payments, and supplying them with a small amount of land and materials with which to build a house. In Germany every man's mind is turned towards land settlement as a partial solution of the unemployment problem. It is, perhaps, natural that they should turn to that method, and I am wondering if it would not be very long-sighted on the part of this Government to see if a scheme could be instituted here by which a man would voluntarily forgo a portion of his benefit or transitional payment, and thereby save the Exchequer a certain sum, and that sum, with the interest on it, should be put aside to help provide him with materials with which to build his house. If necessary, the Minister should take land—I do not say nationalisation—but there is much land lying derelict which might be cultivated.

Then there is the voluntary scheme for helping the unemployed. To my mind, there has been more mis-statement on this subject than on almost any other subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon Boroughs (Mr. Lloyd George) drew a most elaborate simile. He divided the sum and found that the amount due to his own county would be 30 pieces of money, and he compared that with another 30 pieces of money of which we have read in history. The grant to the National Council of Social Service was only intended to help them with secretarial expenses, travelling expenses and general organisation. It was not intended to be doled out to different places for starting centres. That was not its object, and we should recognise the fact that there are two unemployment problems. There is the cure of unemployment and the provision of work, possible means of shortening hours and so on; and there is the alleviation of unemployment. I do not think that trade unions and hon. Members opposite have really done credit to themselves when they have opposed the wonderful schemes started by private enterprise all over the country in order to make the life of the unemployed man happier and healthier while he is unemployed. I am very glad that the right hon. Gentleman has left that voluntary movement to be started, because he has not got to take the risk of failure.

One day, if the right hon. Gentleman gets a scheme which is really a success, I hope he will adopt it and make it a national one, but for the moment it is far better that private enterprise should experiment and that it should be left to private people who are anxious to get schemes going in the municipalities so that you may find out what is the best method and the best set of schemes, and then you may possibly have them adopted in future by the Government. I believe that is sound sense. The schemes we have in the south have not seemed generally popular, but in the north there is an enormous desire for them. Many unemployed in my constituency have told me so. Up to now there have not been many interesting experiments. Most of them have been on the same lines—allotments, boot and shoe repair shops, clothing repair shops for women and so on. There have not been any schemes with eight or nine people getting together, one making boots and one making clothing and trying to live on a communal basis.

There have not been any schemes which have attempted the promulgation of craft industries. I am not sure whether the people engaged in such schemes would be entitled to receive unemployment benefit, and I should like to ask the Minister if there is any way by which those who are anxious to start a craft industry, something which in no way competes with an existing industry, would be able to receive unemployment benefit. I see the hon. Member for Ebbw Vale (Mr. A. Bevan) looking forward again, but I can assure him that what I want to see is not anything in competition with trades union labour. In Germany the trades unions give their whole-hearted support to these schemes, and I think they are wise in doing so, because such schemes are going to be a big element in our national life in the future.

I have not time to speak about other things to which I wished to refer, but I should like to say a few words on the question of shorter hours. That subject has been grossly misunderstood. Bacon said:

> "Let us sit a little longer, that we may make an end the sooner."

This is a question which needs not one inquiry but two. It needs a close industrial survey in this country. In the cotton trade, for example, if we started to work shorter hours we should have to bear in mind that we do not compete with European countries in the main but with the countries in the East. In the cotton trade there have not been enormous technical improvements like there have been in other trades, and if we were to adopt shorter hours in the cotton industry and Japan, China and India were not to adopt them, we should lose the little part of the cotton trade that remains. An industrial inquiry is needed in this country to find out just the percentage of production which is used at home and the percentage that is used for export, also the average hours of work and other items, including the social effect. Generally speaking, that is very desirable and it must come. The other thing that is needed is an international inquiry, in regard to which our representative at Geneva has worked as well as he possibly could. I hope that the international inquiry will come off and that its report will produce the basis for what ultimately must be the main solution of our unemployment problem.

Captain P. MACDONALD: I intervene in order to extract, from the Minister of Labour, if I can, some information with regard to the Estimates before the Committee this evening. There has been a great deal of discussion connected with the International Labour Office at Geneva, and that led me to inquire what are the functions of that organisation and how much it is costing us at the present time. To my amazement I find that while other Estimates are being decreased or pared down to the minimum the cost of the International Labour Office at Geneva has increased this year by no less a sum than £6,300. That led me to put a question the other day to the Minister of Labour with regard to the International Labour Office, and the reply was remarkable. I was informed that not one single Convention or recommendation of the International Labour Office had been accepted by all the nations concerned in the Convention or recommendation since the inception of the International Labour Office 13 years ago. In those 13 years the International Labour Office has cost £5,500,000, of which amount £417,000 have been contributed by the British Government. This year over £500,000 will be spent on the International Labour Office and the people in this country are asking, and I think they are entitled to ask for what purpose is this money being spent. Why should £28,229 be spent in travelling and subsistence allowances, when we are informed that not one single recommendation or Convention has been adopted by all the countries engaged in that organisation in 13 years? One-tenth of the cost of the International Labour Office is borne by this country, and we have only one vote in 24.

These are very remarkable figures in view of the discussion that has taken place to-day about certain Conventions regarding hours of labour. There is more loose thinking and talking upon the question of the 48-hours week and the 40-hours week than perhaps on any other subject. I listened not long ago to an ardent Socialist speaker, who was discussing the question of the 48-hours Convention, and he said that he could not understand why the British Government had not adopted that Convention. He put the blame down entirely to the Tory party. I had the temerity to ask if there had not been two Labour Governments in this country in the last 13 years. He said that was true but that they had not a sufficient majority to carry the Convention. I said: "Can you tell me of any country that has whole-heartedly accepted the 48-hours Washington Convention? He replied: "Yes, India has wholeheartedly supported it." I said: "Yes, and well they might, for they can employ labour at two rupees a week. Are you prepared to recommend that British labour should be employed on the same conditions in this country?" That is the whole trouble when people talk about hours Conventions and the recommendations of international conferences. They completely disregard the other factors, namely, wages and working conditions.

The grievance that I have against the International Labour Office is that it seems to be completely dominated by countries that are not industrial. Those countries are always willing and anxious to accept Conventions on hours and other restrictions upon labour conditions, but they are non-industrial countries. Therefore, they are not justified in placing further burdens on industrial nations like ours, depending almost entirely upon our export trade for our existence. Before hon. Members are prepared to chastise the Government for not accepting these Conventions whole-heartedly and putting them into operation, they must realise that the other factors have to be borne in mind, otherwise they will be crippling employment in this country and making conditions still harder for the classes they pretend to represent in this House.

I do not intend to intervene at any length, but I would ask the Minister to give me an answer to the questions that I have put. I want to know the cause of the increase in the cost of the International Labour Office, how many British subjects are employed at the International Labour Office and in what work they are employed. I want to know if it is not a fact that a great deal of the work carried on by the International Labour Office to-day is being duplicated. Is it not the case that the Ministry of Labour have records, duplicates of which are kept at Geneva, and that information could be provided at any moment by the Ministry of Labour to any country which requires it without sending delegates week after week and month after month to conventions and discussions at Geneva. There have been at least 30 conventions during the last 13 years, and not one single recommendation has been carried out by all the parties concerned.

I maintain that the International Labour Office is an anachronism which might easily be done away with. The answer may be that it is part of the Versailles Treaty. I agree, but like many other clauses of the Versailles Treaty it is completely obsolete to-day. They have gone far outside their sphere and have embarked on grandiose schemes which they have no hope of ever carrying through. It is time that their activities were curtailed. It has been said of them, and I agree, that they are nothing more or less than a debating society, composed largely of people engaged in international social organisations through Europe. If anyone will examine the records of this organisation, and the records of the delegates representing various countries, they will find that 90 per cent. of them are Socialists of the extreme element. It is wrong, at this time of financial stringency, that this country should have to meet this added burden in order to subsidise an organisation which is contributing nothing to the solution of international or national problems.

9.48 p.m.

Mr. LAWSON: The Debate, with the exception of two or three speeches, has been concentrated on the question of unemployment. That is quite natural, but we on this side rather desired that on this occasion to deal with the administration of the department responsible for the spending of this large sum of money. The Minister of Labour was certainly placed in an altogether false position this afternoon by the Prime Minister, and that was chiefly responsible for any interruptions which took place during his speech, which we on this side did not welcome at all. On that incident I will only say this, that this House is usually generous to Ministers, including the Prime Minister, when answering questions. The House understands that it is not, always wise to say the exact word on a subject and is tolerant, but it was really obvious this afternoon that the Prime Minister was telling the House that some statement was going to be made, and I was myself much surprised at the statement of the Minister of Labour.

The Ministry of Labour is the most difficult department in the whole range of government. It is a significant fact—I do not say that the right hon. Gentleman is alone in this respect—that to-night, as on other occasions, the right hon. Gentleman has very little visible support from other Members of the Government. If there is a Department whose Debates ought to be listened to by the Prime Minister or the Leader of the House it is the Ministry of Labour Vote. It has been the grave of more Ministers than all the rest of the departments put together, for the simple reason that he has to face not only very difficult questions but questions which touch vitally the life, personal and social, of this country. The Department deals with no less than seven different sections in administration alone. It deals with wages, unemployment, umpires, courts of referees, training, the International Labour Organisation—and I shall have something to say in reply to the hon. and gallant Member for the Isle of Wight (Captain Macdonald)—the industrial courts and the relations between employers and workmen.

We were quite right in asking for a Debate on the general administration of the Department. There are nearly 3,000,000 unemployed. They have to attend the Employment Exchanges. When we were the Government we used to be assailed as to the condition of Employment Exchanges at every opportunity. We were told of the need for new Exchanges and of the conditions under which men had to wait in winter time. That is as it should be, because men and women have to go to Employment Exchanges, and before the courts of referees, they are subject to the means test, and to the Anomalies Act; and there are nearly 3,000,000 of them. Take the question of the courts of referees. There is grave need to consider what is happening. I have here a document sent out by the North Riding of Yorkshire County Council, who complain that the courts of referees apparently take the view that certain men are not in normal insurance. They say:

> "As these men have been unemployed for so long and are beyond middle-age, they are not likely to be re-absorbed in the trades in which they were previously engaged, and that in consequence they must be considered not normally insured."

Everyone knows that that is going on all over the country, apart from the Anomalies Act. It is a fact that whole masses of men who have been out of work a considerable time and are middle-aged are being declared as not normally insured and are thus thrown back on the Poor Law. That is an illustration to show the many different avenues along which men and women have to travel from the Exchanges to become a charge upon the Poor Law. When the position is examined it will be found that that is only one of the many reasons which are responsible for complaints from Liverpool and Manchester and Durham and Wales and Scotland—complaints that masses of the people are being thrown upon the Poor Law and that thus the rates are increasing. Take the case of Durham before the commissioners went in, take Glamorgan or take any area in Scotland where you have a Labour majority or an assistance committee that is sympathetic to the men. These authorities can try as they like to keep their backs to the wall, but the fact remains that the Poor Law numbers are growing and the rates are increasing.

It is a terrible situation, which the Minister and the Government cannot blink at much longer. I think there has been something like an increase of 250,000 upon the Poor Law since the present Government came into office. During the two years when the Labour Government was in office, when we were assailed because of the rapid growth of unemployment through causes over which we had no control, even when the unemployment figures were going up the number of people receiving public assistance was always coming down. Now it is the opposite. Unemployment is growing. The Government say it is not growing as fast as it was formerly, but it is lamentable to see the rapid increase in every town, almost every area of the country, and particularly the industrial areas, and the heavy financial burden that is being laid on those areas. The necessitous areas question is looming once more. I do not think there is much virtue in hon. Members continually supporting Acts of the Government which have the direct effect of increasing the rates. It seems to me that the common-sense thing to do is to refuse to accept those Acts which are obviously going to make the position of necessitous areas worse than it was before. I hope that to-night we shall get some answer from the Government with reference to the courts of referees.

The Minister, in dealing with the administration of transitional payments, quoted once more the Circular of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Greenwood). I do not know whether he wished to convey some of the impressions that were given to the House. Undoubtedly, he did create the impression that my right hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield by issuing that Circular gave some countenance to the policy of the present Government. I wonder why the Minister of Labour is so impervious to the explanation of the realities of the position. Here are the facts: In Wakefield the Conservatives actually made that Circular the battle-ground of the by-election. It was clearly explained in a very short time, and the Conservatives wanted to get away from it. But they repeated the same old mistake in Rotherham, and we have seen the result. They did the same thing in Wednesbury. The simple fact is that the right hon.

[Mr. Lawson.]
Member for Wakefield issued that Circular 18 months before the need test was heard of.

Sir H. BETTERTON: That is perfectly true.

Mr. LAWSON: My right hon. Friend issued it to deal with the Poor Law when its administration was passing over to the new public assistance committees. He had to explain the law as it was. If the circular is examined in the light of the facts and of my right hon. Friend's duty as Minister of Health—it had nothing to do with the Ministry of Labour—it will be seen that the circular is to my right hon. Friend's credit, and that it actually made a very generous improvement in the administration of the Poor Law.

Sir H. BETTERTON: The point which I tried to make over and over again was that if that circular is right in the case of the uninsured, why is it wrong in the case of those on transitional payment?

Mr. LAWSON: I will come to that later. What my right hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield did was to explain the law as it was when the public assistance committees were taking over the Poor Law.

Mr. MAXTON: But did he not go further and justify it?

Mr. LAWSON: I do not think the hon. Member can say that, if the circular is read in the light of the events of that time.

Mr. McGOVERN: Did not the circular say that even the income of children must be taken into account and is the hon. Member aware that the Tory public assistance committee in Glasgow do not take the small amounts made by children into account at all. The circular went even further than they would go.

Mr. LAWSON: I do not mind my hon. Friend putting his point of view, but I understand that there is a great difference between the laws of the two countries in this respect, and he is speaking from the Scottish point of view. [HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] In any case, the Minister of Health at the time had to explain the law to these committees.

Mr. D. GRAHAM: May I point out that if that circular which was sent out to the English bodies was to apply generally, the same law would have applied in Scotland, but according to the statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Shettleston (Mr. McGovern) it did not apply in Scotland, and therefore the law in Scotland must have been different from the law in England.

HON. MEMBERS: No!

Mr. LAWSON: I do not wish to go into that question. It does not make any real difference. The fact is that the Minister of Health, at that time 18 months before the means tests came into operation, was in duty bound to explain the law to the public assistance committees and that he did so and that in that circular he specially mentioned certain classes such as those in receipt of pensions and urged the committees to give generous consideration to them. The Minister of Labour has made a reference to the administration of the law in regard to transitional payments. We have never agreed with the means test at all, as I have clearly stated before, and far less did we agree with the destitution test. Everybody knows what I said in this House. I have always said that if there had to be one, I would sooner have it administered by the Employment Exchanges, under responsible Government authority than by public assistance committees with whom we could not deal in this House.

What has the right hon. Gentleman done in Rotherham and Durham? He has deposed the public assistance committees and substituted, in Rotherham one Commissioner, and in Durham three Commissioners, with 10 area officers who are servants of the Ministry of Labour. He has sent there 10 representatives of his own Department and he repudiates responsibility for them and practically speaking for the amount voted by the House in that connection. The right hon. Gentleman in taking that course is not only applying a destitution test to great masses of people in circumstances which have been well illustrated here today. He is also taking a course which is bad Departmental administration and bad government, in that money is being voted with practically no control by the House. The result is patent. He has taken £15,000 in a few weeks off Durham.

He has taken a great amount off Rotherham and he is using these two areas as a threat to other areas in the country. Other areas are being continually menaced and their administration and their outstanding public assistance committees, as I think even Conservative Members will agree, are under the bludgeon or the threat of being superseded by commissioners if they do not come up to the Minister's interpretation of the law.

It is a curious thing that when public assistance committees are operating and interpreting the law as they think it ought to be interpreted, the right hon. Gentleman says, "I differ with you, and, if you will not do what I want, then I will depose you." But when we come to him about the Commissioners in Rotherham and Durham, he says, "I have nothing to do with them; they may be good or bad, they may be carrying out the law or not, but I have nothing to do with it." The right hon. Gentleman is in a dilemma, and he will have to decide something more definite than we have heard of yet about the administration of the means test. I do not wish to emphasise or underline what I have said before, but the Government must be aware that this country is not going to stand the applications of the means test under continual Departmental pressure.

The Minister, it is true, gave a case or two from Rotherham, in which it is said sums of £5 or £6 a week were coming into a particular house and so many people were working and so forth. He also gave some cases from Durham. But he did not say anything about the 99 cases out of 100 in which he is really breaking up homes. That is not a phrase but a fact. While the right hon. Gentleman brings up in this House the one case in which people may be getting more transitional payments than he thinks they are entitled to, yet when it comes to fighting by-elections, it is found that the people know all about the other 99 cases. So the Government get the reply of the Rotherham by-election. That is only an expression of the feeling of the country at large. The Government would do well to take the warning and the right hon. Gentleman as long as he continues this system ought to be more tolerant with the public assistance committees than he is at the present time.

To-day we are dealing with a situation which involves nearly 3,000,000 people directly, apart from their dependants. All the Government are doing is hoping that something will turn up from their tariff policy and that, perhaps, industry will improve somehow or other. Nobody else in this country believes that. The employers of the country do not believe it. They know the facts with which the Government seem to be out of touch. Machinery is growing apace and is displacing men faster than means can be devised for employing them. I believe that even if you get your financial problems, your War debts and reparations, settled, all that you will have done then is to have got down to the fundamental fact that mechanism is revolutionising industry. Employers know that quite well, and the figures show it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Mr. T. Williams) pointed out, the numbers of the wholly unemployed are growing apace, and there are about 200,000 more now than there were a year ago. As a matter of fact, I think the total is about 460,000 more than it was 18 months ago, although I am not quite sure of those figures. Then, as I pointed out previously, the hard core of unemployment is growing, and instead of 100,000, those figures are now about 500,000. That means that we have almost a revolutionary situation to deal with, and yet, in face of that fact, we have thousands of boys and girls leaving school at the same time that we have 140,000 boys and girls registered as unemployed.

I know of nothing that has been more against the best interests of the country than the action of this House in destroying the Measure wherein the Labour Government attempted to raise the school-leaving age to 15 years. I am very sure that some Conservative Government will be compelled—in fact, I should not be surprised if the industrial facts do not compel this Government, before it finishes its course—to consider seriously the raising of the school-leaving age. I do not say that you can estimate exactly how many such a Measure would put into employment. That is a very difficult matter, in the ups and downs of practical life and modern industry, to decide, but I am sure that some day, by some Government, this question will have to be seriously considered. Of all the stupidities, I think the worst is the fact of turning, almost every month, some 30,000 to 40,000 boys and girls out of school into industry at a time when you have 140,000 under 18 unemployed, and whole masses of youths of from 18 to 20, perhaps another 100,000 at the very least, unemployed in addition.

Then the Government will have to give much more consideration to the question of a reduction in the number of working hours. The right hon. Gentleman cannot deny, however he may try to explain it away, that the will of the Government has been antagonistic to the reduction of hours. He may have been expressing the official view of the Federation of British Industries and of the Confederation of Employers, and I am sure that their representative in Geneva was with the Government on that point, but I do not believe that the Government is now expressing the will of the great mass of employers in this country on that matter. I have met large numbers of employers who agree that serious consideration must be given to this question of the reduction of hours, and I think the real test was put by the hon. Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Mander), on the point as to the Government's view on this matter, when he said that if the Government had been really serious on this, one of the foremost questions of the day, raised by the Italian Government and supported by a great many other Governments, they would not have sent one of the staff of the Department to Geneva to deal with it. Surely the Minister himself would have gone, or his Parliamentary Secretary, who could have spoken with some authority, instead of a member of the staff, who was given his rigid orders and had no real representative power, not knowing what arguments were to be brought out at Geneva.

The Government are rooted in the old ways of reactionary Toryism. They cannot even rise to the heights of enlightened capitalism. The Government simply justify themselves in a very roundabout way without having any fundamental basis for the explanation that they have to give. I would like to say to the hon. and gallant Member for the Isle of Wight (Captain P. Macdonald) that, as far as the International Labour Office is concerned, it would do him good to get at something like closer grips with the facts about the Conventions. I can tell him that it has been my privilege to be a representative of the Government at the International Labour Office on various occasions, and to sit as chairman of the committee which reported on the working of these Conventions. As not merely a theoretical expert, but as one who has a practical touch with industry, I can judge the value of those reports, and I say that if the British Government would give their support and sympathy to that organisation, and use their great prestige to lead the way in it, they would do great things for the British people and for the world.

Captain P. MACDONALD: The hon. Gentleman said that he represented the British Government at Geneva. Can he tell us one single recommendation that was accepted there during the term of the Labour Government?

Mr. LAWSON: The hon. and gallant Gentleman must give me the same privilege as he gives to Ministers; I must have notice of that question. I was speaking of my chairmanship of the committee which reported on the working of these Conventions; 700 of them have been passed for various countries and are working to-day. My hon. Friend who opened the Debate was well advised to draw attention to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it will be 10 years before we can see anything like an improvement in employment. The Chancellor's speech cast gloom and sent fear throughout the length and breadth of the country, and I do not think that it will do the prestige of the British Government or of this country any good abroad. We now know that the position of the Government is that, whereas they got a doctor's mandate from the country to deal with the patient, the doctor has now no hope whatever for the patient during the next 10 years.

I would like to give the Minister of Labour this hint. There is a view abroad in the country that it may be possible to get an insurance scheme which will pay its way, and that the transitional payment and the means test will probably be carried on. Finally I would warn the Government, as regards any proposals they may have for the future, that neither they nor any other Government will be able to run a watertight insurance system in this country in the face of the facts which are now apparent; nor will this country stand the inquisition and the dastardly results of the operation of the means test, with its dire effects on the welfare of the people throughout the country.

Mr. HUDSON: We have listened to an unemployment Debate to-day which, in my recollection of Debates on this subject in this House is, I think, almost unique, because it is practically the first Debate in which any consideration at all has been given to the details of administration of the Ministry of Labour. I would like to thank the hon. Member for Chester-le-Street (Mr. Lawson) for the kind things he has said about my right hon. Friend's Department. He knows the difficulties, and that one of the difficulties lies in the fact that the details of our administration are so seldom discussed, and that to a great extent the work of the Department is very largely unknown either to the country or to hon. Members. Therefore, hon. Members will perhaps forgive me if I answer in some detail, within the limits of the time at my disposal, some of the practical questions addressed to me in the Debate. I shall have a word or two to say, also, about the speech of the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. T. Williams), who opened the Debate, both on the question of hours and on the question of the effect on trade of this administration.

The hon. Member for Leigh (Mr. Tinker) asked the number of juveniles in receipt of benefit and how many of them attended juvenile instruction centres. The number of juveniles in receipt of benefit is 22,000 boys and 15,000 girls. 14,780 boys and 5,600 girls are in attendance at juvenile instruction centres, and in addition 1,800 boys and 1,480 girls attend other courses of instruction provided by the local authorities. He asked further how many training centres for adults we had and where they were situated, and for similar information respecting girls and women. The training centres for which we are asking approval this year are: Training centres, non-residential—Birmingham, Bristol, Glasgow, Letchworth, Park Royal, Waddon, Wallsend, Watford. Instruction centres: residential—Bourne, Carstairs, Claydon, Cranwich Heath, Fermyn Woods, High Lodge, Kielder, Shobdon, Swanton Novers, Weeting and West Tofts. Non-residential—Carshalton. We have closed the Slough training centre. As regards the non-residential training centres, which are known as "handyman centres," they are, for the most part, manned by men and youths from distressed areas, who have their unemployment benefit made up to 21s., out of which sum they have to pay for lodgings, which are provided for them in ordinary dwelling-houses, at an average rate of 17s. In addition to that they get a free midday meal on six days a week, and reasonable fares are paid. In the case of a few married men sent to these centres an additional allowance of 8s. is made to them to cover their expenses. Men who attend the residential centres which are reconditioning centres surrender the whole of their unemployment benefit, but in return are fed, lodged and, to a certain extent, clothed—they get trousers and boots—and have a pocket money allowance of 3s. a week. The average stay at the residential centres is 12 weeks, and at the other centres, the handyman centres, it is 26 weeks. In the case of girls and women, there are also residential and non-residential centres. The non-residential centres are for the most part situated in the distressed areas, and the residential hostels are situated at Lenzie in Scotland, Market Harborough, Warrington, Leamington, Long Benton, Harrogate and London. They are run on behalf of the Central Committee on Women's Training and Employment. The women and girls who are there get allowances in the same way, although at a lower rate, as the men in the handyman centres and the residential training centres.

The hon. Member then went on to ask me about circular L.A. 16 on the question of pensions. He said that it was not the intention of the House—at least he did not think that it was the intention of the House—that when 50 per cent. of a man's disability pension was ignored that portion only should be ignored which was confined to his own disability pension. He objected to the whole of a man's pension in respect of his dependants being taken into account. I have not had time to look the matter up, but I think that I am correct in saying that I explained the matter to the House specifically, in answer to a question, when we were discussing the Bill. I say, subject to correction, that that is my recollection of what happened. In any case, the Transitional Payments Act definitely defined wounds and disability by reference to Section 16 of the Finance Act, 1919, which laid down the facts quite clearly. There could be no doubt in the minds of anyone who had taken the trouble to look at the reference.

Further, I will justify the matter on its merits. I think that it is within the recollection of hon. Members that when we were discussing this matter of a disability pension it was the general feeling of the House that the disability pension to some extent represented blood-money, that it represented a compensation for a definite injury to the man himself, and that it had no bearing on or relation to his earning power. On the other hand, the question of the dependants' pension rests entirely on maintenance, and therefore when you are considering the man's needs and the amount that he requires to maintain himself and his family, it is clear that the dependants' disability pension should be taken fully into account. I hope that I have made myself clear.

The hon. Member then went on to protest about single persons on transitional payments who had gone into lodgings and whose claims had been disallowed. He will remember that this question has already been discussed more than once in the House. It arose mainly owing to the action of a number of single persons in a Lancashire town who had deliberately gone out of their own homes and into their neighbours' homes. There had been an exchange of the young persons. The son of A went into the home of B, and the son of B went into the home of A. They went to the local public assistance committee and said: "We are no longer members of the family. We are lodgers, and as lodgers we should like to be paid full rates of transitional payments." That was such an obvious evasion of the real intention of the Act that my right hon. Friend the Minister definitely told the local authority that if they chose to take such steps as seemed to them adequate in order to stop that practice, they would have his full approval. They have taken those steps, and the practice, I believe, has come to an end. I do not believe that anyone could be found in this House who would justify or defend the giving of any consideration at all to people who are attempting to evade the law in that way.

Mr. TINKER: I must protest against the statement that they were simply crossing from one house to another.

Mr. HUDSON: That is what they did. The hon. Member also mentioned the question of the 40-hour week, but, if he will allow me, I will deal with that when I come to the general question. My hon. Friend the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. Mander) said a word about our treatment of Wolverhampton in regard to the administration of the means test, and he said that he hoped that, as the result of the negotiations which had been going on between the Wolverhampton Corporation and the Department, some satisfactory arrangement would be reached. He seemed to use the word "satisfactory" in an ironic sense. I do not know exactly whether it will be satisfactory, but I can assure him that at least it will be legal.

He then went on to raise the question, which is of general interest, of the right of an applicant for transitional payments to get a personal hearing on appeal. Hon. Members probably know that in England, unlike Scotland, the ordinary person applying for public assistance has no legal right of appeal, but the practice, in the great majority of cases of which I know, is that public assistance committees, where a man feels that he has a grievance, or that he can adduce new facts which have not been within the consideration of the committee before, he is practically always granted a right of rehearing; and I feel certain that that is the practice which is followed by practically all public assistance committees throughout the land.

Sir REGINALD BANKS: If the great majority follow that practice would it not be possible for all of them to follow it? There seems to be something desirable in it.

Mr. HUDSON: My hon. and learned Friend, versed as he is in the law, knows that neither my right hon. Friend nor the Minister of Health has any power to issue orders to public assistance committees.

Sir R. BANKS: They could make recommendations.

Mr. HUDSON: The hon. Member raised the question of dating back, and asked why it should not be possible for a man whose circumstances had changed, say owing to the birth of a child, to have his transitional payment altered, two or three weeks later, for the previous two or three weeks; and other Members, I gather, think that there is some hardship in this, and that transitional payments ought to be treated in the same way as benefits. Hon. Members know that if, as the result of a hearing by the court of referees or the Umpire, a man is decided to have been entitled to a certain payment, he can receive back pay for several weeks, or, indeed, months, and it is suggested that a similar arrangement ought to be made with regard to transitional payments. The cases are not entirely parallel, because benefit is a payment received as of right, whereas transitional payments are payments ex gratia in order to meet the needs of the man for the particular week in which they are made. We have quite recently, however, issued a new regulation which will allow a committee to make retrospective increases or changes in transitional payment determinations valid for the benefit week preceding that in which the determination is made, and, therefore, if there is any change in the man's circumstances, there is no reason at all, if he exercises due diligence in getting his case heard or his circumstances disclosed to the local relieving officer, why any man should suffer any delay, and I hope that the new regulations which we have issued will dispose of that difficulty.

He went on to deal with the question of discrepancies in practice. He knows as well as I do that that is one of the matters which have caused my right hon. Friend and myself most concern. We have endeavoured to get discrepancies in practice between local authorities removed by persuasion, but, in spite of our best efforts, we have failed. It is interesting to note that, since we took steps to secure uniformity of practice in the shape of the Determination of Need (No. 2) Bill last year, dealing with cases of disability of pensions, workmen's compensation, savings and house property, practically no complaints have arisen on these four matters, and I have not heard any point of complaint raised in this Debate on the four points covered in the Bill of last year. I think we are entitled to claim that the action that we then took has materially helped to make the administration of this very difficult subject much easier throughout the country. The hon. Member went on to deal with the case of shorter hours. He brought up a particular case and said he thought, from his own experience I gathered——

Mr. MANDER: I did not say so.

Mr. HUDSON: The hon. Member implied it, and it is very generally known—that, as a result of his own experience and knowledge, if there was rationalisation, it would be possible to secure a 40-hour week and still pay 48 hours' wages. One of the objects of the 40-hour week in present times is, surely, to spread employment over a larger number of people while maintaining production at its present level, and you defeat your whole object if in 40 hours you get 48 hours' production, because you will then have to work shorter time and some of the men will be thrown out of work. That is precisely what happened in the particular case that the hon. Member has in mind, because the firm which got a great deal of publicity out of the statement that it had succeeded in shortening its hours to 40 and paying 48 hours' wages, as the result of the introduction of a new system of working, has actually got 48 hours' production out of 40 hours' work. If the whole industry follows that example, we shall be no better off at all. It is worth noting, also, that this firm had to give an undertaking to its men before the trade union would allow the system to be introduced that, in spite of the extra production, they were going to keep them and would not dismiss any men for six months. The six months have not elapsed and we do not know the final result of the experiment.

Mr. MANDER: I made no personal reference of any kind. I have knowledge of this matter going far beyond any one works in one industry. It is relevant in all those cases, which are inevitable in certain circumstances, where pressure of competition causes rationalisation. In those cases it keeps more people at work if 40 hours are worked instead of 48.

Mr. HUDSON: That is the only instance I know where they have succeeded so far in paying 48 hours' wages for 40 hours' work. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Thanet (Captain Balfour) made some very interesting suggestions. I should like to thank him for the generous tribute that he paid to our Exchange managers. I think they were thoroughly deserved. As regards the question of substituted work, the question whether a man who works during the daytime will or will not be disqualified from benefit is one over which my right hon. Friend has no control whatever, because it is a matter to be decided by the court of referees and the umpire, who are entrusted with the job. As regards the question of seasonal workers, my hon. and gallant Friend will forgive me saying that he is a little inconsistent, because he said, in the first place, that there is a fair proportion of seasonal workers who pay the contributions for the whole of the season when they know that they are not going to suffer any unemployment. But he then suggested that in the Isle of Thanet 90 per cent. of them were employed for the season and 10 per cent. unemployed for the season. Even in the Isle of Thanet, it is precisely because of the risk of the 10 per cent. being unemployed that we are entitled to ask everyone concerned for contributions. Those persons ran the risk of not getting employment in the season, and in the course of an analysis which we made a short time ago we found that during the time that the seasonal workers Regulation has been in operation seasonal workers during the season were able to draw a very substantial amount out of the fund. As regards the question of the shorter benefit year that, of course, is a matter which would require legislation, but it is a suggestion which we will bear in mind and see if any use can be made of it.

I turn to the hon. Member for Shettleston (Mr. McGovern), who started off by saying that he was not a Conservative. From my knowledge of him I should say that he is far more Conservative than any Member on this side because many of us have changed in our views, but as far as I can make out he still believes in the outworn theories of Marx. He raised a good number of matters of detail, but every one, as far as I can understand, were matters within the discretion of the public assistance committee and should really be discussed with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, and not upon our particular Estimates.

Mr. McGOVERN: May I have an answer to the questions which I put? If you want to impress me with a desire to become a negotiating statesman in this House, I think I am entitled to an answer to the specific cases to which I called attention, as to the treatment he is meting out, and as to their attitude.

Mr. HUDSON: I am afraid that the hon. Member is not entitled to an answer because they are all individual cases, over the solution and determination of which neither I nor my right hon. Friend have any control. They are matters within the discretion of the public assistance committee.

Mr. McGOVERN: Will the hon. Member allow me to put one point in connection with the case of two brothers living in the same house in different rooms? Are those persons entitled to be treated on the same basis as man and wife? Surely the Minister has some opinion on a matter of that description?

Mr. HUDSON: If the public assistance committee would have treated those persons, if they had applied for public assistance, as man and wife then, under the terms of the Order they are bound to make transitional payments on that basis.

Mr. McGOVERN: That is no answer at all.

Mr. HUDSON: With regard to the speech of an hon. Member who asked about seasonal workers going to Jersey, the principle laid down is that, where a man takes seasonal work, not with the intention of adopting a career but because he cannot obtain any other work, those cases will be judged on their merits. In general a man is allowed to take up seasonal work for two years before any question arises as to his having adopted it permanently. As the hon. Member knows, I can give no assurance upon this matter, which is in the hands of the court of referees and the umpire. Generally, the ruling of the umpire is to the effect I have just explained.

The hon. Member asked me why we did not give pensions to men over 60 as one of the solutions for unemployment. It does not lie in his mouth to ask that. That is one of the proposals of his party and we are entitled to ask why they did not put it into force when they had the opportunity. The hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Crossley) made some very interesting suggestions about land settlement. Of course, he realises that practically all the points he raised require legislation and, therefore, much as I would like to deal with them, I should be prevented by the rules of order. I very much appreciated the tribute he paid to our action in connection with the National Council of Social Service. I now come to the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Captain P. Macdonald)——

Mr. MAXTON: What about the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Doran)?

Mr. HUDSON: The hon. Member asked me about the increase in our contributions to the International Labour Office. The answer is that there was one more conference at Geneva this year than last and also that, owing to some of the States not having paid their contributions to the expenses of the International Labour Office, these were paid out of the working capital of the League of Nations at Geneva, and it falls to us to pay our share to make that good.

Captain P. MACDONALD: Has no protest been made by the British Government against this form of treatment? Has one single resolution of the International Labour Office been adopted by this Government?

Mr. HUDSON: We have only one vote against a number of others, but that does not prevent us from paying our contributions unless we are willing to go back on our signatures, which the hon. Member would not suggest. The hon. and gallant Member for Clitheroe (Sir W. Brass) quoted some figures about determinations at Manchester and Salford, but he must have been confusing rates of public assistance and transitional payments, as it was obvious that a man, wife and three children could not possibly receive 39s. 3d. in Manchester or Salford or anywhere else, because the maximum rate of transitional payment would be 29s. 3d.

Sir W. BRASS: Can the hon. Gentleman assure me that there is no difference in transitional payments between various places?

Mr. HUDSON: No, the hon. and gallant Member knows, as I have been explaining, that one of the difficulties we have always is the difficulty of the various rates in various areas. I have explained there could not be a discrepancy as great as he suggests. With regard to the question he raised about the trade dispute case, we have no power whatever to submit another case to the umpire, but, if there is any new fact in any case, the umpire is always ready to receive representations and consider the case, provided the fact is definitely a new one. I now come to the speech of the hon. Member for Don Valley. He accused us, among other things, of having supported a policy of international isolation, and he implied that one of the results was the fall in our international trade. He had better think of what happened during his own term of office. Taking our exports, I find that their value fell from £729,000,000 in 1929 to £570,000,000 in 1930 and £390,000,000 in the following year, and has remained practically constant at £365,000,000.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: What about the volume?

Mr. HUDSON: I have said that in 1931-32 the value decreased £25,000,000. In the following year the volume slightly increased from 76.5 to 76.8, compared with 122 in 1929, which was the last year we were in power. Therefore, there is nothing in the hon. Member's argument.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Are not the exports down by £24,000,000?

Mr. HUDSON: The hon. Member spoke, as did the hon. Member for Chester-le-Street, about an increased demand upon the Poor Law. They seemed to think that there has been an increase on the Poor Law over anything that has happened before. If that was not their argument there was no point in it. The fact of the matter is that in 1929, which was taken as the datum line under the Derating Act of that year, the whole of the allowances to local authorities were based on the continuance of the expenditure of what they spent in 1929, and adjustments were made accordingly and weighting was given to authorities which in 1929 had a very high Poor Law expenditure. Then the Labour Government came along in 1930 and passed an Act which upset the whole basis of the arrangement by taking on to the Insurance Fund a lot of people who had no business to be there, and the net result was that in 1930 there was a sudden drop in the number of the persons on the Poor Law. We have never denied that fact, but the whole point is that even to-day, in spite of the distress, the numbers on, and the cost of, Poor Law have not yet got back to the level of 1929, the level at which the grants have been paid for the last two years. In other words, the local authorities of this country had two very good years to which they had really no right.

The final point is the question of hours. Hon. Members opposite have accused us of having adopted an obstructive policy at Geneva. The hon. Member for the Don Valley, I hope entirely unintentionally, misquoted very seriously the words of Mr. Norman.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: No.

Mr. HUDSON: I am sure that it was unintentional, but he ended up his quotation of the speech by using the phrase, "the phantom of the 40-hour week."

Mr. WILLIAMS: No.

Mr. HUDSON: I heard it myself, and I asked several hon. Members if they heard it too. What Mr. Norman said was, that the 40-hour week Convention as discussed at Geneva was a phantom.

Mr. WILLIAMS: I read his speech.

Mr. HUDSON: One of the reasons for our action in this matter was our experience with the 48-hour Convention. It is 12 years since that Convention was originally adopted, and it has not yet been ratified. Why? Because it was done in a hurry and it has been impossible in the years since to get an agreed interpretation of what it means. In the matter of the 40-hour week Convention, we want to avoid doing that. We are anxious to try to obtain the facts. As my right hon. Friend said, the Trades Union Congress went gaily ahead urging the 40-hour week, and then they had second thoughts and decided that it would be a good thing to ask their own constituent trade unions whether the 40-hour week was a good thing or a bad thing. If the Trades Union Congress, on second thoughts, decided that it was better to be careful, the least that we can do is also to be careful. But that does not in the least mean that we are opposed to the 40-hour week, in principle. We have, as hon. Members know, invited the Trades Union Congress and the Confederation of Employers' Organisations to meet us and try to get a practical inquiry.

Question put, "That '£156,423,000' stand part of the Resolution."

The House divided: Ayes, 220; Noes, 47.

WRITTEN ANSWERS.

BEER, WINE AND SPIRITS (STATISTICS).

Dr. SALTER asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the number of bulk barrels of imported beer in respect of which the rebate was allowed during the calendar year 1932?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: The number of bulk barrels of imported beer retained for home consumption in respect of which rebate was granted in the calendar year 1932 was 1,213,413.

Mr. GROVES asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the number of bulk barrels of beer brewed during the year ended 30th September, 1932?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: The number of bulk barrels of beer brewed in Great Britain and Northern Ireland during the year ended 30th September, 1932, was 18,945,000.

Mr. GROVES asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the quantities of malt, unmalted corn, and molasses used in distilling, and the number of proof gallons distilled, during the distilling year ended 30th September, 1932?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: The quantities of malt, unmalted corn and molasses used in distilling and the number of proof gallons of spirits distilled in Great Britain and Northern Ireland during the year ended 30th September, 1932, are as follow:

Materials used.	cwts.
Malt	544,581
Unmalted Corn	741,779
Molasses	3,642,239
	Proof gallons.
Spirits Distilled	32,062,000*

* This figure is provisional.

Dr. SALTER asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer the estimated net receipts for duty for the year ended 31st December, 1932, on beer, home-made and imported, respectively, spirits, home-made and imported, respectively, British wine and hops?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: The approximate net receipts of duty for the year ended 31st December, 1932, on beer, home-made and imported, spirits, home-made and imported, British wine and hops, are as follow:

Beer, Home-made ...	69,570,000
Imported	6,680,000
Spirits, Home-made ...	29,456,000
Imported	4,320,000
British Wine	232,000
Hops	77,000

MALE SERVANT LICENCE DUTY.

Major HILLS asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that many people, in order to help the unemployed, are making an effort to employ male labour, both inside and outside the house, more freely than before; that such persons are immediately confronted with a demand note to pay 15s. male servants tax; and whether he will consider the possibility to give relief from this tax to such persons who are genuinely giving work to men otherwise unemployed?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: I would refer my right hon. and gallant Friend to the answer which I gave to the hon. and gallant Member for Coventry (Captain Strickland) on 21st February last.

ELECTRICITY SUPPLY, PAINSWICK.

Mr. PERKINS asked the Minister of Transport whether he is aware that there is a considerable demand from the inhabitants of Painswick, Gloucestershire, for electricity; and whether he will approach the Electricity Commissioners with a view to arrange for this supply to be granted?

Mr. STANLEY: The Electricity Commissioners have informed me that the question of establishing a public supply of electricity at Painswick has already formed the subject of communication between them and the undertakers concerned. The Commissioners are hoping to get a definite decision from the company shortly.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

SCOTLAND.

Mr. D. GRAHAM asked the Minister of Labour the amount of money expended on unemployment benefit in the counties of Midlothian, including the city of Edinburgh, West Lothian, and Fife, for 1931 and 1932, giving the amount spent in each county separately.

Sir H. BETTERTON: The following table gives the information desired:

Amounts paid in Insurance and Transitional Benefit and Transitional Payments at Employment Exchanges in the counties of Midlothian, West Lothian and Fife in the years 1931 and 1932.

County.	1931.			1932.

* The Transitional Payments scheme came into operation on 12th November, 1931.

WALES.

Dr. J. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Labour the number of men unemployed in the iron and steel industry, the tinplate industry, the engineering trades, and the coal-mining industry for South Wales at the latest available date, with the percentage of the unemployed to those in employment.

Sir H. BETTERTON, pursuant to his reply [OFFICIAL REPORT, 2nd March, 1933, Column 532, Volume 275] supplied the following statement:

Insured men, aged 18 to 64, recorded as unemployed in certain industry classifications at Employment Exchanges in South Wales* at 23rd January, 1933.

Industry Classification.	Insured persons recorded as unemployed.
	Number.	Per cent. of estimated number insured at July, 1932.

Coalmining	73,724	38·5

* Including the counties of Brecknock, Carmarthen, Glamorgan, Monmouth and Pembroke.

Mr. D. GRENFELL asked the Minister of Labour the figures of unemployment in the South Wales mining industry in January, 1933, and the same month in each of the preceding five years.

Sir H. BETTERTON, pursuant to his reply [OFFICIAL REPORT, 2nd March, 1933, Column 532, Volume 275], supplied the following statement:—

*Insured persons in the coalmining industry classification recorded as unemployed at Employment Exchanges in South Wales.

ROYAL NAVY.

CRUISERS, DESTROYERS AND SUBMARINES (AGE).

Mr. DONNER asked the First Lord of the Admiralty how many cruisers, destroyers, and submarines at the present time are 15 years of age and over?

Sir B. EYRES MONSELL: The numbers of vessels over 15 years of age from date of completion, inclusive of Dominion vessels, are as follow:

Cruisers	16
Leaders and Destroyers ...	36
Submarines	1

MOTOR AMBULANCES.

Mr. HICKS asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty how many motor ambulances attached to Naval establishments have been withdrawn during the past six months; what are the places concerned; and what alternative arrangements have been made in each case to provide adequate alternative transport in the case of serious accident?

Lord STANLEY: As a measure of economy, an ambulance has been withdrawn from the Royal Naval Armament Depot at Priddy's Hard. Arrangements have been made for any transport facilities to be provided by the Royal Naval Hospital at Haslar where several ambulances are maintained.

POOR LAW RELIEF.

Mr. LAWSON asked the Minister of Health the number of able-bodied unemployed persons now receiving public assistance, indoor and outdoor, respectively, in Great Britain?

Sir H. YOUNG: The average number of unemployed persons registered at Employment Exchanges who were in receipt of outdoor relief in England and Wales in each week of January, 1933, was 135,040, excluding dependants. The Returns made to my Department do not distinguish the persons receiving institutional relief who are relieved on account of unemployment. As regards Scotland, I would refer the hon. Member to the Secretary of State.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION (APPEALS) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

11.5 a.m.

Mr. TURTON: I beg to move, "That the Bill be now read a Second time."

In tracing the origin of this Bill, the House will perhaps forgive me if I refer to the Poor Prisoners' Defence Act of 1930. I was able to introduce that Bill in the last Parliament, but, being a new Member has its disadvantages, for on a maiden voyage I did not wish to carry too much sail. I therefore eliminated from the Bill everything that was difficult or contentious. I entirely excluded the appeal from the courts of summary jurisdiction. During the Second Reading many hon. Members noticed that omission. Among them was my hon. Friend the Senior Member for the Cambridge University (Sir J. Withers), who was the grandparent and the godparent of the last Bill, and whose absence from the position of sponsor of the present Bill is due to his appointment to a certain departmental committee. After the intervening time, I do not feel any more fitted to embark upon a stormy voyage, but I believe that there has been a considerable change of attitude in public opinion towards this matter and, I may say, a change of competence in the House to deal with it. When I introduced the last Measure we were still a party Government. Now we are free from the trammels of a party Government or the timidities of a party caucus. What the Socialist Government did not dare attempt to do in the interest of the poor man writhing under a sense of unjust conviction, the National Government have, I believe, both the will and the courage to pass into law.

Before explaining the provisions of the Bill, I will explain the present position in this matter. Not every hon. Member will have had the personal misfortune, or the professional good fortune to appear in a court of summary jurisdiction, and I would ask hon. Members to step into the shoes of a man who is appearing in the police court to answer a charge. Let us assume that he has been charged with stealing a £1 note. When he appears he pleads not guilty. The police then intimate that it is a case with which the court can deal summarily, and the chairman of the court asks the man if he consents to the case being dealt with summarily. It is a considerable reflection on the education provided in elementary schools that in 99 cases out of a 100 the man consents to be dealt with summarily, yet I think that the House will realise some of the thoughts that pass through the mind of the man in giving his consent. If a case of simple larceny is dealt with summarily, the punishment can be only six months' imprisonment. If the man elects to go to quarter sessions to be tried, he is liable to a punishment of five years' penal servitude. Another consideration which will weigh with him is the delay, with a charge hanging over him, that will take place before he can be tried by quarter sessions. Any time up to three months may elapse between his appearing in the police court and his trial. He agrees, therefore, to be tried summarily, and he is convicted by the police court.

In his own eyes he believes himself to be innocent and that he has good grounds of appeal. What is his position? He must first within seven days give notice of his intention to appeal, not only to the clerk of the court, but to the other side. Within three further days he must enter into a recognisance to pay the costs of the appeal. He may also have to find sureties and the court has power to order him to pay down a deposit. The path of an appellant is not any easy path, and it is made more difficult by the practice applied by the clerks of courts of summary jurisdiction. The average recognisance or deposit in the police courts is £50. What poor man at the present day can find £50 and pay it within ten days of being convicted? To the rich man it presents less difficulty, but to the poor man it is insuperable. The House may have heard of a certain sneer of Lord Justice Mathew, and I will repeat it because it has considerable point. Lord Justice Mathew said: "In this country justice is open to all, like the Ritz Hotel." If the man is able to pay that £50, what is his next difficulty? The poor man under my last Measure has the advantage of being defended by a solicitor in the police court, but on his appeal to quarter sessions that advantage is no longer with him. However poor he is, he is unable to obtain legal aid on appeal before quarter sessions.

Just contrast this path of an appellant with his path if he takes the other course and elects to be tried by a jury at quarter sessions. If poor, he has the assistance of a solicitor and counsel, and if he has good grounds of appeal he can appeal without paying any deposit or any recognisance. In the Court of Criminal Appeal since 1907 he has been able to have the assistance of counsel in prosecuting an appeal. The result can be seen from the crime statistics. I am hampered to some extent in being able to quote only the statistics for 1930, the others not having been published. In that year 8,000 persons were convicted at courts of assize and quarter sessions. Out of that number 442 appealed. In the same year, in courts of summary jurisdiction, 520,000 persons were convicted, and only 314 appealed. I ask the House to consider these figures. There were only three-quarters the number of appeals out of 60 times the number of convictions.

At first sight that would appear to proclaim a sense of satisfaction, of placid confidence in the decisions of those who preside in courts of summary jurisdiction, a greater satisfaction than with the decisions of men who have spent their lives in learning the law of evidence and in judging the merits of a case; but if we look at the result of the appeals I think a different story can be told. Out of the 442 appeals to the Court of Criminal Appeal from the proceedings of quarter sessions and assizes, in only 23 cases was the conviction quashed, in 28 cases the sentence was modified, and in 391 cases the appeal was dismissed. Out of the 314 cases of appeals from courts of summary jurisdiction, in 102 cases the conviction was quashed, in 81 cases the sentence was modified and in only 131 cases was the appeal dismissed. I ask the House to weigh well those figures—in the one group only one in every 20 cases a wrong decision; in the other one in every three a wrong conviction. In fact, in appeals from the courts of summary jurisdiction the decision was found to be wrong in more cases than it was right.

It may perhaps be said that I was fortunate in my year, 1930, and to guard against that suggestion I put certain questions to the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department two days ago to ascertain the figures for 1931. In appeals from assizes and quarter sessions during 1931 the conviction was quashed in 30 cases, the sentence was modified in 35 cases, and in 448 cases the appeals were dismissed. In appeals from courts of summary jurisdiction convictions were quashed in 91 cases, the sentence was modified in 117 cases, and in 140 cases the appeal was dismissed. I think the House will realise that these figures are about an average year by year of what goes on under the present law, and they show that in cases of appeal from the courts of summary jurisdiction the decision is altered more times than it is allowed to remain. It may be thought that the alteration of a decision occurs only in minor matters, and that in graver charges the courts of summary jurisdiction are right. To meet that point I have two sets of figures which I will submit to the House before passing away from these statistics. In 1930 16,484 persons were convicted in courts of summary jurisdiction of simple larceny, a matter involving the question of the honesty or dishonesty of some person. Out of those 16,000 cases only 33 persons appealed. In 10 of those appeals the conviction was quashed, in 15 cases the sentence was modified, and in only 4 cases was the decision upheld.

One other set of figures relates to convictions in courts of summary jurisdiction for indecent exposure. In those cases 1,216 persons were convicted. There were only 13 appeals, and in 8 cases the conviction was quashed, and in three cases the sentence was modified and in only two cases was the decision affirmed. I submit that those figures present a most alarming and grave situation. I ask the House whether it is satisfied that among those 1,216 persons there were only 13 who wished to appeal, only 13 who had gone to appeal and only 8 persons whose conviction should have been quashed. It is remarkable to note the smug complacency with which this country has for so long allowed the rich a chance to appeal but deprived the poor of the same opportunity.

The object of my Bill is to remedy that situation, and if hon. Members will turn to its provision I will very shortly explain it. In Section 1 the Sub-section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which lays down that recognisances must always be paid by an appellant is repealed. Before taking the serious step of suggesting the repeal of a decision of this House on so important a matter I had the curiosity and interest to look up the Debates in the House when the Summary Jurisdiction Act was being considered in 1879. I wanted to see what mention there was of the inequity and injustice of these appeals. I found that the House considered at some length the inequity and injustice of the position of clerks of the peace under the Summary Jurisdiction Bill. The then hon. Member for Penryn, Mr. Cole, said:

> "He knew many gentlemen who had accepted the position of clerks of the peace for counties and had given up their profession in reliance upon receiving the fees payable in that office. These gentlemen in many cases would lose £500 or £600 a year by this Act; and he would ask if this was fair, right or just."

The position and the argument was put even more clearly by a gentleman, obviously from Wales, Mr. Lloyd Morgan, who said:

> "This Bill itself furnished some remedy for the loss of fees by the provisions made for appeals. But the number of these, it was well known, would be very inconsiderable, because prisoners and their relations were usually very poor, and in cases where they were defended before the magistrates their means were so exhausted that they were unable to prosecute an appeal. How few appeals, except in bastardy cases, ever come to quarter sessions? He ventured to say the appeals under the provisions of this Bill, so far from adding in any essential degree to the fees at quarter sessions, would add very little indeed. Therefore, it came to this, that the incomes of the gentlemen who held the offices of clerks of the peace, and who took those offices on the supposition that the fees were to be continued to them, would be very seriously diminished."

That was the only argument addressed to the House of Commons upon the justice or injustice of the provisions for appeal under that Act. I think the House, in considering those arguments now, will appreciate to what a length we have gone to-day. We no longer consider whether certain gentlemen gain or lose by the amount of crime which is prosecuted in their Courts. We are trying to help the position of anybody who is before the Court upon an important criminal charge.

Clause 2 of my Bill provides that where a would-be appellant is in custody and desires to appeal the Court may, if it thinks fit, release him on bail pending appeal. Section 3 gives an appellant without means the right that is at present enjoyed by the appellant without means to the Court of Criminal Appeal. That right is granted so that the appellant shall have similar advantages to that of a man under the Poor Prisoners' Defence Act, 1930. I have drafted Section 3 very closely to that Act, so that the legal aid should be given by the recorder or chairman of quarter sessions, and not by the court of summary jurisdiction. It is practicable, because in nearly all cases the appeals to quarter and borough sessions are taken on the second day, and therefore the recorder or the chairman will have opportunity during the first day to consider the question of means, and whether legal aid should be allotted. I have done it, because there is a certain amount of feeling in the country that there might be bias on the part of courts of summary jurisdiction in granting legal aid. I do not wish to subscribe to that view, but it is desirable when such is the fact to take appropriate precautions. A book was published this year on English Justice by a Solicitor, putting forward that point very strongly, and it would be well for the House to secure that the question of legal aid should be in the hands of the recorder or the chairman of the quarter sessions. Section 4 of this Bill exempts Scotland and Northern Ireland, enlightened places where the poor are already provided for.

It is a simple little Bill. It is backed by members of four parties in the House, and I believe that it will commend itself to the members of the other three parties when they read it. I would like to attempt to meet some of the objections that may be made to it. First of all, it may be said that the Bill is badly drafted. I take the full responsibility for the drafting, but the amateur draftsmanship of the Temple can be remedied in Committee stage by the professional skill of the Whitehall draftsmen, if the Bill is allowed to go to Committee. It may also be objected that a departmental committee is sitting upon this matter. The Committee was set up on 7th July, 1932, and had its first meeting six months later in January. It is a strong Committee in which I have great confidence. I believe that it will report soon and decisively, but I would suggest that this matter is urgent. Yesterday, to-day and to-morrow men have been, are being and will be convicted, and deprived of the opportunity of appealing against the decision because they have to pay £50 recognisance. I ask the House not to admit the objection that a Departmental Committee is sitting upon the subject. If, as we hope, that Committee reports before this Bill reaches the Committee stage, I shall be most pleased to amend the Bill to meet any recommendations of that Committee that will provide for the better regulation of the appeals from courts of summary jurisdiction.

I have heard it whispered that there may be an objection on the grounds of economy. I say "whispered" because I challenge any hon. Member to set up that objection by a speech in this House. If there are double the number of appeals as a result of this Bill, and if in every additional case the man is poor and cannot get legal aid, Section 3 will cost the country the sum of £600. If hon. Members think that this country is in such a terrible state that we cannot afford £600 for justice, I suggest that every hon. Member should forgo £1 of his salary to pay the expenses of this Bill. I do not believe that the country will stand any economy in bare justice. It may be objected that the Bill will lead to frivolous appeals, and that men with no case will prosecute their appeal because they do not have to pay any recognisance. Perhaps I should admit that there is a slight risk, but that risk is provided for under that part of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, that I have not repealed. Under Section 5 of that Act the Court of Appeal has power to order any unsuccessful appellant to pay the costs of the appeal, and that is, to a certain extent, a prevention of a man appealing in a frivolous manner, because the court may punish him by calling upon him to pay what would be a considerable sum, varying between £50 and £100.

Hon. Members may say that this Bill is an innovation. For long we have suffered under this system of recognisances. It is an old-established principle and canon of law that if a man is detained in prison he shall not have to find a recognisance to pay the costs of an appeal. I will refer to the words of the Master of the Rolls, Lord Esher, in 1896. He said:

> "Where the liberty of the appellant is in question, or where highly penal consequences will be entailed upon the appellant by the order appealed against, so far from thinking that the court is bound in any case to make an order for security of costs, I think, as a general rule, that the court would not do so."

What the High Court decided nearly 40 years ago in the interests of justice, and laid down as a canon of law, it is high time that this House should apply to the courts of summary jurisdiction.

There is one omission that I was very reluctant to make, and I had considerable doubt as to whether I was right. My hon. and learned Friends will notice the omission more than lay hon. Members. I have omitted all appeals by way of case stated. My reason for doing so was that there is, as the House will realise, considerable congestion in the High Court at the present time. Appeals by way of case stated must be tried under the present procedure by three of His Majesty's judges. To encourage this form of appeal would result in greater hardship and injustice to other litigants, because there would be even greater congestion in the High Court. It may be that additional judges will be appointed, and, if so, I think that the objection to this step would be gone; but, in any event, I would suggest that it is a matter for discussion in Committee, where the Committee can, if it thinks it right to do so, also repeal Section 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, and allow appeals by way of case stated to be made without recognisances. As my Bill stands, people would have to enter into recognisances before prosecuting an appeal by way of case stated, although not in the case of appeals to Quarter Sessions. I would make an appeal to those hon. Members who not only desire a reform in regard to appeals from courts of summary jurisdiction, but also desire to reform courts of summary jurisdiction themselves and the system of justices of the peace, not to overload this Bill. Whether the system of courts of summary jurisdiction is the wisest that man can devise is, in my view, outside the scope of the Bill. It is, I would respectfully submit to the House, not a fit subject for a private Member's Bill, but is a matter of great importance to be raised by way of Motion, as it was in this House before Christmas. I ask the House not to mix up the vexed question of the fitness or otherwise of justices of the peace with the provisions of this Bill.

A man can make a mistake; a lawyer can make a mistake; and the records of the Court of Criminal Appeal show that Judges can make mistakes. How much more can these justices of the peace—men chosen without any legal qualification, with no experience of the weighing of evidence—make mistakes? That is the way in which I would ask the House to look at the matter. Admittedly, mistakes are made in courts of summary jurisdiction, but, nevertheless, appeals from those courts alone are hampered. England is a great democracy, but, in regard to appeals from courts of summary jurisdiction, she adopts a system that would be condemned by every form of government except a plutocracy. I would ask the House, in considering this Bill, to realise that English justice is, and has for long been, our pride, but that at the present time, for the poor man who is convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction and wishes to appeal, English justice does not exist. It is in order that every man, however rich or however poor, may enjoy his birthright of justice, that I ask the House to give a Second Reading to this Bill.

11.39 a.m.

Sir WALTER GREAVES-LORD: I beg to second the Motion.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Thirsk and Malton (Mr. Turton) upon the very careful way in which he has introduced this Bill; and I should also like to congratulate him upon the good luck he has had since he has been in this House. Some of us have been hammering away at this and other questions for quite a considerable time, and it is not with any feeling of envy at all, but with feelings of sincere congratulation, that we say we are glad that my hon. Friend, within his short period in this House, has been able, by the luck of the Ballot and by his own persistence, to be associated with two Bills, one of which is now on the Statute Book, and the other, we hope, will be on the Statute Book soon.

It has always seemed to me that the position with regard to appeals from courts of summary jurisdiction was absolutely indefensible. We have gone to no small pains in this country to perfect the right of appeal from the higher courts. From quarter sessions and from the Judges dealing with criminal administration we have been careful to provide the most adequate safeguards for any man who has even a suspicion that he has been wrongly convicted to appeal to the highest authority; and yet, during all that period, we have left the courts where there is the greatest liability to error alone, and have virtually deprived the poor man in those courts of any right of appeal whatsoever. It is not in accordance with the practice of the administration of justice that that should be the case. My hon. Friend's quotation from Lord Esher went to show that the practice of the High Courts in civil matters was largely against penalising the poor man by any orders for security. Orders for security are made in civil matters on appeal and they are made for the purpose of providing against the possibility of the unsuccessful appellant being quite unable to pay the costs of the other side. That is a serious matter, because it is necessary to be just to those who have to defend these appeals as well as to those who prosecute them, and many a man has been ruined by the bringing of an unsuccessful appeal against him involving his being put to the expense of defending the appeal and trying to uphold the decision, and then not being able to recover a large part of the costs occasioned by the other side.

Even in those cases, however, the appeal courts in civil matters have been extremely careful not to make an order for security in such a way as to stifle the appeal. Time and again appeals come before the Court of Appeal on accident matters, and the Court of Appeal is asked, in its discretion, to order the appellant to pay security as a condition of prosecuting the appeal; and, where the appellant is a poor man, and is appealing against a decision depriving him of damages or compensation for personal injuries, it is the rarest thing for the Court of Appeal to make any order that goes beyond £20 at the outside, and the average amount is about £10 or £15. And yet, in cases where a man's liberty has been taken away, he has, by orders of justices, in many cases been deprived of his right of appeal unless he has been in a position to deposit a sum of £40, £50 or £80. It is a strange commentary upon the difference between the administration of justice by some courts and the general administration of those who are trained in the administration of justice. I think we are entitled to say, when people are apt to gird at lawyers, that we shall find on this matter a definite concensus of opinion among lawyers that there should be no hindrance to the administration of justice in its fullest liberality to all classes.

I should like to say a word about this curious system of recognisances on appeal from justices. As my hon. Friend has pointed out, a party who seeks to appeal from an order of justices is called upon, within three days after giving notice of appeal, either to enter into recognisances or to give security by way of deposit for the prosecution of the appeal. It may interest the House to know that there is by no means certainty that the deposit or recognisances will be used for the purpose of paying the costs which are due to be paid by the unsuccessful party, because, while that hindrance is put in the way of the man who appeals, it is a matter of the discretion of someone else as to how those reconnaissances are used.

For example, what happens on an unsuccessful appeal? Take it that the appellant has been compelled to give security for, say, £50 for the prosecution of the appeal. He is unsuccessful and an order for costs is made against him. They may tax out at anything from £15 to over £150, but the average is probably £30 or £40 at the outside. The costs are not paid. A motion is made to estreat the recognisances, that is, to enforce them by taking possession of the deposit. One would have thought that, as that was a condition of the appeal, the money obtained by forfeiting the deposit would be used to pay the successful party's costs. Nothing of the kind. In Lancashire, if you make an order estreating the recognisances, the money, if recovered, goes into the funds of the Duchy of Lancashire, and it is entirely a question for the discretion of the Duchy whether it is used for the costs of the successful party or for Duchy purposes. The question of what to do in circumstances of the forfeiture of recognisances is one which causes Chancellors of the Duchy from time to time very considerable anxiety. But it is just the same in other parts of the country. The money is forfeited to the Crown. The person who has been unsuccessful in the appeal may be a private individual. It is within the discretion of those who advise the Crown whether the money that is forfeited shall go to the payment of the successful party's costs or be used for Crown purposes. It seems rather ridiculous to put upon a man a condition which may deprive him of his right of appeal, and which is supposed to provide against frivolous appeals and to provide for the payment of the successful party's costs, when in truth and in fact there is no such definite purpose about it, and it is entirely a question within the discretion of someone else whether it should be so used or not. That has always seemed to me a ridiculous position.

There is one matter which my hon. and learned Friend has deliberately left out, and that is the question of appeal by case stated. I should have thought there was no real excuse for leaving it out on the grounds that he has given, although I do not think anyone will suffer materially by it being left out. As a rule, appeals by case stated are not asked for except by persons who can very well afford to do it, and, in any case, whether the case is granted or not is again entirely in the discretion of the magistrate whose decision is being appealed against. There are cases where you can enforce a case, but in most cases it is at the discretion of the court. There are well-recognised grounds upon which a matter can be dealt with by refusal or otherwise, but surely in those cases there is in the very conditions of the appeal an adequate safeguard against frivolous appeals. That being so, there is a complete safeguard against anything in the way of extravagance, and I should have thought there was no real objection to including those cases within this Bill as well as the others.

Of course, everyone realises that in the main what a man wants who appeals from a court of summary jurisdiction is really a re-trial, and that is what is obtained by an appeal to quarter sessions. The possibility of error is great. It is amazing what things can happen in a court of summary jurisdiction. I am not making any general attack upon magistrates. The lay magistrates perform a difficult duty, very often with little or no training, and they perform it on the whole extremely well. I do not mean by that that I think they are ideal tribunals. I think they might be replaced by tribunals which would deal with cases with less risk of bias and prejudice than lay justices—but there are strange things. Only a short time ago I came across a case where, on the hearing of a summons, the respondent, on the plaintiff's case being ended, was approaching the witness box to give her evidence when she was told by a policeman, "It is not you they want, but someone else." She was turned out of court, the case proceeded and an order was made because the defendant had not appeared. One would think it was impossible for a thing of that kind to take place, and yet it took place in one of the best managed police courts in the country.

I have known within quite recent times this sort of thing happening. A man was present in a police court. He heard a case from beginning to end. The defendant was sentenced to two months' imprisonment without the option of a fine. The man was so filled with a sense of the injustice of the proceeding that he went to the magistrate and offered to provide security for the prosecution of an appeal if the defendant wanted to appeal. An order was made for £10 as security. There is not the smallest doubt that, if the defendant had been left to his own resources, he would never have found even the £10 as security for his appeal. One has come across all sorts of cases. You have certain friendly societies particularly to look after people who are convicted—I do not mean friendly societies in the legal sense but, for example, the Jewish friendly society who look very carefully after their own race. I have known quite a number of cases where persons of the Jewish race have been convicted and ultimately the convictions have been set aside where, without that help that is given so freely by all classes of the Jewish race to their own people, those appeals would never have been brought because the very small sum asked for security could not be found. It is not satisfactory that the righting of wrongs should depend on a haphazard system of that kind. It is a blot upon our judicial system that there should be even the possibility of that sort of thing.

I agree that one matter which will have to be considered in Committee is the possibility of the opening of the floodgates to frivilous appeals, but I think that idea of a flood of frivolous appeals may very easily be exaggerated. On the whole, the British people have a fairly accurate sense of justice, particularly when they realise that, in the case of an appeal from the court of summary jurisdiction to quarter sessions, the court has the right to increase penalties. You have in that a fairly good safeguard against frivolous appeals. At any rate, that sanction has worked very well in connection with the Court of Criminal Appeal, because it has the same power. There are a number of people who might have been tempted to appeal from decisions of the judge of first instance were it not for the fact that they realised that there was power in the Court of Appeal to increase the sentence in case they should wish frivolously to appeal. As far as that matter is concerned, I think that it may very well be considered in Committee. Some of our Dominions are very much more advanced than we are in these matters. I believe that in South Africa there is provision made so that the appellant court may be correctly informed if an appeal is brought, particularly in cases which involve the liberty of the subject. Provision is made for a shorthand note to be taken, and where the judgment is challenged—and I am not certain it does not apply whether judgment is challenged in the first place or not—there is an officer deputed to read the shorthand notes, and, after reading them, to decide independently of any tribunal whether leave for appeal should be given, and, if it is given, it is not marred by any such difficulty as the recognizance which prevents appeal in this country.

I do not desire in any way to delay the House on this matter. It is a matter which, I think, every Member of the House will hereafter be proud to have assisted. People do not always realise the guilding principle of the administration of justice in this country. People are apt to jeer at what they think are the archaic points of our laws of evidence. They do not take the trouble to consider the why and the wherefore of those rules of evidence, but a little examination would show to them that the guiding principle of our courts is certainty of proof, and that our rules and laws of evidence are directed towards obtaining certainty of proof, so that there shall be nothing haphazard or slipshod in the administration of justice, and that is particularly so in connection with the criminal court. Behind it all is the definite notion that the fact that a guilty person may occasionally escape is of no lasting importance at all. The one fact which, in the opinion of all connected with the administration of justice, would mar and condemn our system would be the slightest possibility of an innocent person being convicted. That is the guiding principle, and it does surely necessitate that in all cases where orders can be made by way of imprisonment or by way of fine, there should, at any rate, be all reasonable opportunities for diminishing the margin of error and for putting any errors right. It is because I believe that this has been an outstanding blot upon our system and never ought to have been there at all—it is indeed a contradiction of the ancient form of Magna Carta—that I warmly support the Bill. This practical prohibition of the right of appeal of poor people from courts of summary jurisdiction has been a denial of justice, and as a denial of justice it should be wiped off the Statute Book. Our law should be freed from it, and I hope that this Parliament, will take steps to see that the blot is removed for ever from our system of criminal administration.

12.1 p.m.

Mr. RHYS DAVIES: It is very difficult and, indeed, almost dangerous for a layman to intervene in a Debate of this kind, but I rise in the main to prove, if that were necessary, that the Bill is backed by laymen as well as legal Members of the House of Commons. I too must congratulate the hon. Gentleman the Member for Thirsk and Malton (Mr. Turton) not only for his luck in the ballot but because he has chosen this particular proposal and embodied it, as I think may well be the case very soon, in the law of the land. The only qualification I possess for intervening at all in this Debate is that some years ago, I sat upon a committee under the chairmanship of Lord Justice Finlay who inquired into this particular problem and we reported that something of the kind contained in this Bill ought to be done. I ought also to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hacking) upon his elevation to the position of Under-Secretary of State at the Home Office. I think that it is proper that I should do so. I wish, however, that he was a Minister in a very much more intelligent Government, but of course that is not his fault. I hope that with his entry into it the Government will be less stupid than they have been in the past. But that has nothing to do with this Measure; we are all united I believe on the provisions of the Bill.

I hope that I may be able to say just a word or two to help the Measure to pass into law speedily. When I was asked to back the Bill it did not require anything more than the reading of its main provisions to convert me, and I will read the Clause which appealed to me most. It is quite a simple but important provision.

> "If it appears to the court of general or quarter sessions to which an appeal from a conviction or order of a court of summary jurisdiction lies that the means of an appellant or respondent are insufficient to enable him to obtain legal aid, and that it is desirable in the interest of justice that such appellant or respondent shall have legal aid, the court may grant him a defence certificate, and the provisions with respect to defence certificates in the Poor Prisoners Defence Act, 1930, shall apply."

That Clause appealed to me in this way: there must be something done very soon in this country to obliterate from the minds of the people that you can still purchase justice provided you have the cash with which to do it. I think that that idea prevails in the mind of a goodly number of people. It is true to say, I think that where it does not require any money to be deposited in a case at law justice is meted out in this country on a very even scale indeed. But those of us connected with the trade union movement have had experiences of this kind, and I hope hon. and learned Gentlemen who are more conversant with the technicalities of the law than I am will find no difficulty in admitting my argument. My experience as a trade union official has led me to this conclusion. Where persons are members of a trade union they are always better equipped to secure justice merely because they are backed by the finances of a powerful organisation. I have been astonished that working people are not members of trades unions, if only for this reason—and here I must pay tribute to some of the County Court judges—that when a Workmen's Compensation case goes to County Court often the first question that is asked by the Judge of a working man is: "Are you a member of a trade union?" I am afraid that if I proceed further on these lines I shall convert hon. Members into joining my trade union, but possibly they already belong to a trade union of their own. I have come across cases where injured workmen have fallen out of trade union membership or have never joined one. I have known cases where one man has been charged with exactly the same offence as another man, and the person who is outside the trade union has suffered penalty whereas the man inside the trade union wins his case. The trade unionist can always secure the services of a very eminent advocate to defend him.

If the intentions of the Bill are, and I believe they are, to secure justice irrespective of whether a man is rich or poor, I have the greatest pleasure in supporting it. The Bill is very necessary. I speak from experience as a member for a long time of the Departmental Committee of the Home Office on the treatment of young offenders. This problem came before that Departmental Committee on occasions in a fairly acute form. If I know anything about the problem it is this: and the hon. Member who seconded the Second Reading of the Bill and has a very wide experience of these matters also mentioned it, that I have a feeling somehow that although the Bill is travelling on the right road it does not go far enough. I would very much have liked to see justice in every section of the courts secured without the feeling that you are able to buy it with money. As a layman who has had to deal sometimes with cases when they have entered the court, it seems to me that it is not sufficient for the court to feel that justice has been meted out, but the courts must so act that it appears to the defendant himself that he has secured justice: It is not sufficient that the verdict satisfies the judge; it must seem to the man in the dock that he has had justice at the hands of the court. I quote the best authority in saying that the law is not reasonable unless it harmonises all the conflicting interests of the community and secures the well being of the whole. It is a fact that there are poor, decent men who on occasion are caught in the meshes of the law through no fault of their own and through no fault of anyone else either. It appears later that they have committed no offence at all against the law. We all desire that justice should be done to rich and poor alike; and as this Bill is in the main a Bill to champion the cause of the poor in prosecuting their rights in our Courts of Justice, I heartily support it.

12.10 p.m.

Mr. THORP: I am sure that it is hardly necessary for any of us to endorse the appeal that has been made by my hon. Friend who moved the Second Reading of the Bill, but at the same time I think it is not quite right to say that there is one law for the rich and one law for the poor, although in so far as procedure is concerned, it does not infrequently happen that that state of affairs comes about. The law remains the same, but having regard to the procedure which is open enabling a rich person to carry an appeal forward whereas a poor person is not in a position to do it. The Summary Jurisdiction Act was passed 54 years ago, and at that date the position and powers of the magistrate not only in the number of the cases they had to deal with, but the powers which they had to exercise, were very much less than they are to-day. A very considerable number of Statutes have been passed, and it seems to be the tendency nowadays to put the decision of cases into the hands of magistrates in summary courts and petty sessions, and into the county court, whereas in the olden times they would have gone to the High Court. This process has been going on and the jurisdiction of the magistrates has been very widely increased. They have been given much more extensive powers in the way of dealing with cases, but the right of appeal from the magistrates has remained limited as it was before.

I entirely agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Norwood (Sir W. Greaves-Lord) when he says that extraordinary things can go on in petty sessions and before the magistrates. We all know that when they do extraordinary things those magistrates who have been acting extraordinarily are less likely to fix a reasonable amount of security and so enable what they have been doing to be challenged in any court. Moreover, it very often happens, and to some extent it is a great advantage, that magistrates sitting in petty sessions have known all his life or all her life the antecedents of the particular person brought before them, and they cannot help at times unconsciously allowing that personal knowledge of the individual to weigh with them, rather than dealing with the case, as they ought to do, simply and solely on the evidence before the court.

May I suggest to my hon. Friend the Mover of the Second Reading that some words might be put into the Bill by which the court of quarter sessions or some other court over the magistrates should have power, upon appropriate cause, to extend the time within which an appeal may be made and entered upon. It has been rightly said that recognisances must be entered into within three days and notice of appeal must be given within seven days. It would be advisable to consider the insertion of some words which would enable those three days to be extended, by a further order to that effect if necessary, and to enable that period of seven days also to be extended. I believe I am right in saying that if a person is convicted by the magistrates and unable to obtain his or her release by reason of not putting up the security at once, there is exhibited in the cell of the prison to which the person is taken a notification with regard to the time within which he or she has to appeal, but it occasionally happens that people do not appreciate the importance of acting punctually within that time. I suggest that, on appropriate cause being shown and proper security being given, someone should have the right, which no one has now, to extend the period of seven days, and so enable a person who had allowed the period to go by to put in an appeal.

The hon. Gentleman who spoke last said that people very frequently find themselves prosecuted in police courts through no fault of their own. There are so many rules and regulations to-day, that I doubt whether everyone in the country at some time is not a criminal in the technical sense of the word. He may be fortunate enough not to break the eleventh commandment in that he is not found out. At the same time, there are all sorts of technical matters—offences under the London Building Acts, for example—which, quite unconsciously, people do contravene. In those circumstances, having regard, as I say, to the great tendency to extend and increase the amount of work that has to be done by justices, I do think that there ought to be no difficulties whatever put in the way of prosecuting these appeals. It has always struck me as being particularly illogical and stupid that where you send very often difficult cases to be dealt with by non-technical justices involving very considerable sums of money, that the less training the tribunal has, the less right of appeal there is from that tribunal. It does seem to me to be a perfectly impossible situation, and, in the circumstances, I think the House, if I may say so with the greatest respect, has received this Bill with sympathy. I hope that it will give a Second Reading to the Bill, and that it may, after Amendment in Committee, come into operation as soon as possible.

Mr. LOVAT-FRASER: I wish to add my quota of support to this Measure. We are all familiar with the emblematic figure of Justice in female form with a band round her eyes holding in her hand a pair of equally balanced scales; but those of us who have been associated with the administration of justice know that that figure is rather an ideal than a fact, and an ideal to which, I am glad to think, we have been for many years steadily approximating. The criminal history of this country is appalling reading. At the beginning of last century boys were hanged for stealing apples. Men and women were executed in droves, and we honour men like Sir Samuel Romilly and Lord Brougham for their successful efforts in bringing to an end the worst features of our criminal system. George the Fourth is not one of the Sovereigns of our country of whom we speak with very much respect, but I do honour his memory for one thing, that he detested the rigour of our criminal system, and did his best to lessen it.

This afternoon we are engaged in taking another step in the direction of the amelioration of the law. We have now a state of things which is a very real injustice to the poor. My hon. and learned Friend who spoke last made a reference to the shortness of time allowed for finding recognisances and security. That shortness of time is a very real grievance. There are Members of this House, I have no doubt, who are quite financially sound who, if they were suddenly called upon to find £50, would have some considerable difficulty in doing so. That applies with still more force to the working man, and I endorse and support the remarks of my hon. and learned Friend with regard to the desirability of removing that injustice. We are all influenced—I confess that I am largely influenced—in supporting this Measure by the character of the summary courts. I have on former occasions in this House expressed my opinion of the average magistrate, but my hon. Friend who opened the Debate deprecated discussion of the Bill from that point of view, and I do not want to pursue it. But I should like to mention the first experience I had which shook my faith in the tribunal of the justices. I happened to be defending a farmer on a charge of watering his milk. I was instructed by some farmers' society. The farmer was duly tried, and, in face of the most cogent evidence to the contrary, he was convicted. I was so shocked that I took the opportunity some little time after of speaking to one of the magistrates who had given the decision, and expressed my astonishment and amazement at that decision. His reply was, " Mr. Fraser, everyone of the magistrates wanted to acquit the farmer, but, for some reason or other, the clerk wanted to convict him, and he stood with his back to the door and would not allow us to leave until we had convicted ". That case in my own experience illustrates the character of some of the decisions in the summary courts.

The fact that there are frivolous appeals is no reason for depriving men who ought to have the right to go to courts of appeal, or for not removing the injustice under which they suffer. But I do not fear an undue number of such appeals. Even if the law be altered, and it ceases to be necessary to find recognisances and security, it still will be an irksome matter for a man to pursue an appeal. If he is a working man he has to come to the court, losing a days' work, and have all the embarrassment and worry of appearing personally in Court. I do not therefore think there will be a large number of frivolous appeals as a result of passing the Bill. There is one class of the community in particular who figure in one's mind when one is considering the propriety of bringing about this reform. I refer to the motorists. There are a large number of motorists now who earn their living by running a motor vehicle of some kind. I do think that these men are sometimes subjected to injustice. They have their licences suspended, and have not the means to carry the matter beyond the courts of summary jurisdiction, and with the growth of motor traffic and the increasing number of motorists who are liable to be punished by having their licences suspended, it is desirable that this reform should be brought about.

There is one other matter and I am finished. My hon. Friend who introduced the Bill said that he did not want to overload his Bill, but there are one or two difficulties which he ought to consider, and which, I think, ought to be met. I should like to ask him whether anyone under a Probation officer would be brought within this Bill. I would also ask whether the Bill will apply to private as well as police prosecutions. Next, how about the persistent offender? How are you going to deal with him? Then, will the Bill apply to both conviction and sentence, and if the appeal is successful, should the respondent pay the appellants costs? I throw out these matters for consideration of my hon. Friend as matters which ought to be considered in Committee, and made quite clear. With these few remarks, I wish strongly to support what I believe to be an overdue Measure.

12.25 p.m.

Mr. LLEWELLYN - JONES: In supporting the Second Reading of the Bill, may I congratulate the hon. Member upon the lucid manner in which he has explained its provisions. At the present time magistrates have such wide powers that a Bill of this kind is necessary. In 1879 the cases tried by courts of summary jurisdiction were comparatively few, but since that date Parliament, in its wisdom, has greatly increased the powers of magistrates in regard to cases which come before them, and it is rather peculiar that the position, so far as courts of summary jurisdiction are concerned, should have been allowed to remain as it is. The poor litigant is in a different position to the wealthy person. Take the initial stages of a case, even before it comes before the court of summary jurisdiction. A man who is possessed of means and is brought before the court upon a charge, whether serious or not, is from the outset able to engage the best professional assistance. The majority of cases which come before courts of summary jurisdiction and even before the county court and the High Court are not won in the court itself but in the preparation of the case before it is brought to the Court, in the securing of evidence and finding what witnesses can be brought to speak in support of the defence. That is where the wealthy litigant succeeds as compared with those who lose their case in the courts because of faulty preparation. At the start a rich man is in a different position to a poor man.

What happens in a court of summary jurisdiction. His name is called, he steps into the box or stands in front of the table. He is not professionally represented and does not realise the power which the magistrates have in the matter. He pleads not guilty to the charge. One or two witnesses are called by the police, who are assisted by a solicitor, and after the witness has been called he is asked whether he has any questions to ask. He endeavours to make a statement but is immediately told by the chairman or the clerk that he must not make a statement then but will have an opportunity of making it later. After asking one or two questions he finds himself in some considerable difficulty as to how he should proceed. He desists; and in many cases—I have realised it often myself as I have sat in the court—a little further cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution would probably have resulted in an entirely different impression upon the justices. Afterwards he gets an opportunity of going into the witness box and giving evidence on oath or of making a statement. The difficulty of a man who has never been in court before must be apparent to all. He is asked if he has any witnesses to call, but those who could have supported him have not been subpœned and he is left without the assistance which he ought to have had to present his case properly. The bench convict, and sentence him to a fine or term of imprisonment.

Then he begins to realise that something has gone wrong. He feels—this is not a solitary case, it happens week after week—that owing to the fact that his case has not been properly put before the bench that injustice has been done. He wants to appeal. Anyone who takes the trouble to look through the pertinent section in the 1879 Act will realise that it is absolutely hopeless for the ordinary layman, who has had no experience of legal work, to appreciate exactly what has to be done in the case of an appeal, and the number of cases which have gone to the High Court are such as to indicate that it would be well to repeal the whole of this Section and have a new provision dealing with appeals of this character. This also must be remembered in comparing what takes place in a court of summary jurisdiction and at an assize or quarter sessions. Such a large number of cases are now within the competence of magistrates that with the exception of certain very serious offences they can deal with almost the whole range of the criminal law.

Compare their procedure with that of the assize court or quarter sessions. Where a plea of " Not Guilty " is put in the man is tried by a jury. The Judge, or the chairman at quarter sessions, sees as witness after witness is called that he does not make any statement which is not strictly in accordance with the rules of evidence. If the prisoner is not being defended by counsel the judge is particularly careful that he gets his assistance in the way of eliciting all the evidence which may be necessary in order to enable the jury to come to a satisfactory conclusion. Having heard all the evidence, and the jury having been addressed by counsel for the prosecution and the defence, the judge proceeds to direct the jury as to their verdict. He sets out the facts of the case as clearly and as succinctly as possible and indicates to them the questions which they should ask before coming to a conclusion as to whether the prisoner is guilty or not. But even then, as has been pointed out, there are many cases where injustice has been done. The number of cases which go to the Court of Criminal Appeal and the large number of the successful appeals, would indicate that the success of the appeals is due to the fact that the Judge or Chairman of Quarter Sessions or Recorder has misdirected the jury or failed to direct them.

What is the situation with regard to the bench of magistrates dealing very frequently with a type of case that will be heard by a Judge of Assize and go to the Court of Criminal Appeal? The magistrates are in the position of both judge and jury. The defendant or his legal representative has not the remotest idea as to what steps have been taken in directing the magistrates as to the decision to which they are to come. They may be directed. Perhaps there is a chairman with a great deal of experience, and when the justices retire he reviews the evidence from his notes. In many cases possibly the justices are not even competent to do that, and they have to take the direction of their clerk, who may be learned or may be far from competent to deal with an intricate case. They come back into court, they give their decision, and the defendant does not know on what ground they have come to that decision.

Look at the difference in the case of the man who has been convicted at Assizes. Every precaution has been taken there to see that the jury are properly directed. The defendant has an immediate right of appeal without going through anything like the intricate procedure which is outlined in the Act of 1879. Not only is the procedure simple, but he is able to appeal without being called upon to deposit anything in the way of costs or to enter into recognisances. The unfortunate litigant in the police court finds himself face to face with the intricate procedure of the 1879 Act, and is also called upon to enter into recognisances. The experience of most practising solicitors in various parts of the country is that the justices as a rule, anxious that if the appellant fails in his appeal the costs shall be forthcoming, insist on the deposit of an amount of money being demanded from the defendant. It is in the very cases where a man cannot get any satisfactory sureties because he is a poor man that this demand is made.

One wonders how it is that this procedure has been allowed to continue for such a long time. One knows that justices very often resent any suggestion of an appeal. The suggestion of an appeal is regarded by many of them as a kind of unwarranted reflection upon their capacity to deal with the cases that come before them. I know from experience that in a very large number of cases the justices do all in their power to discourage appeals. We must not imagine that the number of cases in which injustice is done to a defendant is small. Up to a few years ago there was scarcely a week when I was not in some police court. In a very large number of cases in which defendants were not represented and the magistrates had given their decision, it was quite a common thing in the conversations between solicitors or counsel practising in the court, and myself, to hear the remark "A pity this poor fellow had not someone to put his case before the court." It was a case in which clearly there ought to have been a different decision, had the defendant's case been put properly.

The statement has been made that this Bill may lead to frivolous appeals, but I do not think the possibility of a small number of frivolous appeals justifies the denial of a provision for those persons who have good ground of appeal. It is important to realise that the majority of cases that come before a court of summary jurisdiction are cases in which the police are the prosecutors. From the beginning all the resources of the State are at the disposal of the prosecution. How different is the position of the defendant in those cases. The great ideal in connection with the administration of justice is that every step within reason should be taken to enable the courts to come to a decision as to guilt or innocence. If there has been any miscarriage in the court of first instance the person who feels that he has had an injustice done to him should not be placed at a disadvantage. The Section of the Act of 1879 which this Bill would repeal is unnecessary in the case of rich litigants, but it is cruel if a poor man stands before a court and realises that an injustice has been done to him.

[Mr. Llewellyn-Jones.]

The Judges of the High Court have on more than one occasion referred to the position. I shall end by referring to what Lord Atkin said about three years ago in addressing a meeting of the Magistrates' Association. Lord Atkin in the address which he delivered to the Association put the case for my hon. Friend's Bill in a very clear and convincing manner. This is what he said:

> "I want to say something about the question of appeals. I am glad to be speaking in the presence of the Lord Chancellor who, I know, has this matter present to his mind. I consider that the whole system which exists at the present moment of appeals from justices to quarter sessions is old-fashioned and really quite unjustifiable. You have had your jurisdiction increased enormously. There are dozens of cases now heard before the justices which, in the old days, would have been heard at quarter sessions or assizes. If those cases were heard at sessions or assizes, the accused person would have the right of appeal without cost or trouble. He would only have to apply for leave to appeal in respect of some matters, and, on a question of law, he would have an appeal as a right. He could put his case without any formalities at all, and it would be quite certain to be very carefully considered by His Majesty's judges, and I know with what care they are considered. That case comes before the justices now and he has lost all those rights. He has got a right of appeal but only if he gives sureties and gives notice within a certain time. The rules are very technical. The truth of the matter is that it is only relatively rich men who can appeal at all from the justices. The poor are incapacitated from doing so; they are tied up by regulations which are sometimes so technically administered as to amount to a perfect scandal."

It is because I believe that Lord Atkin's words ought to be listened to with respect by all in this House and because I believe that this Bill is one step in the direction of dealing with this scandal that I trust the House will give it a Second Reading.

12.48 p.m.

Sir WILFRID SUGDEN: I should like to join with other Members in most hearty congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Thirsk and Malton (Mr. Turton) for the very careful and splendidly prepared speech in which he submitted this Bill to the consideration of the House. Those of us who know something of my hon. Friend's quality at the Bar feel that he will soon emerge into the ranks of those who are known as "learned in the law," and certainly if the progress of this Bill to the Statute Book is what we hope it will be, he will have made his contribution to the legislation of this country in a fashion and a form which will be very helpful to the people of our country. I wish to say a few words in anticipation of what the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Office will probably say when he comes to speak on behalf of the Government. The hon. Gentleman may have in his mind the idea—although I know that neither my hon. Friend who introduced the Bill, nor the supporters of the Bill intend it—that the Bill may be some sort of reflection upon the magnificent lay magistracy of this country. I wish to say, frankly, that we are not in the slightest degree questioning the efficiency of our splendid lay magistracy. Nothing of the kind is intended.

We all know that a lay magistrate to-day, because of the enormous extra duties imposed upon him, requires an education and a prescience which a High Court judge of two centuries ago did not require. Let me give a specific instance from my own experience as a barrister, if the House will forgive a reference to personal experiences. I would point out to hon. Members how carefully our justices study the various Local Government Acts. There is no magistrate with less than 10 years' legal training and without legal knowledge as well as other knowledge, who can correctly adjudicate in respect to breaches, sometimes criminal breaches, of the Local Government Acts of 1925, 1930 and 1932. It is impossible for a lay magistrate unless he has had some legal training or experience to adjudicate correctly on some of the extremely difficult Acts of Parliament which this House has placed on the Statute Book for the protection of the people. I have in mind two men who were Members of this House for a dozen years and who have entered the legal profession, not for the purpose of practising it, but in order to fit themselves to discharge their duties as justices. Therefore, I hope that the Government will not imagine that we depreciate in the slightest degree the care and pains which magistrates take in discharging their duties and in dealing with those who come before them for justice.

In passing, may I say—although it has no immediate connection with the Bill—that many of us hope that at a future time some necessary qualifications will be required in connection with the appointment of lay magistrates. I hope that in the future it will not be considered sufficient qualification that a gentleman has reached a certain age, and has got the leisure time, or that he has rendered some special service to his town or his county. I hope that it will not be taken as a sufficient qualification for a person to become a magistrate that he or she may have been an important person in connection with some political body. We hope that the time is not far distant when, before a person is appointed to the magistracy, he or she will be required to show efficiency in being able to deal with the complicated legislation which has to be administered to-day.

Some hon. Members have said that there are certain other considerations which ought to be included in the Bill. My hon. Friend, I am sure, when the Bill goes into Committee, will be willing to include, if the Committee in its wisdom approve, any matter that may arise which is appropriate to the Bill. The last speaker referred to the question of frivolous appeals. That raises a very knotty question and I am not sure that even the Act of 1879 with its many Clauses entirely covers the position. But my hon. Friend is very properly seeking to eliminate Sub-section (3) of Section 31 of that Act and to include the provision which is set out in Clause 3 of this Bill. With this Bill on the Statute Book it ought to be possible to deal with such matters as frivolous objections. We know the admirable work which is done at present by the probation officers and to my mind it should not be impossible, still to use the old 1879 Act, along with the provisions of the present Bill and take advantage of the work of the probation officers and of local associations. These societies, some of them of a benevolent type, provide assistance for prisoners in cases of difficulty where, it may be, the prisoner has no means or where there is no opportunity within the scope of various Acts for him to be represented.

In respect to the matter of cost, these are days in which we play with millions, in a way in which in the old days we spoke of hundreds, and if it be possible that £600 may be the expense of administering one feature of this splendid Bill, when we consider some of the Measures which we have passed, but which have not brought their full value in relation to the cost incurred, I do not think it right that we should consider £600 as an insuperable barrier. Even if it does entail the appointment of one or more extra Judges, I do not see that this House should stand on that matter. At any rate, justice should be done, and, if this question of money is to enter into a clear application of what is right and proper for the poor folk, I say that £600 or even the cost of an extra Judge should not stand in the way of appeal.

My last point is as to the possibility of an increase of sentences under the Bill. I think most of my hon. and learned Friends know that that would not arise in this matter, and some of us say, with great respect, that this at present is not possible. It has been suggested that sentences might be increased, but I do not see how that could be. I have gone very carefully through the old Act and studied the Clauses of this Bill, and I really cannot see the possibility of that objection. Let us give this Bill a chance, and if so be that it wants moulding or shaping somewhat and that the Parliamentary draftsman feels that in some of its phraseology it may not correctly and properly apply in the best interests of those concerned, I am sure my hon. Friend who introduced it would be only too pleased to adapt and alter it accordingly. This is an opportunity for better justice for those who cannot afford always to fend for themselves in a court, and I give it my hearty support.

12.57 p.m.

Mr. LYONS: I should like to offer my warm congratulations to the hon. Member for Thirsk and Malton (Mr. Turton), who presented this Bill, on the clarity, detail, and force with which he did so. Hon. Members on all sides will welcome this Bill, I feel sure. It has always been an indefensible anomaly that in these days, with the jurisdiction of magistrates so widely increased, they themselves should have the power, after deciding a certain issue, to perform an act which in itself is a barrier to allowing an aggrieved person the opportunity to question the merits of the decision against him which they have made. When one thinks that this arbitrary right of taking away from the accused and convicted person the opportunity to challenge that decision is one which that court has, and which no High Court Judge wants or is allowed to have in the whole of our legal system, it makes one wonder what the circumstances were that enabled a court of this nature to be in a different position from that of any other criminal court in the land.

In judging this matter, I think we must bear in mind how gravely increased is the jurisdiction of magisterial courts to-day, and how they decide in so many cases on matters which are virtually matters of life and death to the person charged before them. Of all courts where there should be a free application of any right of appeal, I think this stands out as the court most needing to give the freest right to a reconsideration of its judgments. As has been said by one of the supporters of the Bill, there is no real understanding of how a magisterial court comes to its decision, and, assisted as they are by a clerk, we have that clerk standing in a position which is outside any real criticism, in that he is not a member of the court and yet may play a very active part in bringing the decision of the magistrates to a point against the prisoner charged before them.

There may come a time when the whole question of magisterial courts will have to be reviewed, and some uniformity of system fixed, and perhaps the present system swept away altogether, but, as my hon. Friend, in introducing the Bill, said, it is merely intended to assist justice in the system already established. I think every hon. Member listened with great interest to the statistics which he gave, but there is one set of statistics which he did not and could not give, the absence of which this House has to consider, and that is the number of cases where men have gone away from our police courts smarting under a sense of injustice, with a grievance that might be very well-founded, and yet, by the consequential decision of the magisterial court itself, those men have been precluded from putting to the test the decision which has been given against them, because of the fixing, by some arbitrary arrangement, of a surety which operates as a barrier against their having an appeal before a properly constituted higher court.

We do not know what those statistics are, but I do not hesitate to inform the House that one has seen many, many cases where difficult points have been considered by justices, who have come to a decision which, on the face of it, is open to very grave argument and is such that the man concerned is affected on account of a conviction which means everything in this world to him. They have come to that decision and have, by fixing the surety which they now fix under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, erected what to that man is an insuperable barrier. I know of many cases, as, I am sure, do many of my hon. and learned Friends, where men anxious to appeal have been denied the rights which they ought to have had by the corollary to a conviction by a biased bench, which has convicted a man and then set a barrier against appeal which is discretionary in their hands altogether. It is that arbitrary right to fix that barrier after there has been a conviction that this Bill attempts to abolish.

The hon. Member who introduced the Bill stated that it might be urged against him that the Bill would encourage the making of frivolous appeals, but under the Summary Jurisdiction Act the court trying an appeal will have every power, and may be able to make any such order as could have been made by the court of first instance. The exact words of Sub-section (4) of Section 31 of the Act of 1879, in the last part of the Sub-section, are perfectly clear, and are as follow:

> "or may make such other order in the matter as the Court of Appeal may think just, and may by such order exercise any power which the court of summary jurisdiction might have exercised, and such order shall have the same effect and may be enforced in the same manner as if it had been made by the court of summary jurisdiction."

Those words, which will not be interfered with by the Bill now before the House, will give to the Court of Appeal ample power to inflict any legal sentence they like on a man who has appealed, in their view, without any just ground, and that court may have the same power as the Court of Criminal Appeal now has in dealing with any appeal against a sentence which the court thinks is not well founded. The question of expense does not enter into the matter at all. In every case involving a certain sentence of imprisonment the accused man has to be asked if he is willing to be dealt with summarily or whether he wants to be tried by a jury, and the exercise of this choice to be tried by a jury might well put the country to greater expense than the removal of the blot that still exists on the fair name of Justice.

An hon. Member made a point as to the effect of Clause 3 of this Bill. By virtue of the 1930 Act, which, by a strange piece of luck in the Ballot, was also initiated by my hon. Friend who introduced this Bill to-day, power was given for the first time to a bench of magistrates sitting as a court of first instance to give out of public funds aid for the hearing before them of any case where they thought the gravity of the case warranted it and the means of the prisoner would otherwise prevent him being defended. One can assume that there will be no real hardship on a man who is given the benefit of the Poor Prisoners Defence Act before the court of first instance and then, when an appeal is made, that Act becomes operative by Clause 3 of this Bill. Although that legal aid may not operate on the appeal until the first day of the quarter sessions, there will be no hardship from the delay, because the case will be fresh in the mind of the solicitor who represented the man at the police court. It is right that this Bill does not deal with what is known as the "case stated", and I think my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Norwood (Sir W. Greaves-Lord) put the position with accuracy when he pointed out that a different class was mainly affected by those appeals than the class proposed to be included in this Bill. The hon. Member who introduced the Bill was wise in avoiding the criticism that would have arisen from overloading it. The appeals which come by way of "case stated" are interesting and important, but largely academic. They are intended to get a decision on a matter of importance in which the question of costs does not as a rule arise.

This Bill is the poor man's charter of the police court, where a conviction may give a man the mark of felony, and such courts are the last courts which should have the arbitrary right to make their decisions final. The Bill gives to that man the absolute unfettered right of saying that he will have the decision of the court tested by an appropriate, competent and qualified court of justice. I hope that when members are considering this Bill they will recall the extraordinary anomaly that it is the only court in the land which is administering justice which is not legally qualified. For the smallest debt sued for, the claim is considered by a legally qualified tribunal. The class of case which is tried in the police court, with all the implications that follow a conviction, is tried by the one untrained, unqualified court in the land. It comes to a decision through devious methods, not one of which is shown in the light of day, by a system depending on a gentleman who is not a member of the court, who may not perhaps assist in the more serious deliberations. The court comes to a decision after having applied its mind in private in certain personal directions, and probably bringing into consideration antecedents which they are unable to withstand.

I cannot see any argument that can be advanced against a Bill which seeks to make a right of appeal from that tribunal, which, of all others, should have a ready system of appeal. It is not within the ambit of this Measure to discuss magisterial alterations which some of us would like to see. My hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Lovat-Fraser) made one or two caustic observations about the present system of magistrates. It may well be that in these days of enlightenment, the present system is wholly inadequate. It may be argued that some magistrates do very good work indeed. I venture to say that the inferior courts of the land should not have the absolute right of blocking any challenge to their decision on matters which mean life and death to convicted persons. One sees amounts fixed by way of so-called recognisances which have no relation at all to the costs which might reasonably be involved in the appeal which it is sought to make against magisterial decisions. They are fixed for the one obvious purpose of stopping an appeal which a convicted man wants to make, especially when they come from a bench which has expressed strong views against the prisoner and against certain types of offence. This gives grounds for the allegation inside and outside the court that something more than justice, something more than a desire for justice, is tempering the findings of the bench. Justice must not only seem to flow, but must flow. It must not only be there, but it must be made available. One would stand aghast at a High

[Mr. Lyons.]

Court judge or a learned recorder desiring to usurp to himself the right to say that he shall block a man's right of appeal. Without leave on matters of law and with leave on matters of fact, there is an unfettered right to appeal against a verdict to a superior court.

No question of costs has to be considered by a convicted man who desires to appeal on a matter of law against conviction in a court presided over by one of the ornaments of the judicial benches of the world, namely, a British Judge. The question of costs is not considered by the Court of Criminal Appeal in their desire to reach justice. To allow the question of costs to impede justice in the most inferior court in the land is, in my submission, archaic and indefensible, and an anomaly which should be swept away at the earliest possible moment. I am very glad to have had the opportunity of backing this Bill and offering my observations upon it, and with great respect I venture to offer the final hope that the House will give every possible facility to the passing of a Measure which in the time to come will be a great satisfaction to every one of us who had the privilege of being here to take an important stand in promoting the desire to give justice to the working class, to the poorer classes, to everybody within our gates who is entitled to justice irrespective of financial considerations.

1.16 p.m.

Mr. JANNER: There can be no question that any hon. Member of any party who has had the slightest experience of procedure in police courts will readily and willingly give support to this Bill which was so ably moved by the hon. Member for Thirsk (Mr. Turton). When the question of legal reform was before the House some little time ago it was my privilege to emphasize, to the best of my ability, the importance of this particular move in the direction of remedying a very serious evil and difficulty. After all, the important thing to consider in this regard is the number of people who are affected and the reason why, out of the great number of cases tried before courts of summary jurisdiction, so few persons appeal against the decisions of those courts. I say with great respect to my hon. and learned Friends in this House that the people who really have the experience in this important matter are those who have contact in the first instance with the individuals concerned, and they are the solicitors. There is no solicitor who has practised in the courts who does not realise that there are innumerable convictions which could and should have been the subject of appeal, and which are allowed to pass merely because of the financial difficulties that stand in the way such as the finding of recognisances, the finding of sureties or other technicalities which at present exist. In 1931 some 630,000 cases were dealt with in the police courts, and only 200 of those involved considered that they were in a position to lodge an appeal against the decisions. If justice is to be done, the poorest in the land must have equal opportunities with the richest.

It has already been said that the law does not make any direct provision for assisting the rich against the poor, but the fact of the matter is that in practice the poor man is put in a worse position than his rich neighbour. The reason is obvious. A rich man would not dream of going into court even for the most trivial offence without having legal assistance. It might not even be necessary for him to appear. His lawyer would conduct the case on his behalf. The poor man, on the contrary, has to appear in a court where everything is entirely strange to him. He finds himself hustled, possibly, with dozens of other people waiting to appear before the magistrates. When he is brought before the magistrates he attempts to ask questions or to state facts in the wrong place. When he is told that he must ask questions, often he does not understand how to do so. Everybody who has been in a police court for any length of time and has watched these cases will know that is so. If the defendant wants to say anything he is told that he must wait until the end of the case for the prosecution. He is told that he has the opportunity of examining or cross-examining witnesses. In the end he becomes entirely confused, and does not give expression to the true facts of his case, simply because the atmosphere of the Court is entirely strange to him, the surroundings are strange to him, and he has not the manner and the lucid method of expression which are often so necessary, even in the most trivial cases, if a correct decision is to be arrived at.

In many cases the magistrates have not time to deal with each case in great detail. They deal with those cases which are presented to them by advocates and others because they have got to deal with them, but they do their best to hustle or to get through the business as quickly as possible, and, indeed, one cannot altogether say that it is their fault if the person before them is not capable of expressing himself. They have to take the facts as they are presented to them and do the best they can with what may have been very poorly said. In those circumstances a large number of errors are bound to be committed. The magistrate is, after all, only a human being. He has his "on" days, if I may put it that way, and his "off" days. He may be apt to forgive on one day and on another day to impose a heavy sentence, or a heavier sentence than is justifiable. On one day he may be in a mood to acquit and on another day he may be moved by virtue of unexplainable feelings to convict. That being the position apart from other considerations the defendant ought to be given the opportunity, irrespective of his financial position, of appealing against a conviction. He should be given the opportunity of taking advice, and if he finds that what he thought when he entered the court was a trivial matter has become to him a very serious matter by reason of a conviction which he did not expect, then he should be given every facility to enable him to appeal against the conviction.

Already we have heard what are the obstructions in his path. We have heard that the question of expense to the State will immediately arise if facilities are given for appeal, but surely we are not at this stage in our history, going to allow any question of expense to assist the miscarriage of justice even in the slightest degree in the case of even the poorest and lowest of our people. Reference has been made by the hon. and learned Member for Norwool (Sir W. Greaves-Lord) to the fact that certain institutions exist to assist individuals in difficulty by giving them financial aid or an opportunity of taking legal advice, but the position should not be reduced to that level. I have the greatest admiration for those institutions particularly in my own constituency which year in and year out give legal advice freely, institutions which are constituted of Members of all parties. They give their advice and assist in every conceivable degree, and are very useful to enable persons to overcome difficulties of this nature. Nevertheless they are not in a position to cope with the vast majority of cases that require dealing with, and when it comes to a question of appeal. I think it will be appreciated by the right hon. Gentleman, or whoever is going to reply on behalf of the Government, that there is an intense feeling throughout the country, and in every district, that this matter must be dealt with by amending the law itself. I hope that the Government will accept this Bill, although in my view it does not go by any means far enough to deal with all the difficulties that exist.

I am not in full agreement with some other hon. Members who have spoken, because I am sorry that the hon. Member who introduced this Bill did not include appeals on stated cases. Why should hon. and learned Members presume that when a person finds himself anxious to question the jurisdiction of a court, or desires a case stated on a legal question although there are intricate technical difficulties to be observed, that this person should not be entitled to have the case stated with similar facilities as the person who goes to the court of quarter sessions on appeal? It is just because those intricacies exist that those of us who have given careful attention to this matter of appeals for some considerable time feel that appeal ought to made easier. Much more than that, we think that the formalities which have to be observed—in regard to the case stated, for example—and which are almost unknown to 75 per cent. of the petitioners in the courts without referring most carefully to their books should be removed. Appeals should be considered in the light of a poor person being able to conduct them even without legal assistance, and notices should not have to be in a strict and confined form. Notices should not have to be given to eight or ten magistrates and should not have to be delivered within certain times without right of correction. There should be a certain amount of elasticity in that respect. The suggestions that are contained in this Bill do not go far enough in that regard.

[Mr. Janner.]

There is another way in which the provisions of the Bill might be amplified. Many hon. Members who have spoken during this Debate have said that magistrates are not men who are presumed to be fully versed in the law, and that they are laymen. One hon. and learned Member said that magistrates have to study for 10 years before they are able to administer the Acts to which he was referring. We all know that lay magistrates do not spend 10 years, they do not spend 5 years, on study of the law. They go to the courts and they take, in most cases, an intelligent interest in what is happening. They listen to the facts. Some of them have experience because they have been in the courts on previous occasions. Some of them have read the "Justice of the Peace," or some other journal which is published for use by magistrates and they rely to a considerable extent on the advice given to them by the learned magistrates' clerk. If the contention of hon. and learned Members is true, the present system of appeal is from one set of magistrates of that description to another set of magistrates of the same description. Appeals are taken from a court of summary jurisdiction to the quarter sessions and at the quarter sessions the same type of gentlemen are sitting, unless a recorder is sitting. There may be an appeal from a stipendiary who is a man versed in the law, to a court of quarter sessions where men are sitting who are not versed in the law. The whole thing seems to be anomalous.

I should have liked to see an additional Clause in the Bill. I am not blaming the hon. Member for Thirsk (Mr. Turton) because I realise that the thin end of the wedge has to be put in first. It is not an easy job to move even a National Government in a matter of this description, but the thin end of the wedge is being put in very well. I would like to have seen a proposal whereby the court of assize might have been made the court of appeal in certain cases or that a recorder or someone versed in the law should sit at the quarter sessions when a case comes up for appeal, so that there might be some higher authority than the court of summary jurisdiction to hear the appeal. This is the only instance in the whole of the English legal system where an appeal is taken from the decision of one set of individuals to the decision of another set of individuals who are practically on the same plane, and who have, in many instances, similar amount—or lack—of legal training. In other instances, the court of appeal may have had a very much less experience in legal practice and in legal procedure than the court of summary jurisdiction. I understand that one of our learned judges is a justice of the peace. It would be rather interesting to know what would happen in the event of that learned judge giving a decision in the court of summary jurisdiction and, upon the case being taken from the purview of that court to a court of appeal where a lay bench was sitting, the appeal court should decide that the learned judge had made an error on a question of law.

My appeal to the House is the appeal of one who has seen much of these difficulties and who has had to advise persons that although I thought there were grounds for appeal—the lawyer himself is, of course, not always sure—and that there might be a successful issue on appeal, yet at the same time it was impossible to proceed. "Here you are," I have had to say, "placed in circumstances where you must find sureties, and you must do things which are entirely outside your power. In the circumstances, you had better stay in prison, or you had better pay the fine, and be satisfied." That is a most unsatisfactory state of affairs. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to accept this very useful and small attempt to remove the difficulties.

I am not anxious to delay the House in regard to the other points which have been referred to. There is no reason why this Measure should not be sent to Committee. There are many people with vast experience of these matters who would be able to assist in introducing new Clauses, and an opportunity would, I take it, be given to the Government to attack those Clauses if necessary. On the other hand, very useful assistance might be given to the Government in arriving at conclusions satisfactory to themselves and to others concerned. I do not know what are to be the findings of the Committee that is sitting, but I suppose we shall get those findings in a very short time. My own view is, if I may say so with respect, that they will probably coincide to some considerable extent with the views which have been expressed by some of us here this morning, and I venture to believe, indeed, that they will coincide with some of the views that I have expressed myself.

Be that as it may, here is the chance to get on with the job. I would say, let this Bill go to a Committee, and, while it is going through the Committee stage, let us have this report, and let us add to the Bill further, if necessary, on the strength of the report. After all, the Government must not be too anxious to confine to themselves the privilege of introducing a Measure of this description. Private Members are entitled to some little right in that regard. Let the Government help the Bill forward by giving such assistance as is necessary to mould it into further shape, with the benefit of their experience and knowledge. I commend the Measure to the full mercy of the Government and of its spokesman to-day; and I think it would be a gracious concession on the part of the right hon. Gentleman if he would say now that he is convinced, having heard nobody in the House speak against the Measure, that this is an appropriate time for the introduction of a Bill of this description, and that he will do his utmost to help it through the Committee stage.

1.38 p.m.

Mr. GOLDIE: My somewhat limited experience of this House has led me to the very definite conclusion that it is in the best interests of all concerned that Members should only address the House when they have first-hand knowledge of the subject that is being debated. For that reason, I have abstained on many occasions from inflicting myself on the attention of the House; I think I have only spoken on one previous occasion. I feel, however, that, as one who has had some 20 years' experience as a member of the junior Bar in the North of England, and some four years' experience as a Recorder, I may, perhaps, be allowed to pay my tribute to the first-hand knowledge displayed by the hon. Member who so ably introduced this Bill. I am sure he will not for one moment think that I am criticising the general principle of the Bill if I make at a later stage a few suggestions which may render the Bill even more useful than it is in its present form.

I should like to draw the attention of the House to a point of view which has not yet been dealt with. I speak as one whose duty it is to administer justice as a Recorder in a large industrial borough in the North of England. I have had the privilege of occupying that position for some four years, and during that time, although the indictable offences in the borough have decreased almost to vanishing point, correspondingly the non-indictable offences dealt with summarily by the magistrates have increased enormously; and yet I can assure the House of a fact which, to those hon. and learned Members who are present, may seem almost incredible, namely, that in the whole of these four years I have never yet had to try an appeal from a conviction. Why? Because of the obstacles which prevent a poor man from obtaining the justice to which he is entitled.

I pass to another subject, and one which, I confess, for certain reasons which I need not elaborate, I feel considerable difficulty in bringing to the attention of the House. There is no question that the most difficult cases with which the ordinary recorder or chairman of quarter sessions has to deal on appeal are maternity cases, and I think there can be nothing more terribly shocking to any man who is conscientiously trying his hardest to get at the truth of a case of that kind than to realise that, in practically every case that comes before him, the man is the appellant, and not the unfortunate girl with whom things have gone wrong. In my experience, and I think the hon. Member for Newton (Mr. Essenhigh) will bear me out in this, the number of appeals by girls against orders made by the court below is infinitesimal compared with the number of appeals by men against charges which, rightly or wrongly, have been made against them. There is something wrong there.

We have all paid our tribute to the lay magistrates, but let it be remembered that, in the particular kind of cases with which I am now dealing, the lay magistrate, the recorder and the court of quarter sessions start with the absolute knowledge that somebody has already committed perjury, and is going to commit it again, because, when you have at the back of the court an infant, you have there the living embodiment of a lie as to what has already taken place. It follows logically from that that these extraordinarily difficult matters must be dealt with by skilled legal minds. What is to be done? Surely, it must be made possible for these appeals to come before people with trained legal minds, and this is where I venture, with the greatest respect, to criticise my hon. Friend's Bill. It is to be remembered that every one of the appeals which would come within the provisions of the Bill in its present form are bona fide, but he will bear me out from his own experience that there is a certain stamp of cases in which a girl deliberately chooses the man whom she thinks most likely to pay. It is a horrible feature, but it is known to everyone; and it is these cases that have to be watched keenly by trained legal minds.

[Mr. Goldie.]

"Mewling and puking in the nurse's arms,"

Let me give a personal experience, which I remember a good many years back. There was a lad, a chauffeur, who was engaged to a charming girl, a housemaid in a neighbouring house. He was happy, and looking forward to being married in some two years' time, when he got promotion. Suddenly another domestic made charges against him which, had they been substantiated, would have ruined him for life. It was my privilege to investigate the case. The matter came before a bench of lay magistrates, who were equally divided. On the second day the case was heard again, and, by a majority of one, an order was made against him. The matter was taken to quarter sessions, and the Recorder stopped the case at the end of the girl's evidence. Had it not been for the generosity of his employers, who were determined that justice should be done and that a proper investigation should be made—it cost them, if I remember rightly, something like £150, not a penny of which they recovered—that boy would have been ruined for life, instead of being, as he now it, a happily married man living with his wife and family.

Let us go one step further. What is to be done in order to ensure that the appeals are bona fide appeals? We may put on one side altogether the enormous number of petty, non-indictable offences. I do not think anyone would seriously suggest that, if a man were fined half-a-crown for not having his name and address on his dog's collar, or something of that kind, he should be given a right of appeal to quarter sessions. This would seem to be unnecessary when we are not dealing with serious indictable offences. But what are you to do where a man who has had a fair trial says to himself: "I am going to risk getting my punishment increased." With some experience, I have never known a punishment increased at quarter sessions. I am going to put my opponent to all the trouble I can. I am not going to be a penny worse off. I propose to appeal and take the chances." What are you to do in the case of a young girl who is deliberately out for blackmail? A young girl, provided she gets additional evidence, has in the period of a year the right to go to court again and have, to put it bluntly, a second run.

Mr. LLEWELLYN-JONES: Or she can remove her residence and go to another court and obtain an order.

Mr. GOLDIE: In the case I mentioned just now, of the chauffeur, the girl could take him to quarter sessions or still further, or she could blackmail a rich man against who she has made false allegations. We ought to have some protection against that danger. I do not want to be captious, I welcome the Bill, but I think it would be a most excellent idea if a similar procedure to that which exists in connection with the court of criminal appeal was introduced.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Whitechapel (Mr. Janner) on the point that he made as to the utter futility of appeals from three magistrates in a police court to three magistrates on a county bench. In the part of England in which I practise you get a full bench on appeal. On an appeal from three magistrates you will find at Kendal 20 magistrates, at Carlisle 25, and at Preston I have seen as many as 70. You get what was intended by the Act, a proper appeal to a full body. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Flint (Mr. Llewellyn-Jones) will recollect one sessions where a second court is formed and three magistrates solemnly hear an appeal from three other magistrates in a lower tribunal. It is reducing appeals to a farce. Unless you have a properly constituted bench there is something wrong. What I suggest is this. Let the court of first instance, if they care to do so, give leave to appeal. Assume for a moment, as is highly probable, that the local bench, under the able guidance of their learned clerk, say, "Most certainly not." Let the appellant have a right to insist on the magistrates' notes being sent to a committee composed of the chairman of county sessions possibly the deputy chairman and possibly the clerk of the peace, and let it be investigated there, and let there be an appeal to the chairman of the county sessions or to the recorder.

Mr. LLEWELLYN-JONES: I should like to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman how he would deal with the case of the lay chairmen of quarter sessions? Many of them are scarcely competent to deal with the matters in chambers in the way suggested.

Mr. JANNER: What would my hon. and learned Friend do in the case where the magistrates' notes are not complete, as they very rarely are, and what would be the effect of such a suggestion when the chairman of the county bench would later probably have to decide the issue between the appellant and the respondent?

Mr. GOLDIE: I should have thought that if the matter was dealt with in, let us say, the equivalent of the county council offices we should be getting nearer to it, but I agree that that is a difficulty and one which might well be considered. I am not suggesting that the recorder should try the issue at all. All he has to do is to have in front of him sufficient material to enable him to say: "This is not a blackmailing case, This is a case in which there was really grave doubt." I am convinced that the hon. and learned Gentleman is in this case performing a real public service. I only hope that some day I shall be in the happy position of being successful in the Ballot, and, if the hon. and learned Gentleman should a third time be successful, may I commend one subject to him which needs careful attention—a reform of the bastardy law. In the court below the dice are loaded against the man every time, because he does not know what case he has to meet. Under the law as it stands, the dice are loaded against the girl in the court above, if she can get there. It is because the hon. and learned Gentleman is performing such a really valuable service in seeing that justice is made level both for the man and for the woman in these cases, which are so repugnant, that I most unqualifiedly support the Bill.

1.55 p.m.

Sir REGINALD CRADDOCK: It is naturally with some hesitation that I intervene among such a community of experts as have been addressing the House this afternoon. I cannot claim to be a trained lawyer in any sense of the word, but I have had a great deal of experience, particularly with the administration and work of magistrates, both paid and honorary, in another country. I am certainly led by that experience to give my warm support to the Bill now before the House. I have been accustomed to so great a latitude of appeal that it is generally criticised as being unnecessarily wide and causing unnecessary trouble, but I have never shared that opinion myself. I have always thought that if you tried to restrict the right of appeal in any way you would certainly deprive a great many people of chances, which they ought to have and which might secure, either their being set at liberty, if they were in prison, or having their fines cancelled or reduced if they were not in prison. From what I have heard to-day, there are considerable difficulties in the way of appeal in respect of the records which are available in the appellant court. We are accustomed in India to have all the evidence taken down in longhand, generally for want of sufficient typewriters, by the magistrate himself or in the case of honorary magistrates, who work throughout the country by the clerk. But we have this at least, an unpaid judiciary or magistracy which is above suspicion. You do not here get a landowner applying to be made a magistrate in order that he "might support himself and his family."

I do not want to go into the details of the Bill, because I am not very familiar with them, but I was trained for two years as a probationer in the Indian Civil Service. I had to go round to courts in the different grades in this country and submit reports upon them to the Civil Service Commissioners, and it was a most helpful training. I also had seven years' experience as a magistrate of various grades in India, and, in my opinion, the question of whether a man is guilty or not guilty, of what is evidence and what is not evidence, and of the rights to be given to a man to appeal against a decision are really questions of justice which are the same no matter who the people may be, or the country in which you are administering the law. Whether they are highly civilised or backward the great principles of law and justice remain the same, and it is for that reason that I have great pleasure in supporting the Bill.

1.59 p.m.

Mr. ESSENHIGH: In rising to support the Bill, I wish to congratulate most warmly my hon. Friend the Member for Thirsk (Mr. Turton) upon introducing it, and I should like to say, as one who has practised for some years at the Junior Bar, how necessary is such a Measure. I say it not only as a practitioner, but as one who some years ago gave voluntary services to the great organisation known as the Poor Man's Lawyer. In the city of Liverpool, where the society is well organised, there are young members of the Bar and of the profession of solicitor who are seeing week after week not merely dozens, but hundreds of cases. In Liverpool and in Birkenhead the society is flourishing, and members give of their time and services in advising unfortunate people who are not able to afford to pay for legal advice. On the occasions on which I have given advice literally scores of people have come to me. They have come with a grievance and a smarting under a sense of injustice very often against courts of summary jurisdiction. We have found that, whereas in some cases there were really no grounds for complaint, in many cases there were just grounds for complaint. They had misunderstood the whole of the position and the proceedings, and felt very strange indeed in what to them were strange surroundings, many of them appearing for the first time within the precincts of a police court. They wanted to know, in most cases, what they could do; could they appeal?

In all those cases one was able to say, "You had good grounds of appeal, but you are out of time." Not only that, in the cases in which the applicants were in time they had not the money to enable them to proceed. In a good many of the courts throughout the land recognisances and deposits mostly in the region of £50 are demanded. I know of no case where the recognisance has been fixed at less than £30. How in the name of common sense can a man who may be unemployed and receiving transitional payment conjure up thirty pence, let alone £30? I heard of a case a short time ago—it was not one of my cases, but a case of a colleague of mine—of a man who had been convicted and sentenced to a month's imprisonment for an offence under the Highways Act. He was a motor driver and had been driving for 20 years with not a single thing against him. On this particular occasion, probably due to an error of judgment in the exigency of the circumstances, he did something which was wrong, and was convicted. On that conviction his licence was taken away, for I forget whether it was taken away for three months or 12 months. The man's job went, and it was only because a friend came along and found the money that he was able to appeal. The conviction was upheld, but the sentence was reduced and varied to such an extent that he was fined, the suspension of his licence was revoked, he got his licence back and he was able to carry on with his job. If there was one case like that, and one only, it is sufficient justification for this Bill.

It has been erroneously stated in the Debate that if a person appeals, the court of quarter sessions may increase his sentence. I have taken part in a few appeals at quarter sessions and I have never known a sentence to be increased. I have always argued that a sentence cannot be increased on appeal. If we look at the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, Section 31 (5) we find that:

> "The Court of Appeal may adjourn the hearing of an appeal and upon the hearing thereof may confirm, reverse or modify the decision of the Court."

"Confirm or reverse." That is what the courts of quarter sessions have to do on appeal. They may say: "We are going to confirm this conviction and sentence," or "We are going to reverse this conviction or sentence," or "We are satisfied that the conviction is right," or "We think that the sentence is excessive." Modification of the sentence must surely mean a reduction of the sentence and not an increase. There is no question that that was in the mind of the Legislature at the time that the Criminal Appeal Act was passed, because Section 4 (3) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, says:

> "On appeal against sentence the Court of Criminal Appeal shall, if they think that a different sentence should have been passed quash the sentence passed at the trial and pass such other sentence warranted in law by a verdict whether more or less severe in substitution therefor as they think ought to have been passed, and in any other case shall dismiss the appeal."

The Court of Criminal Appeal obtained their right to increase a sentence by virtue of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907. I beg hon. and right hon. Members not to be dissuaded from supporting the Bill be the thought that the person who appeals may have his or her sentence increased.

Another point which has been raised and stressed in the Debate is that this Bill is a grave reflection upon the magistrates of the country. Is it? If a person is given the right of appeal without having to enter into recognisances, is that to say that it is a reflection upon those people who are doing their job extraordinarily well, and to the best of their ability? Can it be said that that is a grave reflection upon them? If so, when you give the right of appeal, or the right to apply for leave to appeal, under the Criminal Appeal Act, are you going to say that that is a grave reflection upon His Majesty's Judges? That cannot possibly be said. Therefore, I ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Office if he is thinking that this proposal may be regarded as a grave reflection upon the magistrates, to dismiss that idea from his mind, and I ask hon. Members to dismiss such an idea from their minds. Some lay magistrates have had legal training and some not. They have their clerk to guide them and in most cases he is an experienced solicitor of many years standing. He is the person who should guide them as to matters of law, either in the court or when they retire to their room to consider whether there shall be a conviction and, if so, what the sentence shall be. But the magistrate's clerk cannot always be there and his assistant, although he may be extraordinarily good in many matters, may have no legal qualifications, and he may retire with the magistrates and advise them on questions of law.

The hon. and learned Member for Warrington (Mr. Goldie) thought that there might be a whole lot of people wanting to appeal. The point is as to whether they should have the right and who should give them that right. The hon. and learned Member for Warrington suggested various people. If you are going to have someone to scrutinise as to whether there shall be the right of appeal and whether leave to appeal shall be given, surely one need not go further than the county court judges. Many cases that are brought before courts of summary jurisdiction are cases that require competent legal knowledge, cases such as have been spoken of by the hon. and learned Member for Warrington, bastardy cases and the like, most delicate cases, involving tremendous knowledge of the law of procedure. Surely it would not be difficult to hand these over to the county court judge to decide whether he should give leave to appeal. The question of tribunal as to whether leave to appeal should be given ought not to stand in the way of the Bill receiving a Second Reading.

I feel, and a good many Members of my profession feel, that very great injustice is done by not permitting people the right of appeal without having to deposit these large sums of money by way of security. I beg the Under-Secretary on behalf of the Government to give the Measure his blessing and to put right what is justly felt to be a grievance, not merely for the sake of those members of the community who may be unfortunate enough to find themselves within the precincts of the police court, but for the whole of the community. I ask him to put right this dreadful anomaly, in order that the community may be able to say: "We do not deny justice, and we do not delay justice." I have very great pleasure in supporting the Bill.

2.15 p.m.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. Douglas Hacking): As a mere layman, I hesitate to intervene in this debate, which has been conducted almost solely, but most efficiently, by those who, on account of their profession, are so fitted to speak on the subject matter of this

[Mr. Hacking.]

Bill. I must, however, intervene if only to add my congratulations to the hon. Gentleman for his good fortune in the Ballot. He reminded us that this is not the first time that he has drawn a good place in the Parliamentary sweepstake, and I can only express the hope that he is as fortunate in other forms of gambling as he is in the lottery which is authorised by the Speaker of this House. Both the Mover and the Seconder of this Bill have given a very clear exposition of its terms. They have stated quite concisely, and without any measure of exaggeration, what the Bill seeks to attain, and, as a result of what they have said, it is obvious that every Member of this House must sympathise with their desire.

The Debate has been so full, so complete, that it has left me very little to say. It is probably only necessary for me at this moment, at any rate, to do three things: first of all, to give a short recital of the history of, and suggestions contained in, this Bill; secondly, to answer the very few questions that have been asked me; and, thirdly, and most important, to give the Government's decision as to what they propose to do with the Bill itself. As far as the history is concerned, the question of appeals from courts of summary jurisdiction was debated in the House of Commons in April, 1931, on a Bill which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Sir J. Withers). The Government spokesman at that time was Mr. Short—no longer a Member of the House—the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department in the Labour Government. He expressed sympathy with the objects of the Bill, but he did call attention to the difficulties to which it gave rise, and he suggested that it would be better that the whole question should be considered by a Departmental committee. The promise was made by a Member of the Labour Government, and I am sure that all the pledges which were given by that Government, if they could not, in fact, be carried out during their term of office, they would rightly expect that they should be executed, and should be honoured, by their successors. A Parliamentary promise is always sacred, except when circumstances may change. When the financial crisis became acute in the summer of 1931, there was, obviously, a change in circumstances. The Cabinet of the first National Government decided that the time was not opportune then to proceed with the proposal to appoint a Departmental committee.

The question came up again in the early summer of 1932 during the passage through Parliament of another Measure in which my hon. Friend was interested —the Children and Young Persons Act. During the Committee stage of that Bill in the House of Commons my hon. Friend moved an Amendment proposing that the requirement of recognisances should be abolished in the case of appeals on behalf of young persons under the age of 17. That matter, I understand, was brought before the Cabinet. At any rate, when the Amendment was reached, the Government spokesman, my hon. Friend, now Minister of Transport, made it quite clear that, in the opinion of the Government, it would be inappropriate to deal only with the question of appeals on behalf of persons under 17 years of age, and that in the submission of the Government it would be undesirable to deal with that question alone, but that it was certainly right that Parliament at some early stage should deal with the whole position of appeals from summary courts by persons of all ages. My hon. Friend added that the Home Secretary had intended, as soon as practicable, to set up a Departmental committee to inquire into the whole question.

Here I must make a point perfectly clear. My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University and others who have taken an interest in the subject under discussion, were told clearly that the appointment of the committee would be on the definite understanding that until the financial position of the country had improved, effect would not be given to any of the recommendations of the committee which might involve a considerable expenditure of public money. It is right that that should be made clear at the outset. The Committee was duly appointed in July, 1932. It had very wide terms of reference, namely,

> "to consider the law and practice relating to appeals from decisions of courts of summary jurisdiction and to recommend such amendments, if any, as may be thought desirable."

It is hoped that that Committee will report about Easter—not later. So much for the history of this subject. My hon. Friend the Member for West Leyton (Sir W. Sugden), as also did the last speaker, suggested that the Government might construe this Bill as an attack upon the magisterial benches in the country. They certainly will do nothing of the kind, for we know that the last thing the promoters themselves desire is to cast any general reflection on those who preside over our courts of summary jurisdiction. Let me make that perfectly clear. Now I come to the question of cost, which has been mentioned by so many speakers. My hon. Friend the mover of the Bill made certain calculations, and I think, as a result of those calculations, he said that this ought not to cost more than about £600 a year.

Mr. TURTON: I was referring to Clause 3.

Mr. HACKING: Well, that Clause 3 ought not to cost more than £600 a year; but I maintain, after having looked into this matter, that it is quite impossible to estimate what the cost might be. I hope that the Departmental Committee, which has not yet reported, will consider this very important aspect of cost, for in these times, however much sympathy we may have—and we all have sympathy with the provisions of this Bill—we must consider what the cost is likely to be before we give our consent to the great advance which would take place if this Bill were passed. I hope the Departmental Committee will consider carefully the question of cost and form an accurate estimate.

The hon. Member who introduced the Bill gave figures from 1930 with the intention of showing that the cost would be small. He also gave figures for 1931. In that year, from the answer which I gave him a few days ago in the House, 600,000 persons were found guilty by courts of summary jurisdiction and only 281 actually appealed. That is a small number, and if we could base the estimate upon that the additional cost would be very small. But we must remember that the whole of these 600,000 persons would be potential appellants under the Bill. It is preposterous to assume that any large number would, in fact, appeal, but you have that number who would be potential appellants, and, therefore, it is impossible even to guess how many would take advantage of the facilities of this Bill, and how many would, in fact, be granted legal aid. If there was a large number of appeals the cost would be not only the figure which has been mentioned during the Debate but the additional work which would be thrown on quarter sessions might mean an additional charge. Only experience can determine the actual cost.

Now I come to the Government's intentions. I have quoted the terms of reference to the Departmental Committee. They sound very simple; but a proper remedy for the problem is by no means free from difficulty. Some of the difficulties have been mentioned by the hon. Member for Lichfield (Mr. Lovat-Fraser) and, in fact, had there been no difficulties at all the Departmental Committee would never have been set up. It is clearly premature for the Government to come to any final conclusions until they have received and considered the Report of the Departmental Committee. They fully sympathise with the objects of the Bill, but the hon. Member for Thirsk (Mr. Turton) will not expect the Government to give him a more definite promise as to the attitude they will finally take towards these proposals. Many promises have been made during past years in connection with the subject matter of this Bill; some have been broken, and some have been kept, but as so many have been made I suppose there is no reason why I should not make one additional promise this afternoon. It is not going to be a difficult promise to keep, otherwise I should not make it. The Government promise to lose no time in giving full consideration to this matter after the Report of the Departmental Committee is forthcoming. They have no objection to the Bill receiving a Second Reading, but they hope that before it goes to Committee upstairs the Report of the Departmental Committee will be available and that they will have time to consider it.

When this Bill is in Standing Committee and in the light of the Government's decision taken upon the Report one of three things may happen. The Bill may pass without any amendment or the Bill may fit in with the Government's proposals with a few simple amendments. The third alternative, which must also be borne in mind, is that the Government's decision may differ so widely as to necessitate starting all over again. I sincerely hope that the third alternative will not materialise. By passing the Second Reading to-day no harm can be done and, in fact, great good may come if only because we shall be saving the time of the House by avoiding a full Second Reading Debate in connection with another Bill. I hope I have made the position of the Government quite clear. If after this discussion and after this qualified blessing, the House does give a Second Reading to the Bill, I am sure that the Government may claim the friendly co-operation of the promoters, hon. Members of the legal profession in this House, and other hon. Members interested in the question, in the further stages of the Bill.

2.32 p.m.

Major LLEWELLIN: Those who are anxious to see a Bill on these lines passed into law would, I think, like one further promise from the Under-Secretary of State, who we are very glad indeed to see occupying his present position. The one other promise which we should like to have from him is that the Home Office will do their best to try and get the Departmental Committee to accelerate their conclusions. Once a Bill has passed Second Reading in this House time becomes rather the essence of the matter as to whether anything more is to come of it, and I press upon the Under-Secretary the desirability of urging the Departmental Committee to come to a conclusion as soon as possible.

Mr. HACKING: Let me answer the hon. and gallant Member at once. It is not the intention of the Government to play any tricks in order to prevent the Bill getting on the Statute Book. We are only too anxious to see this grievance remedied, and we shall not certainly play fast and loose with hon. Members who are anxious to get the Bill through. I hope the Departmental Committee will get on with their work as quickly as possible so that their report may be available in time for it to be considered by the Government before the Bill actually goes upstairs to Standing Committee.

Major LLEWELLIN: I am much obliged to the Under-Secretary of State. I was not insinuating that the Government would play fast and loose in any way after the very sympathetic attitude they have adopted towards the Bill. I was certainly not suggesting that they were going to ask the Departmental Committee to take so long that they would be able to use it as an excuse. I never dreamt that they would do any such thing. All I am asking them to do is to hasten the deliberations of the Departmental Committee as much as possible consistent with getting at the real facts of the matter.

With regard to the Bill itself the one point which many hon. Members desire to see remedied is the cumbrous proposals in Section 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. The worst provision of that Section is the alternative provision which, in some cases, allows the bench to demand that a prospective appellant shall deposit security before he can appeal. In one or two cases in the north of England it is the practice that not only shall a convicted defendant who wishes to appeal enter into recognisances, but he has actually to deposit a sum of money in the court before he is allowed to prosecute his appeal. That obviously makes it almost impossible for a very large number of prospective appellants even to get their appeals heard, because there are many people who cannot pay £50 into court. The bench to which I have referred insisted that it should be paid within three days. I think the time has come when that Section as a whole should be repealed.

Then the question arises, how are you going to stop frivolous appeals? I do not quite understand the suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for the Newton Division (Mr. Essenhigh) about the county court judge coming into these proceedings. It seems to me absurd to try to bring county court judges, who at the moment have quite enough to do, into criminal matters, and to ask them to decide, with reference to the decision of a bench, whether a man shall have a right of appeal or not. The obvious thing to do is to amend Sub-section (5) of Section 1 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879, so that the Quarter Sessions shall have exactly the same power as the Court of Criminal Appeal has under the Criminal Appeal Act. If you give that power in the case of a frivolous appeal, the appellant will know that instead of being fined perhaps 40s., he may in the higher court be fined something like £5 because he has brought a frivolous appeal. That power, although it is very seldom used by the Court of Criminal Appeal, does remain still in the background, and has a certain effect in stopping frivolous appeals. I see no reason why a similar power should not be given to courts of Quarter Sessions.

As to Clause 3 we are met with this difficulty: The appeal must go to the next practicable Quarter Sessions court and the court of Quarter Sessions is not permanently in session as the High Court is, except in the vacation. So, the only time when the appellant will be able to apply for a certificate similar to that under the Poor Prisoners Defence Act will be on the morning of Quarter Sessions, just after the court of Quarter Sessions has dealt with semi-administrative matters and is sitting as a criminal appeal court. At that moment the appellant will come and ask for legal aid. The most that he will be able to get will be enough money to pay a barrister who happens to be in court, who will then probably find the case most inadequately prepared. All that it will amount to will be the handing over out of the public purse of the small sum of £1 3s. 6d., which I presume the barrister will accept in the case of an appeal of that sort. Although it looks very well on paper it will not give a very great advantage to the man who is appealing.

With regard to that Clause of the Bill, if it were to stop the Bill going through on the ground of expense, I would willingly see it thrown away so that we may get the material part of the Bill that is included in Clause 1. The Under-Secretary said that Clause 1 might add to the cost of Quarter Sessions. I think the Bill should go through even if it does add to the cost of hearing appeals, because so long as you have some proper sanction against really frivolous appeals the courts of the country ought to be open to anybody who has an appeal, and this is not one of the economies that the country would wish to see inflicted. It is all-important that any man who is convicted should know that he has a free and unfettered course to put his case before a second tribunal. I do not think it would cost a lot of money. If it did, that would mean that a large number of people were suffering under grave injustice. I do not think there are large numbers of such cases, but I do think that there are quite enough to warrant this Bill being given a Second reading, to warrant it being supported in its essentials by the Government, and I hope that before the end of the Session it will be passed into law. I wish to congratulate my hon. Friend who introduced it on having been lucky once more in the ballot and on having introduced a Bill that I think will be of good advantage to many poor persons.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee.

COAL MINES (MINIMUM WAGE) ACT (1912) AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

2.45 p.m.

Mr. DAVID GRENFELL: I beg to move, "That the Bill be now read a Second time."

I wish to join whole-heartedly in the congratulations which have been given from all parts of the House to the hon. Member for Thirsk and Malton (Mr. Turton) who moved the Second Reading of the Bill previously under consideration. I congratulate him on the successful results of his advocacy. Before coming to the subject-matter of the Bill which I now submit to the House, I hope that hon. Members will permit me to approach this question of mining wages with a short sketch of the history of the industry and in particular the development of the wages system in that industry. Already this morning we have been privileged to go back a long way into the history of our legal system. I could not say what period of history was the jumping off ground in this morning's Debate but this problem of wages in the mining industry is a long story and it is necessary to go back some way in order to get the right perspective in viewing it.

Mining is one of our oldest occupations and mining contracts have formed a part of our industrial story from the earliest times. Among those mining contracts were contracts of employment engaging men to work in the mines under systems which varied from time to time and from place to place. We have early records of annual hirings which amounted almost to perpetual hiring. There are cases in which men were detained in the employment of one employer and denied the freedom to seek other employment or to vary the nature of their contracts. From that condition of semi-servitude, we gradually evolved more or less free conditions of employment, each stage being marked by effort, by protest, by organisation. Much of the story of that early development has been lost to the general historian but the tradition and the memories of it exist in all parts of the country.

We advanced from annual hiring periods and payment in kind to shorter periods of hiring and the payment of wages in cash, under regular terms between work-people and employers. But this was only achieved after frequent conflicts, much bad temper, dislocation of business and interruption of production. The words "lock-out" and "strike" are household words and are eloquent of the human qualities which were brought out in the course of that development—the qualities of tenacity and courage and sometimes unreasoning loyalty and obstinacy. But it also brought out the genius of our people for compromise and mutuality. All these qualities will be recognised by those who still have vivid memories of the bitter conflicts which have passed away giving place to happier conditions. Stage by stage there has been a gradual development of better conditions as the result of effort and organisation by brave men—working miners whose names are unknown to-day—and who set out to defend and to promote their own ideas of justice and to enhance the condition of the mining workers of this country.

Thus, we moved gradually towards wage agreements made area by area and the establishment of area boards. Those area boards represented an essential stage in the development because of the variety of conditions prevailing in the score of separate coalfields in this country, different geological conditions, differences in the quality of the coal, differences in accessibility to markets. All these varying conditions required local attention and local organisation in the consideration of the contracts of service and remuneration of the men. Then we led by conciliation to better organisation. In fact, it has only been by conciliation that we have reached the plane of organisation. Organisation was improved by gradual, almost imperceptible stages, until district machinery had been fairly well established in every one of the coal-mining districts, providing more or less stable employment and certainty of reward to the men employed.

In 1912 we came to a point at which the district machinery was found to be inadequate for the circumstances of the day, and the result was the first national stoppage—a strike declared by the men. Parliament was invited to legislate in order to accomplish what district boards and district settlements had failed to achieve. It is worth remarking that in that dispute there was no demand for a general increase of wages. The mine workers to the number of 1,000,000 came out, but it was not to enforce a demand for improved wages all round. It was the most altruistic, the most idealistic strike that we have known in the industrial history of this country. It was an attempt to establish a great industrial principle. The leaders of those days who were not "wild men" and not extremists, but men of vision, with a knowledge of the industry, saw that a foundation had to be provided for the super-structure of organisation which was necessary in the industry. Those men laid the foundations and, in securing the stability of the industry, they came into conflict with their fellow citizens. Parliament had to adjudicate and Parliament adjudicated in favour of the minimum wage which was a benefit to the minority of the workers in the industry—a substantial benefit to the minority at a very small cost to the industry itself.

I now turn to the Act of 1912 and the House will pardon me if I read some of its provisions. Those who are unfortunate enough—or I should say fortunate enough—not to be miners, lack precise knowledge of points which to us are very familiar and I wish the House to note what is the position to-day in order that they may understand the nature of our request. On 29th March, 1912, the Coal Mines Minimum Wage Act was passed. Section 1 provided:

"It shall be an implied term of every contract for the employment of a workman underground in a coal mine that the employer shall pay to that workman wages at not less than the minimum rate settled under this Act and applicable to that workman, unless it is certified in manner provided by the district rules that the workman is a person excluded under the district rules from the operation of this provision, or that the workman has forfeited the right to wages at the minimum rate by reason of his failure to comply with the conditions with respect to the regularity or efficiency of the work to be performed by workmen laid down by those rules; and any agreement for the payment of wages in so far as it is in contravention of this provision shall be void."

That is a new chapter of security and reasonable reward for the men in the coal industry. Section 1 continues:

> "For the purposes of this Act, the expression 'district rules' means rules made under the powers given by this Act by the joint district board."

The joint district board consists of employers and workpeople in equal numbers, presided over by an independent chairman, or by three independent chairmen if the board desires. In Section 2 that board was authorised in these words:

> "Minimum rates of wages and district rules for the purposes of this Act shall be settled separately for each of the districts named in the Schedule to this Act by a body of persons recognised by the Board of Trade as the joint district board for that district."

Then we come to Section 3, and then I shall leave this Act, because I shall have read sufficient to show where we desire changes. Section 3 reads:

> "(1) Any minimum rate of wages or district rules settled under this Act shall remain in force until varied in accordance with the provisions of this Act.
> (2) The joint district board of a district shall have power to vary any minimum rate of wages or district rules for the time being in force in their district."

I expect that the Secretary for Mines or some other hon. Member with a knowledge of the employers' side of the case will say: "Why do you not appeal to the district board under that power?" I shall come to that later on, and I shall explain why we do not take advantage of it. Under that Act district boards were set up, and scheduled rates of wages were determined for all the men in the several districts in this country, and while, as I declared previously, there was a considerable levelling up of the lower-paid wages, especially of the day-wage men, and a guarantee was given to piece-workers that they would get a minimum wage if abnormal conditions prevailed in the working places, the addition to the aggregate wages bill was very small indeed. We found that, those wages having been put on, in 1913, 12 months after the Act came into operation, wages in the districts stood at a very low level. The House will be surprised to find that the average annual wage of men engaged in the mining industry in 1913 was £82. Those are figures given in this House less than a fortnight ago by the Secretary for Mines.

Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS: Cash wages?

Mr. GRENFELL: Yes.

Mr. LEVY: And that is the average?

Mr. GRENFELL: The average for every person employed. The House will be more surprised to find that the average wage paid per person per annum in 1932 did not exceed £105, the increase from 1913 to 1932 being at the rate of only 19 per cent. The cost of living is 42 per cent. Hon. Members may make the calculation for themselves, but for the moment they may accept my word that the average regular wage in the industry in 1932, at £105, is more than £11 per annum short of the amount required to maintain the standard of living in 1913.

Captain PEAKE: Can the hon. Member give the wages per shift?

Mr. GRENFELL: I am giving the wages per annum because I want to show the general position in the mining industry. The average miner last year was short by £11 of the money required to provide him with the standard of living which he had in 1913, that £11 representing a weekly sum of 4s. 6d. The men in the mining industry, in other words, were short by 4s. 6d. per week of the amount required to maintain their pre-war standard of living. The wages cost per ton in 1913 was 7s. 6.38d., and in 1932 the wages cost per ton was 8s. 11.67d., an increase here again of only 19 per cent. In the same period, while the wages per ton are up by less than 20 per cent., the average output per person has gone up from 20.32 cwt. in 1913 to 21.9 cwt. in 1932. Another important point in the consideration of wages and in assessing the merits of our claim is this, that the average value of the output per person per shift per day in 1913 stood at 10s. 0.13d.; in 1932 the figure was 14s. 3d. The coal miner produced a daily value of 4s. 3d. in excess of what he obtained in 1913, but the increase in the daily wage was only 1s. 5d.; that is to say, 1s. 7d. was lost to him from the additional revenue drawn by the industry. The miner produces more than ever and gets less in wages value than at any time in my lifetime or in the last 50 or 55 years.

The principles of the amendments which I wish to bring before the House can be examined at their full value by relation only to those few simple facts, and they are these: First of all, we wish to add to the minimum wage payable in the industry a percentage addition equal to the increase in the cost of living from 1914 to 1932, as ascertained and published in the Board of Trade figures from time to time. Secondly, we want to include certain people not included in the Act of 1912. The next point is that we wish the minimum wage to be an actual minimum wage, not subject to reduction. We find that in certain coalfields and in special areas in certain coalfields, after the legal minimum wage has been paid, by some unexpected interpretation of the law the employers are entitled to deduct the cost of explosives used in getting the coal, and in that way the men get less than their legal minimum wage.

The next point which we wish to amend deals with penalties, and I will read the Clause because it sounds formidable when spoken of in the abstract:

> "In the case of any failure to pay wages in accordance with the provisions of the foregoing section, an employer shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be liable on summary conviction in respect of each offence to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds and to a fine not exceeding five pounds for each day in respect of which the offence is committed after conviction therefor."

The Act of Parliament passed in 1912 was universally recognised as an Act which conferred a great benefit on the coal industry; it provided for the recognition of a minimum standard upon which all future adjustments of wages would have to be based, giving both the owners and the workpeople a direct advantage by statutory power; and yet employers could avoid the obligations under that Act, for no penalty was provided. We believe that the employer who avoids payment should be subject to a penalty so that the Act can be more effectively carried out. We wish to add a new area board to those already formulated in the Act. In the Act of 1912, 22 separate district boards were established. These cover Northumberland, Durham, Cumberland, and so on, county by county, covering the whole of the separate coal-producing areas. A new coalfield has come into existence in Kent since 1912 and that has to be provided for. We propose in this Bill that Kent should be brought in and that a district board should be formed on similar conditions to those prevailing in all other districts.

There are one or two points which I wish to put forward in argument. There is in operation all over the country something which has been added to the minimum wage, but which was not carried through the Minimum Wage Act, and not applied under the same rules of procedure. There has been superimposed upon the minimum wage of 1912 what is now known as the subsistence wage, varying considerably in amounts and in the qualifying conditions from county to county. In the county of Durham the subsistence wage is 6s. 6½d. per day; in South Wales it is 7s. for single men and 7s. 6d. for a married man with a family; in Yorkshire it is 6d. per day, but the total wage while subsistence is paid, is not to exceed 8s. 9d. a day. In other counties 6d. a day is paid with a minimum of 7s. 11d. and a maximum of 8s. 9d. These are figures for 1931. In district after district it has been found necessary to pay subsistence wages to the lowest-paid workers because the minimum rates payable under the 1912 Act do not afford a livelihood for a large number of workpeople in the industry.

The principle of a higher minimum and a lower subsistence is the purpose of the amendments, and we propose to bring in surface workmen. We have no need to argue that point because it has already been settled by districts agreements. We want the special position of the surface men to be taken into consideration, and I make a point about that here because it has not been given due prominence in previous discussions in the House. There are large numbers of specially trained surface men, such as electricians, mechanics, and artisans, who are paid the same subsistence wage as is payable to other people, so that the highly-trained artisan and the engineer are paid the same subsistence wage as the untrained labourer who may have spent only a very short time in colliery employment. There is no reward for the special skill of the craftsmen employed at the surface of the mines to-day, and we are asking that in the consideration of new schedules the relative position of the surface tradesmen in 1914 shall be taken into account, in order that they may obtain some advantage from their special knowledge and experience.

I think the Secretary for Mines has a very great opportunity and a great responsibility in this matter. We have sat here patiently while a legal subject was being discussed, and feared that we might not have even this small opportunity of putting our case, and if we do not now go into many details the Secretary for Mines knows that he has opportunities in connection with his office of ascertaining fuller particulars. We would point out, however, that this is not simply a proposal to make minor adjustments in this or that class of wages. We have a desire to do a big thing for the coal industry, and I would like him to regard this as an opportunity for a national revision of mine wages—not a national revision of minimum wages, but an attempt to get national direction of the minimum rates to be paid in each district.

This Bill is not a substitute for our demands for a National Wages Board, indeed, in many vital respects it would not be adequate for that purpose, but we believe it will go part of the way, and if we are fortunate in attaining our object we think it will also go part of the way to meet the objections of the coalowners. They take up the position that there cannot be a National Wages Board, objecting strongly to uniformity of wages throughout all the separate coalfields, and we are at a deadlock in the negotiations on that point, the owners saying the negotiations must be confined to the districts. But we are going part of the way to meet them with this Bill. While I would not commit myself or anybody associated with me to any view on the negotiations on the national wages question, I do say that here is a simple instrument to go part of the way to remove the deadlock, which is occasioning concern to the Secretary for Mines as well as everybody connected with the industry.

I want the Secretary for Mines to see that in this Bill there is an opportunity for retaining differential rates—to have as a new standard in all the districts those differential rates existing in 1914, and to add to those differential rates, which represent the economic capacity of the different districts, a uniform percentage equal to the increase in the cost of living, which has affected all districts equally. There is the beginning, perhaps, of a new idea in a national regulation of wages, and if not there is a possibility of tiding over temporarily a difficulty with which we are now face to face. I do not wish to commit myself, but I express the opinion for myself, and myself only, that if this Bill became law and the lower paid wage earners in the mining industry were levelled up to the standard which we claim for them to-day, if the coalowners and the district boards would accept national direction only to that extent, then we might find ourselves able to go along. We have every right to congratulate ourselves in the coal industry. I include hon. Gentlemen who are coalowners. We are not having from the industry what we are entitled to get at the present moment, and the coalowners are not having a fat time, but we can both stand in this House and say that we are pulling the industry through in the face of unprecedented odds, and that we are holding our own in face of the most difficult conditions. The fight is not over. We shall have to hold our own against very severe odds in the years that are to come.

If the Secretary for Mines and the coalowners will look at this Bill very carefully, without prejudice, and taking the wider national outlook, they will see that it contains the most valuable proposals in regard to the mining industry and mining wages that have appeared in this House for some time. The Government have a great responsibility. This is said to be a National Government. That pretention will be very severely tested in the years immediately ahead of us, and in no phase of our national life will the Government be more severely tested than in its handling and treatment of the coal question. It is not simply a question of wages; to-day it is, but tomorrow it will be something else. A right solution of the problem in regard to wages will free our minds, and both sides of the mining industry must work on those problems of to-morrow if we are to achieve success.

Let the House accept this as an instalment of the remedy of our immediate wage problem, so that we can go on to the capture of more power and control over the industry. That will enable us collectively and co-operatively to achieve command over the difficulties with which we are faced, and to bring the coal industry up to a higher level in the future. I have tried to sketch the story of coal mining to-day. It is an epic of men who have contributed in a small way and obscurely to the story. Let us determine that in future chapters we will write still more stirring events of the greatest of our national industries.

3.18 p.m.

Mr. PRICE: I beg to second the Motion.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. D. Grenfell) on introducing a Bill which is to give relief to his colleagues in the coalfield. In doing so, my hon. Friend gave a short resumé of the industrial history of coal mining in this country. It is no exaggeration to claim that in the mining industry, all though our industrial evolution, stage by stage—and I have often wondered why—every little advantage or improvement in conditions, either in regard to labour or wages, has had to be fought for by tremendous sacrifices, in the face of the fact that that industry and the work in that industry has been the pillar and foundation upon which British prosperity and the prosperity of the Empire have been built. I do not think that my hon. Friend's picture was overpainted.

I trust that the Minister will be able to tell us, as we were told when the last Bill was before the House, that the Government, after this Bill has received a Second Reading, will give further consideration to the matter. I think that all Members will agree that this Bill is remarkably modest in its demands. It simply asks, in 1933, that men and lads, who are engaged in the most arduous and most dangerous occupation that there is, shall be added to a wage list which gives them their 1914 wages plus an allowance for the increased cost of living. Many industries, the whole Civil Service, and the municipal services, have been enjoying these conditions for years, and, in the case of an occupation so dangerous as this, we are simply asking the Government to implement legislation that will give us similar conditions.

The mining industry has been the Cinderella of our industries in this country for years, and our present minimum wage does not give to the man and the youth what is looked upon under the Poor Law as a subsistence wage. It has been agreed by a body with an independent chairman that the present arrangement does not allow of a wage that will keep body and soul together, and, accordingly, a subsistence wage of 6d. per day is added where the wage does not exceed a certain figure. My hon. Friend has quoted the figures. They are 6s. and some odd pence in Durham and in Lancashire, 7s. in Northumberland and other places, and the highest rate is something like 8s. 9d. in the South Yorkshire coalfield. I imagine that there cannot be any Members in this House who would feel justified in opposing a Measure like this, the object of which is to give to the men who follow this most arduous occupation a mere subsistence wage no higher than the 1914 standard with the addition of an allowance based on the official cost of living figure.

We are entitled to remind the Government and the Minister that the National Government has already passed mining legislation—as I said at the time, and as I say now, one-sided legislation—extending the hours of work for five years, but with no guarantee as to wages after July of this year. They have taken from the Miners' Federation, who will be the authority for bargaining in regard to future wages, the greatest weapon that they have in safeguarding the miners' interests and getting reasonable terms when negotiations have to be dealt with next July. If the National Government felt justified in extending the hours as they have done, and in giving that guarantee to coalowners for another five years as regards hours of work, surely we shall not be asking in vain if we ask the Government to allow a Second Reading to be given to a Bill which makes this modest provision for a subsistence wage for men and boys employed in this very dangerous industry.

It is most remarkable—we have seen it many times, and we have much appreciated it—how the general public, on the occasion of disasters at our collieries, will respond and make speeches throughout the country, in churches and on platforms, regarding the dangerous nature of our men's occupation, but at the same time they sit still and see the men paid these miserable wages which will hardly keep body and soul together. It is a standing disgrace to the nation as a whole that the industry should have been neglected as it has been ever since our industrial development commenced, and not yet have we had a Government which has given it that which it is entitled to receive. It is a most remarkable thing that this is about the only industry which, since the end of the War, has increased its output and lowered its wages. The output, of somewhere round about 14½ cwt. per man per day in 1920 has been increased to over a ton throughout the British coalfield, and wages have been going down year by year.

I want to add my earnest appeal to the Government to allow the Bill to have a Second Reading. It will open up the possibility of friendly negotiations between the Federation and the owners. Those negotiations have to be started. There is a splendid opportunity for the Minister of Mines, and I hope he will take advantage of it and by the end of the negotiating time I trust that the Bill will have established at least some understanding on a national basis for the controlling of our wages and the security that, when men and boys have worked in darkness for seven and a half hours, which in many cases means eight and a half or nine, they will have paid to them a fair and reasonable wage.

3.28 p.m.

Mr. SLATER: I beg to move, to leave out the word "now" and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

This question of a minimum wage is not so old, for many Members can vividly remember the 1912 strike. The objection to the minimum wage in the House at that time was pretty unanimous. The miners fought tenaciously for it and gained a principle which, to my mind, had great justification, but it was strongly felt that the regulation of wages in any industry was a retrograde step which could not possibly be countenanced. The opposition was to putting a definite figure in the Bill. Mr. Asquith was challenged to explain a reported utterance to some deputation that had interviewed him that, in obtaining the minimum wage, the miners had secured more or less all that they wanted and that he thought it was a principle that ought to be applied to most other industries. He denied very definitely that he had said that. As a result of that Act, the trade tenaciously hung on to the principle that the conditions of employment throughout the country were so varying that to fix a minimum wage with reference to each district would have been a great disaster.

I am rather surprised at the introduction of this particular Bill. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Gower (Mr. D. Grenfell), for whom I have very great respect, always puts his case, however good, or however bad, with a very convinced altruistic sincerity which almost compels us to say that we would very much like to do all we possibly can to help him, but to-day he has certainly not estimated the consequences of the Bill. I have done my very best to find out, and I can assure the House that it is no easy task. The task is so difficult that months of elaborate investigation would have to elapse in order to find out what would be the cost to the industry. I do not think that I should be overstating the case if I said that if the Bill became law it would add anything from £8,000,000 to £10,000,000 to the wage bill in this country. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Hon. Members opposite may not think so, and if I am wrong,—and I have pointed out quite fairly the difficulties in making an estimate—I am certain that it would undoubtedly be such a large amount that we could not possibly afford it in the present state of the industry, which, just to refresh the minds of hon. Members of the House, I would remind them operated during the whole of last year more or less on an even keel. There were losses of 7d. and credits of 7d. during the good and bad parts of the year, but, at any rate, there is no fund on which anything like the amount which would be required to meet the cost of the Bill could be based.

The hon. Member for Gower, in his arguments, was very keen to retain the annual wage of the mine worker. I think he had a purpose in that and one which is not quite like him. I think he was not quite as ready to be open and frank about his case as usual. What are the real figures? An hon. Member behind me wanted to know the wages per shift. If one goes back to the evidence given before the Samuel Commission, it will be found that it is a well authenticated and established fact that the average wage in 1913-14 was a figure of 6s. 5¾d. per shift for the whole country and for all classes of workers. What is the figure for the last year? It has been varying in the quarters between 8s. 11d. and 9s. 2d. It is rather a peculiar thing that hon. Members are asking the House to give consideration to a Bill the ostensible purpose of which is to correlate the reward for services in industry with the cost of living when the particular percentage increase in wages between 1914 and 1933 is almost except for a very small decimal point equal to the cost of living to-day.

Mr. D. GRENFELL: Does the hon. Member realise that he is raising an obstacle against his own case? How can he show that the Bill would cost the industry £8,000,000 or £10,000,000 per annum if he succeeds in showing that the wages now being paid are high enough to compensate for the percentage addition to the cost of living?

Mr. SLATER: I will deal with that point later. The point is, that the actual increase is 40.2 per cent., last month, February, the index of the cost of living was 41 per cent. Those are the actual rewards for service in the industry. What is the actual increase in the selling price of coal between pre-war and to-day? The funds on which wages and the maintenance of this great industry depend are realised proceeds. We cannot get away from that. I have looked up the figures of 1914 and the best figures that I can get—the Government returns were not quite so full in 1914 in their calculations of what the realised proceeds were—I would not use the figures unless they are sound—show that 11s. per ton was roughly the average selling price in 1914, whereas the average selling price was 13s. 10d. for last year. The increased selling price was 27.3 and 40.2 was the increase in wages. Hon. Members must be fair to the industry. Where is the money to come from? I could make suggestions which might be outside permissible Debate on the Bill. There are many ways in which the reward for services could be increased, but this Bill is not the way by putting a tariff on the workers in the industry in the way suggested, by trying to correlate the rewards of service with the cost of living. It is not in that way that they would get higher wages for the men.

I feel, as I have said, that it would be outside the debate to give all my views on how we could increase the benefit for the workers, but if you look through the results of all the three quarters, or you may take the fourth quarter—I do not want to rule out the fourth quarter of 1932, because it has two important factors in it, which, I think, will give encouragement to hon. Members opposite in some respect and perhaps discouragement in others—the results bear out what I have said. I feel to-day that the situation in the coal trade requires very delicate handling. The plea put forward by the hon. Member for Gower and the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Price) that the coalowners of this country should get together on this great question of wages at the earliest possible time, is an appeal, quite apart from my Amendment to-day, to which I heartily subscribe.

I would go as far as to say that I think a great tactical error was made by His Majesty's Government when they gave the coalowners five years' renewal of the Act and did not compel them to make a five year's bargain with the men. I think the coalowners also missed a great opportunity, for if one looks at the cost of living to-day and the reward for service, and if we correlate that with every expression of opinion on the front bench by the Chancellor and the Prime Minister that the reward for primary production must be increased if there is to be any way out of the difficulty, it was no great risk for the coalowners to have taken. And I have this experience in running large undertakings that every concession in wages of recent times has shown this lamentable fact, which I regret, that every concession given by the men in wages has been given away very quickly in the selling price of coal.

His Majesty's Government should bring all pressure possible on the Mining Association, but that association is made up of districts whose allegiance to the association is largely ruled by, "Does it suit me or not?" and to expect them to come to some uniform decision on this question, after my own experience, and, I think, after the experience of a number of hon. Members, is not an easy task. It complicates the task of the Minister of Mines to such a great degree that if there is any Minister in His Majesty's Government dealing with a specific industry who needs sympathy, it is the Minister of Mines in dealing with the Mining Association. I know that there are coalowners in this country who might not like me for saying it, but there are a great many coalowners who hold my view, and in my own district, North Staffordshire, when the last settlement was made, we took an opportunity of making a three-years agreement with our men. I mention that to show that my fellow coalowners in North Staffordshire recognise that there are great benefits to the industry in coming to a long-term agreement with the men. We practice what we preach.

We want the co-operation of hon. Members opposite to bring about better conditions in this great industry. Many fears are growing, which I shall not elaborate to-day, regarding the whole structure of this industry, fears which increase every day. I am speaking for myself and as a coalowner, but I know that I am also speaking for the vast mass of the coalowners of the country. We do desire peace in the industry. We desire that this House shall cease to interfere with the industry, but when questions are brought to this House we must meet whatever is advanced with reason and common sense. I feel that to-day we are not doing that on the question of wages. We are not meeting around a table discussing the question. We ought to be doing so. The coal industry, as a whole, has in it the power to be of such importance in any revival of the iron and steel industry, and shipbuilding and engineering, that everything we can do to bring about a more prosperous condition is vital in the interests of the nation as a whole.

I was discussing this question the other day with certain people who said that the question of getting down the cost of coal was vital. If we get down the price of coal by way of less wages then I do not think it is a good policy. I do not think it is necessary. I believe that there is power in this great industry to give greatly increased rewards for service, but I want hon. Members opposite to recognise this fact—it is much better that we should look facts in the face. If the industry is to have a competitive position it must, in addition to giving the highest reward for services, produce the cheapest possible coal. The two things are wrapped up together. I feel that conditions are so developing that we are getting nearer to a point when great issues will have to be bluntly faced. Can the industry, working on a quota, and working at an inefficient point of production, produce the goods?

Is it not a question that we have to face honestly and sincerely if we are to give regular work to the men, a full week's work with an adequate wage at the week-end? What a miner takes home at the week-end is the thing of cardinal importance. Are we to produce coal in a highly efficient way with reasonable full-time working and with another 100,000 men out of the industry, or are we to contine in an inefficient way? My decision comes right down on the side of efficiency in the true interests of the industry. I want to see as much regular work as possible. But do not let hon. Members cavil if we put forward this plea. Hon. Members opposite give us a great deal of help. If their true desire is to increase the daily reward for services they must face the facts.

I say with profound conviction that this Bill is an instrument which, if put into operation, will be almost impracticable. If it ever sees the light of day it would put a load on the industry without the corresponding possibility of fulfilling the results expected. Instead of doing what it is honestly meant to do, that is to assure a higher reward for service in the industry, the Bill would have the exact opposite effect. It would bring about such distress, and in different parts of the country would create such disaster, that hon. Members would want to run away from their own handiwork, and very quickly. I therefore ask the hon. Member for Gower not to press the Second Reading of the Bill. I want him to rest assured that we on this side of the House, and I as a coalowner, will help him afterwards to obtain the highest possible wages in the industry. That is not lip service. I believe in high wages and can prove that I do so. In my own collieries, new collieries, fully equipped and working regularly, in one day a man can make as much as 16s. and perhaps not work more than 5½ hours, although 7½ hours are permissible. That is because he can work much more quickly. A man in an older type of pit has often to work very hard for perhaps 10s.

That is the crux of the matter. By co-operation and with the assistance of the Government we may bring the coal owners of this country to recognise that there is a spirit which I am delighted to see in the Miners' Federation, and that it might be used. The miners have a wonderful leader, to whom I pay a tribute. He sensibly desires to work with the owners, and he should not be turned down. We should take advantage of that spirit. I say to hon. Members opposite that we will fight with them, fight with the coalowners of the country to recognise that new spirit, and we shall press the Government, with all the power we possess, to bring about a happier condition of affairs by discussion at the earliest possible moment. For that reason I believe I am justified, in the true interests of the industry, in moving that the Bill be read a Second time on this day six months.

3.56 p.m.

Mr. H. WILLIAMS: I beg to second the Amendment.

I am afraid that in the 4½ minutes left to me there is not much opportunity of discussing the general principles of the Bill. In 1912 I went on a deputation with some coalminers to our Member of Parliament and asked him to vote against the Bill of that year. I was a consistent opponent of that Measure, and in 1914 I wrote a monograph on its results. It is perfectly obvious that the Act of 1912 entirely failed in bringing peace to the industry. The hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Price) said that the industry had been neglected by all Governments. The plain truth of the matter is that the industry has been nearly legislated to destruction. If it had been left alone, if the industry had been a little less self-conscious, if the employers and workpeople in it only understood that there was a world outside their own, things might have been better, but the isolation of the miners in their own districts, and the mental isolation of a great many of the employers created in the industry an outlook which, I think, has been rather unfortunate. I wish to challenge the arithmetic of the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. D. Grenfell). He told us that the average annual earnings in 1913 were £82 and in 1932 he said they were either £105 or £109—I am not sure which, but whatever he said the figure is £109.

Mr. D. GRENFELL: I make the correction now. The difference should be £28 and not £19.

Mr. WILLIAMS: The figure is £109 and the difference is not 28 per cent. but 33 per cent.

Mr. GRENFELL: The figures given by the Secretary for Mines was £109 estimated, and the difference is between £82 and £109.

Mr. WILLIAMS: I understand that the correct figure is £109 and that the difference is 33 per cent., which I think rather upsets the hon. Member's original thesis. There was some difference between the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Slater)—who made such an admirable speech—as to the estimate. It may be that the average earnings per shift have increased almost precisely by the increase in the cost of living. It may be that the two increases have been absolutely in line, but a large number of people are receiving earnings either above or below the average and in all probability the Bill would only affect those below the average. Therefore you might well have a large increase of the charge even though the present earnings show an increase over pre-War earnings equal to the increase in the cost of living.

Mr. GRENFELL: But if it is to apply to the whole——

Mr. WILLIAMS: Surely if you have two people working, one getting 5s. and the other 15s., the average is 10s. If you decide to have a minimum of 10s. then the man who is getting 5s. goes up to 10s. but the man who was already getting 15s. gets no increase. But the total wage paid is increased by 5s., or 25 per cent.

Mr. GRENFELL: The hon. Member ought to examine his own figures and work out the problem correctly.

Mr. WILLIAMS: I am trying to show that the general average earnings may have gone up according to the increase in the cost of living but that nevertheless the application of this Bill would cause a substantial increase of the burden——

Mr. GRENFELL rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put," but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Mr. LEVY: I hope that the House will decline to give a Second Reading to the Bill because it will impose an extra and unfair burden——

Mr. MAXTON: Why does not the hon. Member face a Vote on it?

Mr. LEVY: I am entitled to discuss the Bill—[HON. MEMBERS: "Let us have a vote on it."]—and I wish to point out——

It being Four of the Clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

The remaining Orders were read, and postponed.

Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3.

Adjourned at One Minute after Four o'Clock until Monday next, 6th March.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 6th March, 1933.

The House met at a Quarter before Three of the Clock, Mr. SPEAKER in the Chair.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH PROVISIONAL ORDER (SHEFFIELD) BILL,

"to confirm a Provisional Order of the Minister of Health relating to the city of Sheffield," presented by Sir Hilton Young; read the First time; and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, and to be printed. [Bill 66.]

ORAL ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

INDIA.

VICEROY (MOSLEM ADVISER).

1. Sir NAIRNE STEWART SANDEMAN asked the Secretary of State for India whether he will consider the appointment of a Moslem adviser to the Viceroy?

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Sir Samuel Hoare): The Governor-General already has a Moslem member of his Executive Council.

CONCESSION PASSAGES.

2. Commander MARSDEN asked the Secretary of State for India whether he is now in a position to state the amount of expenditure incurred in concession passages between India and the United Kingdom for the 12 months ended 30th September last; and how much of the total amount was used for passages in ships flying the British flag?

Sir S. HOARE: £405,739, of which £352,953 was used for passages in ships flying the British flag.

Sir WILLIAM DAVISON: Can my right hon. Friend now say what reply has been received from our Ambassador in Rome to the inquiries made of him regarding the prohibition against Italian officials travelling by British ships and the compelling of them to travel in Italian bottoms?

Sir S. HOARE: That question should be addressed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RHYS DAVIES: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the proportion is increasing in our favour or is against us?

Sir S. HOARE: No, Sir, not without notice.

Mr. HALES: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that British steamship lines have now reduced their fares to the same level as those of Continental lines and thus removed the chief objection to travel by British ships?

MEDICAL COUNCIL BILL.

9. Mr. R. DAVIES asked the Secretary of State for India what action the Government of India propose to take in response to the representations from the Indian Medical Association with regard to the exclusion of Indian medical licentiates from the provisions of the Medical Council Bill?

Sir S. HOARE: I have not heard what action the Government of India propose to take. As the hon. Member is no doubt aware, the Indian Medical Council Bill has been referred to a Select Committee of the Legislative Assembly.

LABOUR CONDITIONS.

10. Mr. R. DAVIES asked the Secretary of State for India whether he will state the nature of the legislative proposals of the Government of India to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Indian Labour relating to the control of deductions from the wages of Indian workers?

Sir S. HOARE: I am sending the hon. Member a copy of the Bill.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROPOSALS.

18. Mr. LEVY asked the Secretary of State for India when the Joint Committee on the Indian Constitution will be set up and when the Bill is likely to be introduced?

Sir S. HOARE: I hope that Parliament will authorise the setting up of the Joint Select Committee before Easter. The date on which a Bill can be introduced must depend on the work of the Committee.

22. Major-General Sir ALFRED KNOX asked the Secretary of State for India what reply he has sent to the appeal sent to him on behalf of the 30,000,000 Moslems of the Punjab, the North-West Frontier Province, Kashmir, Sindh, and Beluchistan, setting forth their fears of Hindu domination in an all-India federation, and asking for a separate federation of these five northern units; and whether, in view of the representations contained in this appeal, he will say what further safeguards he proposes for minority communities in India?

Sir S. HOARE: I have seen copies of a printed circular, distributed from an address at Cambridge, bearing the names of four gentlemen who claim to speak for 30,000,000 of their fellow Moslems. As I am in constant communication with many representative Moslems, it did not seem to me necessary to take any special action in connection with this letter. As regards the last part of the question, I must ask my hon. and gallant Friend to await the Government's proposals.

15. Mr. McENTEE (for Mr. DAVID GRENFELL) asked the Secretary of State for India what steps the Government of India and His Majesty's Government have under consideration with a view to the unification of Ceylon with the future federal Government of India?

Sir S. HOARE: No such steps are under consideration.

Mr. LEWIS: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the inhabitants of Ceylon have expressed any desire to come into the federation?

Sir S. HOARE: That is a question which should be addressed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

POLICE.

21. Sir A. KNOX asked the Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the announcement of his decision to hand over the Indian police to responsible Ministers in the provinces, he will state what safeguards he proposes to ensure the future efficiency of this force?

Sir S. HOARE: I must ask my hon. and gallant Friend to await the Government's proposals which are shortly to be published.

Sir A. KNOX: Will the right hon. Gentleman state whether British police officers will be placed under a responsible Minister?

Sir S. HOARE: I have just told my hon. and gallant Friend that he must await the Government's proposal.

Mr. CHARLES WILLIAMS: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us when they will publish these proposals?

Sir S. HOARE: If my hon. Friend had listened to an answer I gave two minutes ago, he would have heard me say that I hope the Joint Select Committee will be set up before Easter.

Mr. WILLIAMS: But may I hope for a definite date?

Sir S. HOARE: Certainly.

MEERUT CONSPIRACY TRIAL (APPEALS).

23. Colonel WEDGWOOD asked the Secretary of State for India whether the appeal against the sentence imposed upon the Meerut prisoners has been lodged by them or on their behalf; and are they undergoing hard labour until the date of the hearing of the appeal?

Sir S. HOARE: Two prisoners up to the present have actually filed appeals. I am informed that all the prisoners are being employed on light labour, which is of a merely nominal character, in order to facilitate the preparation of appeals.

28. Mr. MORGAN JONES asked the Secretary of State for India when it is expected that the appeals in the Meerut conspiracy case will be heard by the high court at Allahabad; and whether he will take steps to see that the hearing of the appeals is expedited?

Sir S. HOARE: The Government of India inform me that the High Court is not likely to be able to hear appeals in this case before the vacation, which covers May and June. The High Court is, however, being asked to fix as early a date as possible after the vacation.

PROHIBITED MEETING, ALLAHABAD.

26. Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for India if he is aware of the action of the authorities at Allahabad in prohibiting a commemoration meeting which was to have been presided over by Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, one of the Round Table Conference delegates; is he aware that the meeting was being organised by non-Congressmen; and will he state the reason for prohibition?

[Mr. Williams.]

Sir S. HOARE: The meeting was prohibited because it was proposed to hold it in Parshotamdas Park within the civil lines where previous similar gatherings had caused obstruction and annoyance to persons lawfully employed. The organisers, who included several members of Congress were informed that there would be no objection to a meeting anywhere outside the civil lines.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that of the nine persons charged with the responsibility of organising the meeting there were only two who were members of the Congress and that the meeting had no connection whatsoever with Congress; and, as one of the Round Table delegates was to preside over the meeting, does the right hon. Gentleman think it was justifiable to stop it?

Sir S. HOARE: I am not aware of the facts just stated by the hon. Member. The meeting was prohibited for one reason and for one reason only, namely, that at this particular place, in the centre of the civil lines, it would have led to obstruction and trouble. There was no reason why the meeting should not have been held outside the city.

Mr. WILLIAMS: As Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru was a thoroughly capable and desirable delegate to the Round Table Conference, will the right hon. Gentleman consider whether any such meeting presided over by him should have been prohibited in the special area referred to?

Sir S. HOARE: Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru was one of the most useful and valued members of the conference, and we shall be glad to hear him make a speech at any time. In this case the prohibition had nothing to do with him, but simply with the place of meeting. The meeting was to be in the centre of the town, and it would have led to obstruction, and possibly to trouble, and that was the sole reason why it was prohibited.

COLLECTIVE FINES, CHITTAGONG AND MIDNAPORE.

27. Mr. MORGAN JONES asked the Secretary of State for India what is the total amount received in respect of collective fines imposed on Chittagong and certain Midnapore villages; and for what purpose the amount so received has been allocated?

Sir S. HOARE: I have no later figure for the amount collected in the Chittagong area than that given in reply to the question asked by the hon. Member for South-East Leeds (Major Milner) on the 13th February, but the latest reports received by me state that collection is proceeding slowly but steadily. In the Midnapore district fines amounting to Rs.4,720 were imposed between August and November of last year but I have no information as to the amount that has been collected. These fines would ordinarily be credited to the general revenue of the province, but there is power to award compensation from them to persons injured in person or property as the result of the unlawful acts leading to the imposition of the fine.

Mr. JONES: Does the right hon. Gentleman not consider that the time has come to arrest the exaction of these fines from a community large numbers of whom are entirely innocent of any wrong doing at all?

Sir S. HOARE: There is a very obvious way in which the process of the fines can be arrested, and that is for the civil population to help us to arrest the terrorists.

Mr. JONES: Is there any reason to suppose that these innocent people have any more knowledge as to the whereabouts of the terrorists than the right hon. Gentleman's own officers?

Sir S. HOARE: Yes, I am afraid that we do think that among the civil population there are certain people who do know a great deal about the terrorists.

Mr. JONES: If the right hon. Gentleman knows who are concealing these offenders, why does he not deal with them?

Sir S. HOARE: I have great faith in the Governor of the province, Sir John Anderson; his experience in these matters is unrivalled; and I am prepared to leave the operation of this process in his hands.

Civil Aviation.

3. Mr. PRICE asked the Secretary of State for India what steps the Government of India propose to take for the purpose of encouraging the development of civil aviation in India?

Sir S. HOARE: I would refer the hon. Member to the report on the Progress of Civil Aviation in India for 1931-32, of which I am placing a copy in the Library.

Broadcasting.

4. Mr. PRICE asked the Secretary of State for India what is the number of licences at present in existence in India for wireless receiving sets; and what steps the Government of India propose to take with a view to the development of broadcasting in India and to the prohibition of piracy in connection with the broadcasting service?

Sir S. HOARE: As regards the first part of the question I have no information. As regards the second part the Government of India, with a view to the prevention of piracy, have introduced in the Legislative Assembly a Bill prohibiting the possession without licence of wireless apparatus.

Trade Commissionerships.

7. Mr. PARKINSON (for Mr. DAVID ADAMS) asked the Secretary of State for India whether, in order to provide increased opportunities for Indian trade, the Government of India will consider making further appointments to trade commissionerships in Europe and elsewhere?

Sir S. HOARE: I understand that for reasons of economy the Government of India do not propose at present to appoint any more trade commissioners.

Assisted Emigration Scheme (Repatriations).

8. Mr. PARKINSON (for Mr. D. ADAMS) asked the Secretary of State for India what is the total number of Indians who have been repatriated from the Union of South Africa during the year 1932; and whether they have been provided for under the assisted emigration scheme?

Sir S. HOARE: The complete figures for 1932 are not yet available, but in the first eight months the number repatriated under the assisted emigration scheme was about 1,400.

Cotton and Sugar-cane.

12. Mr. GORDON MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for India the nature of the inquiry now under consideration by the Government of India with regard to the cost of cultivation of cotton and sugar-cane and their rotation crops?

Sir S. HOARE: I have no information.

16. Mr. McENTEE (for Mr. D. GRENFELL) asked the Secretary of State for India what measures are now under consideration by the Government of India for increasing the consumption in Great Britain of long-staple Indian cotton, having regard to the Indo-British trade agreement concluded at the Ottawa Conference?

Sir S. HOARE: I understand that the Indian Central Cotton Committee proposes to organise demonstration tests in Lancashire. I have no other information.

Berar.

13. Mr. G. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware of the resolution passed by the Legislative Council of the Central Provinces in January of this year demanding the creation of Berar as a separate province with full financial and legislative authority; whether the matter is receiving the attention of the Government of India; and what action it is proposed to take?

Sir S. HOARE: The question of the arrangements to be made in respect of Berar under a Federal Constitution is under consideration, and I am not in a position to make any statement on the matter.

Land Mortgage Banks (Loans).

14. Mr. G. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for India what action the Government of India propose to take with a view to putting into effect the recommendation of the Central Banking Inquiry Committee for the establishment of joint stock land-mortgage banks to provide long-term loans?

Sir S. HOARE: I have not yet received from the Government of India any recommendation on this subject.

Naval Service (Indians).

17. Mr. McENTEE (for Mr. D. GRENFELL) asked the Secretary of State for

[Mr. McEntee.]

India whether His Majesty's Government, in their arrangements for the naval security of Indians coasts, Indian ports, and Indian sea-borne trade, will consider the advisability, in consultation with the Government of India, of admitting Indians to the Indian naval service?

Sir S. HOARE: Indians are already admitted to the Royal Indian Marine.

BURMA.

19. Mr. EDWARD WILLIAMS (for Mr. GEORGE HALL) asked the Secretary of State for India whether the future of Burma will be dealt with in the White Paper to be issued before Easter; and whether His Majesty's Government have yet arrived at any decision on the separation or federation question as regards this province?

Sir S. HOARE: The decision between separation from India and inclusion in the proposed Indian Federation still rests with the people of Burma, whose representatives in the Legislative Council have as yet given no clear indication of their choice between the two alternatives which alone are open. The White Paper on Indian Reforms will not therefore deal specifically with the case of Burma.

20. Mr. WILLIAMS (for Mr. HALL) asked the Secretary of State for India whether it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to convene another Burma Round Table Conference for the further consideration of the question of the separation of Burma from India; and, if so, when it is proposed that the Conference shall meet?

Sir S. HOARE: No, Sir. His Majesty's Government are not of opinion that any useful purpose would be served by a Conference to discuss this question.

PUNJAB LAND ALIENATION ACT.

24. Major MILNER asked the Secretary of State for India if he will give an assurance that the operations of the Punjab Land Alienation Act will not be extended to the Province of Delhi in view of the hardships which it entails?

Sir S. HOARE: The matter is not one in which I should wish to interfere with the discretion of the authorities in India.

Major MILNER: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether this matter has been considered by the Government of India?

Sir S. HOARE: I think I had better have notice of that question. I am not quite sure.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

FILM INDUSTRY (INDIA).

11. Mr. R. DAVIES asked the Secretary of State for India whether in view of the representations made to the Government of India for the removal of the import duty on raw cinema films in India, he will say what steps they propose to take for the encouragement of the Indian film industry?

Sir S. HOARE: As a consequence of the Ottawa Agreement, the Indian import duty on United Kingdom raw films has been reduced to 15 per cent., that on other raw films remaining at 25 per cent. The Government of India have also abolished a Customs concession which was until recently accorded to films printed abroad from Indian negatives.

Mr. DAVIES: Is it not true that, in spite of the Ottawa Agreements, there is a 15 per cent. customs duty against this country?

Sir S. HOARE: The hon. Member will see that in consequence of the Ottawa Agreements the duty has been reduced to 15 per cent.

Mr. DAVIES: It is still the fact, therefore, that there is a 15 per cent. duty against us in India in spite of the Ottawa Agreements?

Sir S. HOARE: The hon. Member really puts a wrong construction on my answer. My answer goes to show that the duty has been reduced, and that the British preference is greater now than it was before the Ottawa Agreements.

BRITISH INDUSTRIES FAIR.

49. Mr. McENTEE asked the Secretary to the Overseas Trade Department if he can give the House any information as to the results of the British Industries Fair in London and Birmingham; the number of visitors to each section, buyers, and general public; the approximate value of orders placed, together with the figures of the particular industries represented; and the number of new industries or firms showing for the first time?

50. Mr. SUTCLIFFE asked the Secretary to the Overseas Trade Department the approximate amount of business transacted in the textile section of the British Industries Fair this year, and how this compares with the amount transacted last year?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE (Secretary, Overseas Trade Department): The results of the British Industries Fair have been most satisfactory. In the majority of trades business is reported to have been secured on a scale comparable with that of the 1932 Fair which was regarded as the most successful of the series.

The total attendances of visitors at the London Section were:

Overseas buyers	9,742
Home buyers	126,033
General public	33,622

The total attendances at the Birmingham Section were:

Overseas and Home Trade Buyers	100,773
General Public	11,855

It has never been considered practicable to insist on a return from exhibitors of the value of all orders taken at the Fair, as such a picture would be misleading, since an important function of the Fair is to encourage inquiries which are followed up by subsequent orders, and I am informed that many exhibitors are particularly pleased with the new contacts made. I am satisfied that the business done in all sections has been on a scale that cannot fail to be of great benefit to the country. 412 firms exhibited in the London Section for the first time and 184 at Birmingham.

Mr. McENTEE: Can the hon. and gallant Gentleman say how the figures that he has just read out compare with the figures for the previous year?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: The figures are not all strictly comparable, because certain administrative changes have been made this year with regard to entry which affected the number of home buyers. The numbers of foreign buyers were practically the same. The number of home buyers showed a decrease, for the reason I have mentioned; but the general opinion is that the volume of buying has not been affected by these administrative changes.

Mr. HANNON: So far as the exhibition of heavy trades at the Birmingham Fair is concerned, is there not universal satisfaction at the increase of foreign buyers, and the prospect of orders to come, on the part of the exhibitors there?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: Yes, Sir, that has been expressed.

Sir ARTHUR MICHAEL SAMUEL: Is my hon. and gallant Friend satisfied that the charge of an entrance fee of 2s. has not done any harm, and is it intended that the same policy shall be pursued in the future?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: It is early to say yet, but my opinion is that it has not done any harm; and, furthermore, it makes the Fair now entirely self-supporting, without any assistance being required from public funds.

RUSSIA.

51. Sir ASSHETON POWNALL asked the Secretary to the Overseas Trade Department whether it is intended this spring to publish a report from our commercial counsellor at Moscow on similar lines to that issued as Command Paper 3904, in May, 1931?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: Numerous changes in the structure of Soviet trading organizations have taken and are taking place. A record of these is being kept and is available for consultation by those who are interested. As soon as practicable, arrangements will be made for publishing the revised information.

SHIPPING INDUSTRY (OBSOLETE TONNAGE).

82. Lieut.-Colonel MOORE asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he has any information to show what is the aggregate tonnage of foreign shipping at present in existence which was previously owned by British firms and sold at second-hand to foreign owners?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the BOARD of TRADE (Dr. Burgin): I regret that the information desired by my hon. and gallant Friend is not available.

Lieut.-Colonel MOORE: Will my hon. Friend request his right hon. Friend to use his influence to ensure that when our shipping is broken up it shall not be sold to foreign countries who have no Board of Trade regulations similar to ours and are, therefore, able to compete with our shipping very unfairly?

Dr. BURGIN: I think that the whole question of what to do with obsolete tonnage is constantly under consideration by my right hon. Friend.

COTTON INDUSTRY (JAPANESE COMPETITION).

80. Mr. HAMMERSLEY (for Mr. CHORLTON) asked the President of the Board of Trade what action he proposes to take with reference to the large increase in the imports of cotton textile and rayon goods into the countries of the Empire which seriously affect employment in Lancashire?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: I assume that my hon. Friend has in mind the question of Japanese competition, which is now under consideration by His Majesty's Government. I cannot at present add to the statements recently made on this subject.

ARGENTINA RAILWAYS (BRITISH CAPITAL).

29. Rear-Admiral SUETER asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs at what stage His Majesty's Government proposes to intervene to obtain from the Argentine national and provincial authorities the overdue unpaid debts for railway services owing to railways in the Argentine operating with British capital, in view of the fact that the amounts are large and that British investors are suffering hardship by the non-receipt of moneys due?

The SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir John Simon): The negotiations regarding the state of the account current, to which I referred in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham, West (Sir C. Cobb) on the 20th February, are proceeding in a satisfactory manner between the railway companies and the authorities concerned, and no request has therefore been made by the railway companies for the intervention of His Majesty's Government, who will consider further developments as they occur.

RUSSIA (DIPLOMATIC PRIVILEGES).

31. Captain CAZALET asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any information as regards recent negotiations between His Majesty's Government and the Soviet Government of Russia as regards the rights and privileges of diplomatic representatives to import into Russia articles for their own personal use?

Sir J. SIMON: The question is still under discussion with the Soviet Government, and I am not without hope that a satisfactory settlement may be reached. I am circulating a fuller reply in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Captain CAZALET: May I ask whether the Government of the Soviet has in the past made any different treatment from that accorded by other Governments to Members of His Majesty's Diplomatic Corps?

Sir J. SIMON: I cannot answer that question without notice, but the matter which we are now discussing with the Soviet Government represents a new departure upon which we have made strong representations.

Mr. LANSBURY: When the right hon. Gentleman circulates his statement will he also, in that statement, tell the House whether the British representatives are being treated differently from others and whether any other diplomats in Moscow have made any complaints?

Sir J. SIMON: Yes, Sir, I think the statement will cover that.

Sir A. KNOX: Will the Government extend the same treatment as regards rationing to Soviet representatives in London as they extend to our people in Moscow?

Following is the reply:

On the 24th of October last the Soviet Authorities issued an order to the effect that foreign diplomats in Moscow would not, in the future, be permitted to purchase foodstuffs and other necessities of daily life at the State shop for roubles, but only for foreign currency; and an intimation was subsequently given to His Majesty's Ambassador at Moscow that the privilege of free importation of such foodstuffs and necessities, previously enjoyed by them, might be withdrawn. These facts, coupled with the growing difficulty of obtaining provisions in the so-called "open" market, aroused grave concern among the diplomatic body in Moscow; and I accordingly caused representations to be made to the Soviet Government by His Majesty's Ambassador at Moscow.

A somewhat similar situation has also arisen in connection with the purchase of railway tickets in the Soviet Union, instructions having been issued by "Intourist," the Soviet travel organisation for foreign nationals, that in future all their tickets must be paid for in foreign currency. Representations by the Doyen of the diplomatic body have produced an assurance that diplomatists, consuls and diplomatic couriers will continue to receive tickets and sleeping car berths in exchange for roubles for all journeys in the Soviet Union or to any place in the countries bordering the Union and in Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia; but the continuance of similar facilities has not yet been assured in the case of journeys to this country.

Representations have accordingly been made by His Majesty's Ambassador at Moscow in these and in other matters of principle affecting the position of His Majesty's Representatives in the Soviet Union and of their staffs; and the Soviet Government have been informed that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are not prepared to agree that those representatives shall receive treatment which is not in accordance with international custom or courtesy.

BELGIAN SETTLEMENT, 1839.

32. Sir FRANK SANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the United States of America was a signatory to The Hague treaties guaranteeing the neutrality of Belgium; and if he will state what other nations were signatories to that guarantee?

Sir J. SIMON: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the Belgian settlement of 1839. This consisted of three treaties signed at London, not at The Hague. The United States of America was not a signatory of those treaties, which were first a treaty between Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia and Russia on the one hand and the Netherlands on the other; secondly, a treaty between the first five Powers mentioned and Belgium; and thirdly, a treaty between the Netherlands and Belgium.

CHINA AND JAPAN (MUNITIONS).

34. Captain HUNTER asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what indications there are of universal agreement, on the part of the foreign countries concerned, with the decision of His Majesty's Government to ban the export of arms to China or Japan?

36. Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will state what progress has been made with the negotiations set on foot by the League of Nations for the establishment of an embargo prohibiting the sale by members of the League of arms and other munitions of war to Japan?

38. Captain PETER MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state the number and names of those countries which equally with ourselves have agreed to an embargo on the export of arms and munitions to the belligerents in the Far East, and the number and names of those countries which are not adopting this policy?

39. Mr. HANNON asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any European Government has yet instituted an embargo upon the export of arms to the belligerent countries in the Far East; if any conference between European countries on this subject is contemplated; and, if no such conference is contemplated, when does he expect European Governments to declare their policy in this respect?

Sir J. SIMON: There is no indication of universal agreement. This leaves this country in a situation which cannot be allowed to continue, and this is the first matter which will be taken up by the Prime Minister and myself at Geneva this week.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Do we understand the right hon. Gentleman to imply by his answer that the Prime Minister and himself are going to press the question at Geneva in the hope that they may secure general agreement among all the nations?

Sir J. SIMON: The Prime Minister, I am sure, will deal with the matter with the greatest discretion, and, naturally, we shall want to know, when we reach Geneva, what the representatives of other Powers have to propose. I intend to communicate with the principal Powers before we start for Geneva in order that we may be informed in advance.

[Sir J. Simon.]

Mr. HANNON: Has the right hon. Gentleman's attention been called to the intensified activity of the Creusot Works in France and the Skoda Works at Pilsen in Czechoslovakia?

Captain Sir WILLIAM BRASS: Is the Foreign Minister satisfied that other countries are in a position to be able to enforce this embargo as we are?

Mr. LANSBURY: If the Government decide to reverse the decision taken last week, will this House have an opportunity both to discuss it and to vote on it?

Sir J. SIMON: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the decision announced last week was a provisional decision in order to give an opportunity of finding out what was the attitude taken up by other Powers. If, unfortunately, it turned out that the attitude taken up by other countries did not permit of universal agreement, there would be no reversal of the decision if we had to make a fresh announcement.

Mr. LANSBURY: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that the decision that was arrived at was welcomed by a very large proportion of the people of the country, and if it is to be reversed this House ought to have an opportunity of discussing and voting upon it, because it will be a reversal, despite what the right hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. LEWIS: Can the right hon. Gentleman state whether the Government of any country in the world has expressed unqualified approval of our action with regard to this embargo—any country in the world?

Colonel WEDGWOOD: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question, may I ask him whether it is necessary to have the approval and concurrence of foreign countries when we do the right thing?

Sir J. SIMON: I have already said that there is no indication of universal agreement, and it has been stated from this Box by the Prime Minister as well as by myself that, of course, we have always contemplated that the only permanent arrangement was one which would be universally accepted.

Captain P. MACDONALD: Can the right hon. Gentleman say if any other country in the world insists upon issuing Government licences for the export of munitions besides ourselves?

Sir J. SIMON: As far as I am aware, the system existing in this country, which requires a licence issued by the Government before arms and munitions are exported, is a system which does not obtain elsewhere.

Sir W. DAVISON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this is giving serious offence both to Japan and China?

41. Mr. MORGAN JONES asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the ultimatum delivered by the Japanese Government to the Chinese Government on 23rd February, and communicated to the League of Nations on 24th February, to the effect that if the Chinese troops resist the Japanese invasion of the province of Jehol the Japanese Government will find it difficult to guarantee that fighting will not spread to North China; and whether, as the unanimous report of the Assembly of 24th February states that no question of Chinese responsibility can arise for the development of events since 18th September, 1931, he will inform the Japanese Government that it will be held responsible for any damage to British property or danger to British subjects resulting from the continuance and extension of the present hostilities?

Sir J. SIMON: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. Before this, on the 12th January, His Majesty's Ambassador at Tokyo had already reminded the Japanese Government of the magnitude of British national interests in North China and warned them that damage to those interests would give rise to claims for compensation. On the outbreak of hostilities in Jehol, His Majesty's Consul-General at Mukden gave to the Japanese authorities a list of British subjects in Jehol, and His Majesty's Ambassador at Tokyo has requested the Japanese Government to take measures for their protection.

Mr. JONES: Has any response been received from the Japanese Government? Has there been any undertaking?

Sir J. SIMON: I should require notice of that question; I am not quite sure.

83. Mr. LUNN asked the President of the Board of Trade what will be the position of arms and munition factories abroad owned by British firms; and whether such firms will still have facilities for selling arms and munitions to China and Japan from these factories abroad?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: The control exercised by this country applies only to exports shipped from United Kingdom ports.

84. Mr. LUNN asked the President of the Board of Trade whether any existing arms contract between any British firms and the Chinese or Japanese Governments contains a renewable clause the fulfilment of which can defeat the aims of the arms embargo; and, if so, what is the nature of such a clause?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: I am not aware of the existence of any such clause.

Mr. LUNN: Will the hon. and gallant Gentleman make inquiries to see whether there is anything of that nature being done by those who are exporting arms to China or Japan?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: I will bear in mind the point of my hon. Friend, but my answer is the result of inquiries.

Earl WINTERTON: What right has the Board of Trade to make inquiries unless the law is being broken? What is their locus standi in the matter?

Lieut.-Colonel COLVILLE: I have indicated that, as far as I am aware, there are no such clauses operating.

Earl WINTERTON: I understood my hon. Friend to say that he was going to ask for information? I ask him what locus standi he has for asking? None.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS CONTRIBUTIONS (CHINA).

35. Sir W. DAVISON asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether all arrears of subscription due from the Chinese Government to the League of Nations have now been paid; and, if not, what is the amount still outstanding?

Sir J. SIMON: As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs explained in reply to the question of my hon. Friend the member for Acton (Mr. Duggan) on the 4th July last, the Chinese Government, in accordance with a special arrangement approved by the 1930 Assembly, is paying off its arrears due for the years 1922-1930 by equal instalments over a period of 20 years, and has in both 1931 and 1932 paid the instalments due under this arrangement. Apart from these yearly payments in respect of arrears for the years 1922 to 1930, China has also, in common with all other States members, to make an annual contribution towards the current expenditure of the League. In respect of the year 1931 China's contribution was assessed at 1,438,861 gold francs and for 1932 at 1,544,643 gold francs. Towards these two contributions China has paid at present 719,428 and 772,208 francs, respectively. For these two years, therefore, China is in arrears to the extent of 1,491,868 francs.

Sir W. DAVISON: Does my right hon. Friend think that it is fair that China should have the advantages of the League and be so substantially in arrear with her contributions, which are due from her to the League; and can he say whether these dues are payable by the Chinese Government of Peking, Canton or Nanking?

Sir J. SIMON: The Chinese Government is not the only Government in arrear. The Government from which the amounts are due is the Government which is a member of the League.

Sir W. DAVISON: Is it the Government of Peking, Canton or Nanking? That seems to me to be a clear question.

Mr. MAXTON: Are nations that are in arrear allowed by the rules of the League to take part in a war?

BRITISH VISAS (GERMANS).

37. Captain P. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will state how the number of British visas of passports held by German subjects within the last fortnight compares with the average?

Sir J. SIMON: The only parts of His Majesty's dominions for which German citizens now require visas are India, Gibraltar and Malta. I have no information as to the number of visas granted for those countries within the last fortnight. German citizens have not required visas for the United Kingdom since the 1st January, 1928.

[Sir J. Simon.]

ANGLO-PERSIAN OIL COMPANY.

40. Major MILNER asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state the present position of the dispute between the United Kingdom and Persia in regard to the concession held by the Anglo-Persian Oil Company; and whether negotiations for a settlement are now proceeding?

Sir J. SIMON: In the reply which I gave on the 7th February to the question asked by the hon. Member for Colchester on this subject, I described the provisional arrangement which had been arrived at as a result of the proceedings before the Council of the League of Nations last January with a view to the settlement of the dispute. In accordance with the terms of that arrangement, direct negotiations, which will, however, remain under the aegis of the Rapporteur, will shortly be resumed between the Anglo-Persian Oil Company and the Persian Government at Tehran.

Major MILNER: Is it proposed that the Government should be represented at this conference?

Sir J. SIMON: No, Sir. The negotiations, as I have just stated, will be negotiations between the Anglo-Persian Oil Company and the Persian Government, but the Rapporteur, Dr. Benesh, will remain in touch with what is going on.

NAVAL AND MILITARY PENSIONS AND GRANTS.

42. Mr. McENTEE asked the Minister of Pensions whether he is aware that the daughter of the late James Westbrook, No. 200,235, rifleman, 18th Battalion Rifle Brigade, owing to physical and other defects, is unable to earn her living, and having reached the age of 21 the allowance paid to her mother by the Ministry of Pensions has now ceased; and whether, in view of the circumstances, he will consider this and similar cases among those requiring special treatment?

The MINISTER of PENSIONS (Major Tryon): I should have no authority to grant a further extension of the allowance in the circumstances of this case. On the general question which the hon. Member has in mind, I would refer him to the answer which my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Barnard Castle (Lieut.-Colonel Headlam) gave on the 21st June last, of which I am sending the hon. Member a copy.

Mr. McENTEE: Has the Minister control of any special fund or any special institution from which a grant or treatment could be given in cases similar to this?

Major TRYON: I will gladly see if there is any special fund to which this special case could be referred.

44. Mr. BROCKLEBANK asked the Minister of Pensions what is the present policy of the Ministry with regard to the treatment in Liverpool of men whose minds were injured by war service; and whether in any cases such men have been transferred to lunatic asylums?

Major TRYON: There has been no change in the policy of the Ministry with regard to the treatment in Liverpool or anywhere else "of men whose minds were injured by war service." I have no authority to detain or treat in a Ministry institution a certified case of mental unsoundness, but my own policy and that of my predecessors has been to provide suitable treatment in special institutions for all cases of mental affection for which the Ministry is responsible, so long as they are not certifiable. As a matter of fact, during the past 12 months, only one case had to be transferred in the Liverpool area to a mental hospital, and that was eight months ago. Any statement, such as I believe has recently been publicly made in Liverpool, to the effect that the policy of the Ministry was, in the interests of economy, to transfer men from Ministry institutions to lunatic asylums is wholly untrue and can only cause needless anxiety.

Mr. BROCKLEBANK: Can the Minister say what is the authority for this public statement?

Major TRYON: The authority is that in the "Daily Herald" it was stated that they had an "exclusive revelation" on this subject from the Liverpool Secretary of the British Legion; and I may add that I have never seen so many untrue statements concentrated in a small space.

47. Mr. DONNER asked the Minister of Pensions the intentions of the Ministry with regard to Maghull hospital, near Liverpool; and whether any patients are to be transferred to any other hospitals?

Major TRYON: The accommodation provided at Maghull, near Liverpool, which is Crown property and has been used for the treatment of severe cases of epilepsy, has become increasingly in excess of the requirements of my Department and the institution is required by the Board of Control who are in a position to use it more advantageously for their own cases. I have accordingly arranged for the transfer of the patients now at Maghull along with the medical and nursing staff, to Chepstow, another Ministry hospital of more suitable size where equivalent accommodation will be provided.

Mr. DONNER: Then there is no truth in the suggestion that the Minister of Pensions is trying to get rid of these patients from Ministry of Pensions hospitals?

Major TRYON: No, Sir; this is another "exclusive revelation." These patients are being transferred from one Ministry of Pensions hospital to another Ministry of Pensions hospital.

48. Mr. DONNER asked the Minister of Pensions what is the policy of the Ministry with regard to utilising hospitals under their control or, alternatively, transferring patients to civil hospitals as a measure of economy?

Major TRYON: It is the policy of the Ministry to utilise civil hospitals in preference to duplicating existing facilities so far, but only so far, as this practice is consistent with the interests of ex-service patients for whom the Ministry is responsible. Ministry hospitals are provided for various special types of case for which either civil institutions do not provide, or which can be more suitably dealt with in Ministry institutions. With the decline in demand for treatment some of the Ministry hospitals have necessarily had to be dispensed with, but my hon. Friend may rest assured that special accommodation will continue to be provided so long as it is needed.

43. Mr. NALL-CAIN asked the Minister of Pensions how many patients for whom he is responsible are at present being treated for war disabilities in civil hospitals in Liverpool; and what amount of accommodation exists in Mossley Hill hospital?

Major TRYON: No patients for whom the Ministry is responsible are at present being treated in any Liverpool civil hospital for their accepted war disabilities. Patients requiring institutional treatment in Liverpool are ordinarily sent to the Ministry hospital at Mossley Hill, which has accommodation of 300 beds of which at present 255 are occupied.

Mr. BROCKLEBANK: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the panel doctors have complained of lack of accommodation in the Liverpool hospitals?

Major TRYON: No such complaints have been received, and there is no foundation whatever for newspaper statements to that effect.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

GOVERNMENT POLICY.

45. Mr. BATEY asked the Prime Minister whether he can now undertake to lay before this House a White Paper giving full details of the schemes for the alleviation of unemployment which the Government have now under consideration?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Ramsay MacDonald): This is the same question as the one which the hon. Member addressed to me last Thursday. Some misunderstanding arose on that occasion, and I am obliged to the hon. Member for giving me this opportunity to clear it up. The policy of the Government in regard to schemes for the provision of work for the unemployed was indicated during the course of the Debate on the 16th February, and in these circumstances I do not think that any useful purpose would be served at this moment by adopting the course suggested by the hon. Member.

Mr. BATEY: Does that answer mean that the Government are not considering any schemes to alleviate unemployment?

The PRIME MINISTER: Quite the opposite; I referred the hon. Member to the place where he will find a statement about those schemes.

Mr. BATEY: On the 16th February. There is nothing there that helps us. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us now: are the Government considering any schemes, or have they considered any schemes, to deal with this important matter?

The PRIME MINISTER: I cannot go beyond the answer I have just given to the hon. Member's question.

Mr. BATEY rose——

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Levy.

Mr. BATEY: I have only asked two supplementary questions.

WORK SCHEMES.

73. Mr. MABANE asked the Minister of Health whether it is his intention to issue a communication to local authorities to the effect that schemes of approved work may be begun without delay or, if begun, may be completed, with a view to the mitigation of unemployment in the building industry and associated industries?

The MINISTER of HEALTH (Sir Hilton Young): It is not intended to issue a further communication. I have no reason to think that local authorities are delaying to proceed with approved works through any misunderstanding of the position.

76. Mr. BATEY asked the Minister of Health with regard to the schemes put forward by the Easington Rural District Council for the purpose of providing work for 66 men in the Seaham Division and carrying out improvements for the health of the district, whether he will reconsider his refusal to sanction these schemes and inquire further into the advisability of adopting them?

Sir H. YOUNG: I understand that the question refers to certain schemes of sewerage which the council are preparing. I have not yet received an application for sanction to a loan. Any such application will be considered in the light of the policy of the Government as explained to the House on 15th ultimo.

NEW EXCHANGE BUILDING, NORWICH.

70. Mr. HARTLAND asked the First Commissioner of Works whether he is prepared to sanction the building of the proposed new Employment Exchange in Colegate Street, Norwich, in place of that in Prince of Wales Road, which is now altogether inadequate?

The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS (Mr. Ormsby-Gore): Yes, Sir. Tenders have been obtained for the building of the new Norwich Employment Exchange, and it is hoped to begin work shortly.

Mr. HARTLAND: In view of the considerable unemployment in the building trades in Norwich, will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that this matter will be expedited especially seeing that it was incontinently turned down by the late Labour Government in the person of the present Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. ORMSBY-GORE: I think that there is a long history behind it, and there is still a little matter to be cleared up about a bit of land ten feet by six. Beyond that, the difficulties have now been overcome, and there is no reason why, the tenders now being in, we should not decide on the tenders at once.

GREAT HARWOOD, LANCASHIRE.

77. Sir W. BRASS asked the Minister of Labour the number of persons registered as unemployed in Great Harwood, Lancashire, in September, 1931, and on the latest date for which figures are available?

Sir FREDERICK THOMSON (Treasurer of the Household): I have been asked to reply. At 21st September, 1931, there were 7,828 unemployed persons on the registers of the Great Harwood Employment Exchange. At 23rd January, 1933, the number was 4,377.

GREAT BRITAIN AND UNITED STATES (DISCUSSIONS).

46. Mr. LEVY asked the Prime Minister whether he can now outline broadly the proposals which will be put forward by the British mission in the approaching debts conference?

The PRIME MINISTER: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 23rd February to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hammersley), to which I have nothing to add.

Sir JOHN WARDLAW-MILNE: Has the date yet been fixed, or is there any likelihood of its being fixed soon?

The PRIME MINISTER: No date has yet been fixed. I am sure the House will understand that, as the inauguration was only on Saturday, matters cannot yet have gone that far.

Mr. LANSBURY (by Private Notice) asked the Prime Minister whether he is now in a position to assure the House that before the vital discussion with the United States Government on the question of War Debts takes place he will, in circumstances which will permit Debate, make a statement outlining the broad principles of the policy the Government propose to pursue, and whether he can make any statement of any action proposed by the Government in relation to the financial crisis which has arisen in the United States?

The PRIME MINISTER: The situation is at present so uncertain that I am sure my right hon. Friend will appreciate the difficulty at the present time of trying to define the occasion on which a Debate on War Debts might profitably take place. As regards the last part of the question, His Majesty's Government are following with sympathetic interest the serious developments of the internal banking difficulties in the United States. No action by His Majesty's Government seems to be called for at the present moment.

Mr. LANSBURY: In view of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has no notion when these conferences are to take place, and that there are between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 unemployed people in this country who have been told that they must wait for these conferences before there can be any recovery, surely this House should be asked to discuss whether some measures cannot be taken by ourselves to deal with the matter? If it is possible for the President of the United States to take action immediately on his appointment, is it not time that this Government, which has been in office now for some 18 months, should take some definite and immediate measures to relieve the situation in this country?

The PRIME MINISTER: That is a totally different question from that put by the right hon. Gentleman in his private notice question. I have answered his question.

Mr. LANSBURY: What are people outside to think when the House of Commons cannot discuss these important questions and when we are shelved off month after month and told to wait? Meanwhile people are starving. I want to know what we exist for?

HON. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There was nothing about this in the private notice question which the right hon. Gentleman submitted to me.

AGRICULTURE.

MEAT AND DAIRY PRODUCE (IMPORT RESTRICTIONS).

52. Mr. LAMBERT asked the Minister of Agriculture what progress has been made in the restriction of imports of mutton, bacon, and dairy produce from Denmark, Australia, New Zealand, and other countries with currencies depreciated in relation to sterling?

The MINISTER of AGRICULTURE (Major Elliot): I regret I have nothing to add at present to the replies which were given on 9th February and 2nd March, respectively, to my hon. Friends the Member for Colchester (Mr. Lewis) and the Member for the City of Chester (Sir C. Cayzer), of which I am sending him copies.

Mr. LAMBERT: When does the right hon. Gentleman expect to be able to give a reply? Is it not a fact that depreciated currencies in New Zealand and Australia are a breach of the Ottawa Agreements?

IMPORTED EGGS AND POULTRY (MARKING).

53. Mr. ATTLEE asked the Minister of Agriculture whether he will take steps to see that all cooled, cold-stored, or gas-stored poultry eggs in shell imported into this country shall be marked with indelible ink with the appropriate description?

Major ELLIOT: In the absence of international agreement on this question it is not possible to enforce the marking, with appropriate descriptions, of eggs that have been kept in cold or gas storage outside this country. All such imported eggs are, however, required to bear an indication of the country of origin or the word "Empire" or "Foreign," as the case may be.

Brigadier-General CLIFTON BROWN: Will the Government reconsider their attitude towards the Imported Foodstuffs (Marking) Bill, which was talked out by the Liberal Opposition a fortnight ago, and which would have dealt with this matter?

54. Mr. ATTLEE asked the Minister of Agriculture whether he can give the House any information as to the progress of the committee inquiring into the possibility of marking all imported dead poultry with the name of the country of origin or the word Imported in some permanent manner and in a prominent position on the carcase?

Major ELLIOT: The Standing Committee under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1926, to which the hon. and gallant Member refers, is inquiring into an application for an Order in Council requiring the marking of all imported meat, bacon, ham and meat offals as well as of poultry. I understand that considerable evidence has been taken by the Committee in respect of meat, bacon and ham, and that when this part of the inquiry has been completed poultry will be the next commodity to be considered.

POTATOES.

55. Mr. SHAW asked the Minister of Agriculture if, considering the present price of potatoes and the stocks of potatoes at present in this country, he will consider the advisability of temporarily prohibiting their importation?

Major ELLIOT: I have no powers to take the action suggested by my hon. Friend.

62. Mr. McKIE asked the Minister of Agriculture if he is aware that the Irish Free State Government is offering a higher bounty on potatoes for export to Great Britain from their wart-disease scheduled districts than on potatoes from their clean areas; and if he will take steps to prohibit the importation of such potatoes into Great Britain?

Major ELLIOT: The sale of Irish potatoes in this country, whether for planting or for consumption, is governed by the Wart Disease of Potatoes Order of 1923, of which I am sending a copy to my hon. Friend. I have no reason to question the efficacy of these Regulations, but if my hon. Friend has any evidence to the contrary I shall be happy to consider it.

WHEAT DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS.

56. Mr. T. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Agriculture the amount of wheat subsidy that has been paid to farmers in the county of Norfolk by the Wheat Commissioners up to the last available date; and the amount assigned by farmers to landowners, banks and merchants for the same period?

Major ELLIOT: Advances amount approximately to £116,300 on account of deficiency payments have been made by the Wheat Commission to growers in Norfolk. Up to date, the Commission have received notice of 20 assignments of deficiency payments by Norfolk growers, covering about 7,300 cwts. of wheat; the advances involved amount to about £1,100.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Does the £116,000 refer to the first or to the first and second payments?

Major ELLIOT: It refers to all the payments up to the present date.

HORSES (SUPPLY).

58. Lieut.-Colonel MOORE asked the Minister of Agriculture whether he has any information to show whether the present supply of draught horses in this country will prove sufficient to meet the demand necessitated by the revival of arable agriculture; and whether he is satisfied that the present schemes of State encouragement for heavy horse-breeding in this country are adequate for their purpose?

Major ELLIOT: As regards the first part of my hon. and gallant Friend's question, I have no reason to suppose that the supply of horses for agricultural purposes is likely to prove inadequate. The answer to the second part is in the affirmative.

RIVER WORKS.

57. Mr. FREDERICK HALL asked the Minister of Agriculture whether he will give particulars of the schemes which were prepared for the river Thames in September, 1931; how much money this scheme was estimated to cost; and what part of it is now being progressed with?

Major ELLIOT: I have no information as to any schemes prepared for the river Thames in 1931. Certain works on the river Thames and the river Wey are being carried out by the Thames Conservancy and the county councils concerned under schemes approved in 1930 for grant from the Unemployment Grants Committee. These two schemes were estimated to cost respectively £300,000 and £240,000. A scheme for the dredging of the Thames above Oxford estimated to cost £50,000 was sanctioned by the Ministry under its 1929 programme of State-aided land drainage schemes for the relief of the unemployed and is still in progress. If the hon. Member so desires, I will send him information as to the progress of these schemes.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: What are the total Government grants to this scheme?

Major ELLIOT: I should require notice of that question.

59. Mr. PRICE asked the Minister of Agriculture whether he is aware that a scheme for the River Avon, Warwick, was prepared by the catchment area authority and sanctioned by the late Government with a promise of grant; what progress has been made with the scheme; and whether the Government is now prepared to contribute to the cost?

60 and 61. Mr. F. HALL asked the Minister of Agriculture (1) whether he is aware that a scheme for the River Ouse, Yorkshire, was prepared by the catchment area authority and sanctioned by the late Government with a promise of grant; what progress has been made with the scheme; and whether the Government is now prepared to contribute to the cost;

(2) whether he is aware that a scheme for the River Great Ouse was prepared by the catchment area authority and sanctioned by the late Government with a promise of grant; what progress has been made with the scheme; and whether the Government is now prepared to contribute to the cost?

Major ELLIOT: The answer to the first part of the questions is in the negative. As regards the last part, the position with regard to Government grants is as set out in the reply which I gave on 20th February to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Mr. T. Williams), of which I am sending copies to the hon. Members.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: Are we to understand that, notwithstanding the terrific floods from which a great deal of Yorkshire is now suffering, the Government may not be expected to change their minds with regard to grants?

Major ELLIOT: I do not think that arises out of the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Is it a fact that a scheme has now been produced, and is there any chance that the Government may change their mind with regard to a grant?

Major ELLIOT: I gave the hon. Gentleman an answer with regard to Government grants on a previous occasion.

POST OFFICE.

National Savings Certificates (Addison Gardens Committee).

63. Sir W. DAVISON asked the Postmaster-General when he expects to be able to make a statement to the House with regard to the forfeiture or partial forfeiture of National Savings Certificates held by the nominees of the Committee of Addison Gardens, Kensington; whether he is aware that this matter has been under consideration by the Post Office and the Treasury for nearly a year; and what is the cause of the delay in arriving at a decision?

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Sir Kingsley Wood): As I recently informed my hon. Friend, a decision has now been reached, and a letter will be sent shortly to the Addison Gardens Committee.

Sir W. DAVISON: In view of that communication, which I understand says that Income Tax has to be deducted, on what amount is Income Tax to be paid? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the trustees of these gardens took national savings certificates for the reason that there was no Income Tax payable; otherwise, they would have bought Funding loan or other stock which would now have shown a large appreciation in value?

Sir K. WOOD: My hon. Friend knows that the Committee were not authorised holders of the stock, and, in the circumstances I would suggest that they should seriously consider the concession that has been offered to them.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

64. Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Postmaster-General if he will arrange to publish from time to time the suggestions put forward by the members of the Post Office Advisory Committee, and the decisions reached thereon, so that the public may be able to assess the value of this body?

Sir K. WOOD: The practice has always been to regard the proceedings of the Post Office Advisory Council as being confidential, and any departure from this practice would, in my opinion, detract from the usefulness of the Council.

WIRELESS LICENCES.

65. Mr. McENTEE asked the Postmaster-General the number of wireless licences taken out during 1932; the number of prosecutions taken against people for operating without a licence; and the total amount of fines?

Sir K. WOOD: The number of wireless receiving licences issued during the year 1932 was approximately 5,263,000. The number of prosecutions undertaken during the same year for the use of unlicensed wireless sets was 2,825, and the total amount of the fines and costs imposed was £2,833.

Mr. McENTEE: Is the amount of the fines plus the licences taken out more or less than the actual cost of the prosecutions?

Sir K. WOOD: I could not answer that without notice. Of course, these prosecutions must also be judged apart from that aspect. Sometimes they are an encouragement to other people.

STAMP MACHINES, COLCHESTER.

66. Mr. LEWIS asked the Postmaster-General if, having regard to the popularity of the slot machines for stamps at the head post office in Colchester, he will consider the advisability of installing similar machines in other post offices in that town?

Sir K. WOOD: Machines have been installed at four sub-post offices in Colchester in addition to the one at the head post office and the provision of a machine at a fifth sub-office is in hand. I am considering the question of installing machines at other offices in the town.

CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE (PROMOTION).

67. Commander MARSDEN asked the Postmaster-General whether he is aware of the stagnation prevailing in the cable room of the Central Telegraph Office at the present time; and whether he will take advantage of any opportunities that may present themselves of relieving the position?

Sir K. WOOD: I regret that, owing to the decline in Foreign Telegraph business, there is some redundancy of staff and, as a consequence, stagnation of promotion in the cable room. Such steps as are practicable are taken to relieve the situation by transfers to other offices, but it will be appreciated that the available opportunities are extremely limited.

SLOANE TELEPHONE EXCHANGE AREA.

68. Mr. HERBERT WILLIAMS asked the Postmaster-General if he is aware of the frequency of breakdowns and mechanical errors in the automatic dialling machines in the Sloane telephone exchange area; whether any steps are being taken to make these machines more efficient; and whether he will abolish the extra charge made for hand-microphone instruments in view of their liability to error?

Sir K. WOOD: My inquiries do not show that breakdowns and mechanical errors in the Sloane telephone exchange area have been unduly frequent. On the contrary, test calls which are made periodically indicate that the service at Sloane is satisfactory and compares favourably with that given at other London automatic exchanges. If my hon. Friend has information of any specific instances of difficulty and will let me have particulars, I shall be pleased to have them investigated. The dialling apparatus on the hand-microphone instrument is identical with that on the ordinary pedestal instrument, and I know of no reason for the suggestion that the former type is specially liable to error.

Sir W. BRASS: Is my right hon. Friend aware that this inefficiency is not confined to the Sloane Exchange and that the human element in other exchanges is far better than this mechanically operated thing?

Sir K. WOOD: I cannot assent to that view though, in some cases, a tuition course on an automatic telephone would be advisable.

AIR MAILS (PARCELS).

69. Mr. RANKIN asked the Postmaster-General whether, in view of the fact that although the aggregate weight of British air-mail matter despatched from this country last year exceeded previous records the weight of the parcel air mails showed a small decrease, he is taking new steps to encourage the sending of parcels and samples by air mail?

Sir K. WOOD: There has been a general decrease in the volume of parcel traffic handled by the Post Office during the last two years, due largely to the prevailing trade depression: and the small decrease in parcel air mails is in accordance with this tendency. I can assure my hon. Friend that no opportunity will be lost of taking all such steps as are available further to promote this service.

LOCAL EXPENDITURE.

74. Mr. H. WILLIAMS asked the Minister of Health the expenditure in the current year, and for comparison that in 1929-30, in respect of the two chief items which constitute the economies of £20,000,000 effected on the basis of the 1929-30 expenditure?

Sir H. YOUNG: The total expenditure including capital expenditure from all sources of local authorities in England and Wales in 1929-30 on education and highways amounted to £89,550,000 and £66,650,000 respectively. I regret that I have no information as to the corresponding expenditure in the current year.

Mr. WILLIAMS: Is there any information as to how the estimate of £20,000,000 of economies is arrived at?

Sir H. YOUNG: I have given the information for which the hon. Member asked in the question, and, if any further details or information are required on the subject, I shall be happy to give them to him.

HAMPSTEAD HEATH (BUILDINGS).

71. Mr. LEWIS asked the Under-Secretary of State for Air whether agreement has yet been reached with the London County Council as to the nature of the buildings to be erected at Heath Brow, Hampstead Heath?

Sir VICTOR WARRENDER (Vice-Chamberlain of the Household): I have been asked to reply. Negotiations are still in progress.

Mr. LEWIS: Will the hon. Gentleman say why the Ministry persisted in disregarding the regulations of the town planning scheme, particularly having regard to the fact that this property is in the very centre of the Heath?

Sir V. WARRENDER: I do not think that that matter arises out of the question.

HOUSING.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES' SCHEMES.

75. Mr. THORNE asked the Minister of Health whether, with regard to the applications made by the Tring Urban District Council, the Leek Urban District Council, and the Loughborough Rural District Council for sanction to build houses, he will state the rents proposed to be charged, exclusive of rates, and the type of houses; and if he can state the superficial area in feet proposed by each of the authorities?

Sir H. YOUNG: I am sending the hon. Member the particulars he desires.

WORKING-CLASS HOUSES (COMMITTEE).

Captain CAZALET (by Private Notice) asked the Minister of Health whether he is yet able to announce the terms of reference and composition of the Departmental Committee to be set up with regard to the reconditioning of slums and other matters?

Sir H. YOUNG: Yes. The terms of reference to the committee will be as follows:

To consider and report—

(a) What, if any, further steps are necessary or desirable to secure the maintenance of a proper standard of fitness for human habitation in working-class houses which are neither situate in an area suitable for clearance under Part I of the Housing Act, 1930, nor suitable for demolition under Section 19 of that Act; and

(b) What, if any, further steps are necessary or desirable to promote the supply of houses for the working classes, without public charge, through the agency of public utility societies or other bodies subject to similar limitations operating in particular areas or otherwise.

The right hon. the Lord Moyne, D.S.O., has consented to act as Chairman of the Committee, and the other members will be:

The right hon. Member for Northern Cornwall (The Right Hon. Sir Francis Dyke Acland, Bt.).

The right hon. and gallant Member for Ripon (Major The Right Hon. J. W. Hills).

The hon. Member for Southampton (Sir Charles Barrie, K.B.E.).

The hon. Member for Winchester (Sir Geoffrey Ellis, Bt.).

The hon. and gallant Member for Chelmsford (Lieut.-Colonel Sir Vivian Henderson, M.C.).

The hon. Member for Dundee (Miss F. Horsbrugh, M.B.E.).

The hon. Member for South Bristol (Mr. N. K. Lindsay).

The hon. and gallant Member for Pembroke (Major G. Lloyd George).

The hon. Member for the Forest of Dean (Dr. J. V. Worthington).

Mr. CROSSLEY: To which hon. Member for Dundee does the right hon. Gentleman refer?

Sir H. YOUNG: The hon. Lady the junior Member for Dundee (Miss Horsbrugh).

HOURS OF WORK.

78. Mr. THORNE asked the Minister of Labour the terms of the resolution passed at the Geneva Conference in January in connection with a 40-hour working week, and the number of delegates voting for and against the resolution?

Sir F. THOMSON: A copy of the report of the Tripartite Technical Conference has been placed in the Library. An extract from this report, dealing with the three principal resolutions (out of a total of 20) and giving the results of the voting, is being circulated in the OFFICIAL REPORT.

Sir W. BRASS: Can my hon. and learned Friend say whether the populations of the countries are also included in this return?

Sir F. THOMSON: I do not think that that information is in the Department, but, if my hon. Friend will study the extract in the OFFICIAL REPORT, he will see that there is a great deal of information contained in it.

The following is the Extract:

"INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE.

Extract from report of the Preparatory Conference (10-25*th January*, 1933).

HOURS OF WORK AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

The general discussion showed that the main questions with which the conference was faced were covered by the following points:

1. Is the reduction of hours of work capable of decreasing unemployment?

2. Is such a reduction necessarily contingent upon international agreement being reached?

3. Are there any special conditions which must be considered as indispensable to ensure that that reduction in hours of work would be effective, and in particular is it necessary that the standard of life of the workers should be maintained?

These conditions were set forth in two draft resolutions submitted to the conference, one by the workers' group, the other by the Government delegates of France, Belgium, Netherlands, Spain, Chile, Germany and Italy. The draft resolution submitted by the workers' group was as follows:

'The conference considers

That discussion on the project of a 40-hour week Convention should proceed on the basis that weekly wages and monthly salaries will not be reduced by reason of the reduction of hours resulting from the adoption and application of such Convention.'

The draft resolution submitted by the seven Government delegates referred to above read:

'The conference after reviewing the various arguments advanced for and against a reduction of working hours, considers that it is one of the measures which would contribute to reducing unemployment.

The conference therefore decides to examine its detailed aspects, taking the questions raised in Part II of the conclusion of the report of the office as the basis of its examination, in order to reach an arrangement of an international character the methods of giving effect to which would be determined with a view to rendering possible the maintenance of the standard of life of the wage-earners.'

The workers' resolution was put to the vote first and was rejected by 32 votes (12 Government delegates and 20 employers' delegates) against 21 votes (two Government delegates and 19 workers' delegates) and 17 abstentions.

The workers' group then made the following statement:

> 'We shall vote in favour of the resolution submitted by the Government delegates because it contains the principle which was at the basis of the workers' resolution.
>
> If, as we hope, that resolution is adopted, we are convinced that the work of the International Labour Office which will complete the work of the present conference will be carried out along the lines indicated not only in the workers' resolution but also in that submitted by the Government delegates.'

In order to confirm and strengthen that statement ,the British workers' delegate made the following statement:

> 'The British workers would have preferred the clearer language of the Workers' Resolution, but as two Governments, in response to the direct questions put to them yesterday, have said that there is no vital difference of intention or principle, but only of phraseology, between the Workers' Resolution and that of the Governments, on that understanding—while keeping ourselves free to decide what our action shall be in June when we see the actual terms in which the draft international measure is presented—we have decided to vote for the Governments' Resolution.'

The employers' group stated that its attitude had been determined with regard to the terms of the resolution itself and not with regard to the interpretations put upon it by certain members of the conference.

The Italian employers' representative, whilst calling attention to the technical difficulties of such a regulation, nevertheless considered that the social and political aspects of the question called for its further serious examination and on those grounds made a statement to explain his vote.

The resolution submitted by the seven Government delegates was adopted by 41 votes (21 Government delegates, 19 workers' delegates and one employers' delegate), against 22 votes (three Government delegates, 19 employers) and seven abstentions."

UNION OF BENEFICES ACT (BOLTON).

85. Sir JOHN HASLAM asked the hon. Member for Central Leeds, as representing the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, if he can inform the House as to the reason why no action has been taken on the unanimous report made by the special commission set up to inquire into the amalgamation of the parishes of Christ Church, Bolton, with the adjoining parishes?

Mr. DENMAN (Second Church Estates Commissioner): Action in accordance with the Union of Benefices Measure, 1923, has been taken and a scheme is before the Privy Council, but certain objectors have appealed against the confirmation of the scheme and the appeal has been referred to the Judicial Committee.

Sir J. HASLAM: Does the hon. Gentleman realise that for nearly two years there has been no pastoral visitation or supervision in this parish, and that the whole parochial system, which, after all, is the greatest attribute of the Church of England, is in abeyance, and that there has been practically no visitation of the poor, sick or dying in this down-town parish?

Mr. DENMAN: I have already observed that the matter is before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and I cannot interfere with them.

MAGISTRATES' DECISIONS (RESTRICTED RESIDENCE).

87. Mr. HUTCHISON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department the numbers of people who are now bound over in the Metropolitan area on condition that they shall not live within a certain radius of London; and how the police in each of these cases ensure that the defendants do not live in London?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir John Gilmour): I regret that I cannot give the information asked for in the first part of the question. As regards the second part, if a person were found to be living in London in breach of a condition of his recognizance, he would no doubt be brought before the court to be dealt with in the usual way.

Mr. HUTCHISON: May I ask my right hon. Friend if such sentences are not rather ridiculous, and would it not be advisable to advise all magistrates throughout the country that such sentences bring the law into contempt?

SUNDAY ENTERTAINMENTS (CINEMAS).

88. Mr. BATEY asked the Home Secretary the latest figures showing how many local authorities have acted under the procedure governing opening of cinemas on Sunday; how many orders have been withheld; and for what reason?

Sir J. GILMOUR: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave on the 28th February to the hon. Member for Plaistow (Mr. Thorne). The only information which I have to add to that reply is that applications for facilities for the Sunday opening of cinemas have since been submitted to me by two more areas, and that these applications are in course of being laid before Parliament as the law provides.

Mr. THORNE: After a poll has been taken by the people recording their votes for or against, is this House entitled to turn down any scheme?

Sir J. GILMOUR: Yes, certainly; it has done so.

Mr. THORNE: What is the good of it?

TRANSPORT.

TRAFFIC SIGNS (WHITE LINES).

89. Mr. REMER asked the Minister of Transport if in view of the success of white traffic lines as a help to the motor community and in view of the many accidents saved by this device, he will make an order that these white lines shall be compulsory at all corners?

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of TRANSPORT (Lieut.-Colonel Headlam): The effectiveness of white lines depends to a certain extent upon a reasonable restraint in their use. I understand that the Departmental Committee on Traffic Signs will deal with the use of white lines in their report, which my hon. Friend expects to receive shortly. He has no authority to make such an Order as my hon. Friend suggests.

ACCIDENTS.

90. Mr. LEWIS asked the Minister of Transport if having regard to the fact that since the provisions of Part I of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, came into operation there has been little diminution in the number of fatal street accidents and an increase in the number of cases of injury, despite some diminution in the number of mechanically-propelled vehicles, he proposes to introduce legislation to provide for the greater safety of persons using public thoroughfares?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: I am not satisfied that the causes of any considerable proportion of accidents on roads are susceptible of removal by further legislation. Fresh light may, however, be thrown on the subject by the investigation into the causes of fatal accidents which is now being carried out by my Department with the help of the police.

Sir W. BRASS: Will my hon. and gallant Friend consider making it compulsory for all drivers to know the code of the road before they are given licences to drive.

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: I have observed that this is a question which is most certainly being considered by His Majesty's Government.

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE.

Mr. LANSBURY (by Private Notice) asked the Prime Minister whether he has any statement to make with respect to the Disarmament Conference?

The PRIME MINISTER: My right hon. Friend has no doubt seen a statement which the Government issued to the Press on Friday evening. I have nothing which I can usefully add thereto. The Foreign Secretary and I intend to proceed to Geneva as soon as can be conveniently arranged.

Mr. LANSBURY: I should like to raise a question regarding the Privileges of this House. It is usual when Parliament is sitting, and the Government have an important statement to make, that such statement should be made in the House of Commons. There was plenty of time on Friday after the Cabinet meeting, which I understood took place, for the Government to have arranged for a statement to be made in the House. If they did not want to make an arrangement with the Opposition, it could have been arranged through the Patronage Secretary for one of their own Members to put a question at the close of business on Friday. I think it is a very grave departure that Members of this House, over the week-end, should have to get information from the newspapers, which is not always accurate.

The PRIME MINISTER: I agree that newspaper information is not always accurate, but when it is given by the Government, it is. With reference to the further part of the question, there was no policy to announce, and there was no policy announced in the newspapers on Friday. As a matter of fact, it was not possible to make an announcement in the House before it rose on Friday.

Mr. LANSBURY: I am sorry to disagree with the right hon. Gentleman, but I am under the impression that I read the news on the tape before I left the House on Friday.

Sir J. SIMON indicated dissent.

Mr. LANSBURY: The Foreign Secretary shakes his head. I must put my own memory against his. I wish to emphasise the fact that there is a growing habit on the part of the Government to give the country information through the newspapers, instead of on the Floor of this House. We ought to have been able to ask questions on the statement. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is going to Geneva without giving the House any information, clear and definite, as to why he and the Foreign Secretary are called upon at a moment's notice to go; and what proposals he intends to make to the Disarmament Conference? Surely this House is as much entitled to know as anybody?

The PRIME MINISTER: No question of policy was raised in the statement, and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that, as a matter of fact, the time was such that under the Rules of this House it was impossible before four o'clock for myself or anybody else to come from the place where we were sitting and announce that we were going to Geneva. The business of the House has to be suspended, there is no Motion for the Adjournment on Fridays, Mr. Speaker leaves the Chair, and the time at our disposal was inadequate to make arrangements for any such announcement on Friday afternoon. I am giving that information to the House to show that no discourtesy was meant and that the point was not overlooked. As a matter of fact, the nature of the decision that we should go to Geneva was not a decision in regard to policy and, therefore, does not come under a question of courtesy.

Mr. LANSBURY: I hope the Prime Minister will kindly give me his attention. He is quite mistaken in saying that it is anything unusual for the Government to come to the House of Commons and ask to be allowed to make an important statement on a Friday afternoon. The Lord President of the Council did so last Session, I forget the exact occasion, but I think it was in connection with the Lausanne Agreement. Arrangements were specially made for this to be done on a Friday afternoon, and, if the Lord President of the Council can do so, the right hon. Gentleman can; and to say that it could not be done because of the Rules of the House is sheer nonsense and is playing with the House. I repeat: the House was treated extremely badly last Friday in not having the statement made to it instead of publishing it in the Press.

Mr. MAXTON: Further in regard to the question that has been put, not merely the question of procedure: can the Prime Minister now tell the House when he and the Foreign Secretary are going to Geneva; how long they are going to be away; and are they going for the general purposes of the Disarmament Conference or in connection with the more limited question of the Chinese-Japanese embargo, which the Foreign Secretary said would be dealt with? Further, does the Prime Minister think that to go to the Disarmament Conference is the most important work that our Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary can do at the present time?

The PRIME MINISTER: At the moment we think it is a piece of work so important that it should be done. Our purpose in going to Geneva is to try and get some sort of agreement as to how the Disarmament Conference can do its business in the best way at the moment. There is no new policy. We are going to try and use whatever influence we may have to get the Disarmament Conference to a point when an agreement although not reached is well within sight.

Mr. LANSBURY: But the right hon. Gentleman is going to Geneva without the House of Commons knowing all the facts which have compelled the Government to take the extraordinary step of sending the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary to the Disarmament Conference, without the House having any opportunity of discussing the matter. Surely this House has a right to know?

The PRIME MINISTER: The right hon. Gentleman seems to forget that both the Foreign Secretary and I have been to Geneva on Disarmament business again and again. Moreover, the list of British delegates, published when the Disarmament Conference started its work, included both the Foreign Secretary and myself. We are technically at Geneva now.

Mr. LANSBURY: The majority of the House of Commons may accept that statement, but I say that it is playing with the House of Commons for the Prime Minister not to make a full and complete statement of what the Under-Secretary of State came back and told him, and which has caused the Government to take this hasty decision.

AGRICULTURAL MARKETING BILL,

"to provide for regulating the importation and sale of agricultural products and for organising the production of secondary agricultural products; to amend the law with respect to the marketing of agricultural products; and to make further provision in connection with the matters aforesaid," presented by Major Elliot; supported by Sir John Gilmour, Secretary Sir Godfrey Collins, Mr. Runciman, and the Attorney-General; to be read a Second time upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 67.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LANSBURY: I should like to know how far the Prime Minister proposes to go with the business down for to-day?

Mr. MOLSON: May I also ask whether the Government are aware that it is important that the Doncaster Drainage Bill should be passed as soon as possible?

The PRIME MINISTER: We want to get the first three Orders on the Paper —Housing (Financial Provisions) Bill, the Doncaster Area Drainage Bill, and the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Bill. There are also other Orders on the Paper, Nos. 4 and 5—Evidence (Foreign, Dominion and Colonial Documents) Bill, Assurance Companies (Winding Up) Bill —which it is understood are not contentious. There is no intention of keeping the House unduly late. The Government hope to obtain the remaining stages of the Housing (Financial Provisions) Bill, and will make as much progress as possible with the other Orders on the Paper to which I have referred. I hope that it will be possible to deal with the Doncaster Area Drainage Bill to-day, because, as the House is aware, there is further serious flooding in that district.

Mr. LANSBURY: In regard to the business announced by the Prime Minister, of course, so far as we are concerned, we shall do everything possible to help the Doncaster Area Drainage Bill through, but, as regards the Assurance Companies (Winding Up) Bill, we have not had an opportunity of really looking at that Bill, and we are not sure, therefore, what our attitude will be.

The PRIME MINISTER: If there is any objection to proceeding with that Bill, it certainly will not be proceeded with.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the Proceedings on Government Business be exempted, at this day's Sitting, from the provisions of the Standing Order (Sittings of the House)."—[The Prime Minister.]

The House divided: Ayes, 260; Noes, 31.

PROTECTION OF ANIMALS (AMENDMENT) (No. 2) BILL,

"to amend section three of the Protection of Animals Act, 1911," presented by Sir Robert Gower; supported by Major-General Sir Alfred Knox, Lieut.-Colonel Moore, Mr. Lovat-Fraser, Captain Erskine-Bolst, Mr. David Grenfell, Sir Cooper Rawson, Sir George Jones, and Mr. Harbord; to be read a Second time upon Friday, and to be printed. WRITTEN ANSWERS.

INDIA.

Silver.

Mr. T. GRIFFITHS asked the Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India will consider the advisability of utilising a portion of the gold currency reserve for the purchase of silver with a view to the coinage of rupees?

Sir S. HOARE: No, Sir. The Government of India have no need of further silver beyond their present holdings.

Territorial and Auxiliary Forces.

Mr. T. GRIFFITHS asked the Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India have under consideration the recommendations of the Territorial and Auxiliary Forces Committee; and, if so, when a decision may be expected on the matter?

Sir S. HOARE: This Committee reported in 1925. Its recommendations were considered in 1926 and approved with minor modifications in 1927.

Sub-Judgeships, Punjab.

Captain FULLER asked the Secretary of State for India if he is aware of recent cases in the Punjab where candidates related to judicial officers have been appointed to sub-judgeships over others who had qualified for the appointments by competitive examination; what action has been taken against those concerned; and how it is proposed to prevent such happenings in future?

Sir S. HOARE: I have seen a statement in the Press regarding this matter, and am making inquiries of the Government of India.

Meerut Prisoners.

Mr. E. WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for India the name of the prison where the Meerut prisoners are confined; and, if they have been distributed to more than one prison, will he give particulars?

Sir S. HOARE: All the prisoners except one continue to be confined in the Meerut Jail, pending their decisions on the question of an appeal to the High Court.

Education.

Mr. MORGAN JONES asked the Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Government of India has been drawn to the lack of funds in the several provinces of India for the purpose of implementing legislation for primary education in rural areas and for the depressed classes; and, if so, what steps they propose to take with a view to enabling provincial Governments to carry such legislation into effect?

Sir S. HOARE: I have no information on the matter. Education is a subject which is under the control of the Governments in India, and it is for them to decide what steps can be taken to give effect to legislation of the kind referred to.

Royal Engineers (Railway Locomotives, Handling).

Duchess of ATHOLL asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office the number of officers and men of the Royal Engineers trained in the handling of railway locomotives in India in each of the years 1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932?

Sir S. HOARE: The information asked for is not available here, but will be obtained from the Government of India if my Noble Friend so desires.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

RUSSIA.

Sir B. PETO asked the President of the Board of Trade what was the excess of imports over exports of merchandise in the 11 years, 1922 to 1932, in the trade of the United Kingdom with the Soviet Union, excluding re-exports from this country of goods imported for export?

Dr. BURGIN: The total imports into the United Kingdom of merchandise consigned from the Soviet Union during the 11 years, 1922 to 1932, exceeded in value our domestic exports to that country by £185,500,000.

Sir A. KNOX asked the President of the Board of Trade what was the value of goods imported from the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics in 1932; the value of exports of British produce, and of re-exports of imported merchandise, respectively, consigned from Great Britain to the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics in the same year?

Dr. BURGIN: As stated in the issue of the "Accounts relating to Trade and Navigation of the United Kingdom" for January last, the total declared value of merchandise imported into and exported from the United Kingdom in the trade with the Soviet Union during 1932 was as follows: Total imports, £19,697,013; domestic exports, £9,274,534; re-exports, £1,221,565.

IMPERIAL PREFERENCE (PALESTINE).

Mr. D. ADAMS asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether His Majesty's Government have decided to give the benefit of the preferential tariff rates applicable to the Dominions to the mandated territory of Palestine?

Sir P. CUNLIFFE-LISTER: I would refer to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley (Mr. Joel) on the 1st of this month, of which I will send the hon. Member a copy.

ROYAL DOCKYARDS (UNESTABLISHED MEN).

Mr. HICKS asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty what is the present number of unestablished men in His Majesty's dockyards and naval depots over the age of 45; how many of these men are likely to be retained until they reach the age of 60; and what steps, if any, are to be taken to place such men on the established list during the next few years?

Lord STANLEY: I regret that we have not the statistics available to enable me to give a precise reply to the first part of the question. With regard to the second part, it is the policy of the Admiralty to avoid discharges of unestablished men so far as is practicable and consistent with the amount of work to be done. With regard to the last part of the question, the proportion of established men now borne is considerably in excess of the normal limits, and at the present time one vacancy in six is being filled.

ARGENTINE RAILWAYS (BRITISH CAPITAL).

Sir B. FALLE asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether His Majesty's Ambassador in Buenos Aires will make representations to the Argentine Government to safeguard the interests of the railways in Argentina capitalised with British money which are now in competition with Argentine State-organised railways?

Sir J. SIMON: His Majesty's Government are ready to consider any specific claim for assistance put before them by the interested party and to make suitable representations whenever they can be usefully made in regard to a particular case.

GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS (ACCOUNTANTS).

Mr. RHYS DAVIES asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the Civil Service is practically closed to persons who have been articled to firms of accountants and who, at the age of 21 or thereabouts, have passed their final examinations to qualify in that profession outside the Civil Service; and whether he can make arrangements to allow such persons to compete in Civil Service examinations for Government posts as accountants and auditors on equal terms with members of the Civil Service staffs?

Mr. HORE-BELISHA: Vacancies in the Civil Service for which it is considered desirable to require candidates to have obtained professional accountancy qualifications at the time of candidature are ordinarily open to civil servants and outside candidates alike. In other cases candidates are recruited for accounting duties direct from the normal Civil Service open competitive examinations and where necessary subsequently acquire professional qualifications during their service. These competitions are open to all candidates at the prescribed age limits, and I see no reason for extending these limits in favour of persons who article themselves to firms of outside accountants. I would add, for the information of the hon. Member, that persons who have qualified as accountants are eligible to compete for commissions in the Accountant Branch of the Royal Air Force if they are between the ages of 22 and 26 years.

ELECTRICITY SUPPLY.

Captain FULLER asked the Minister of Transport what the estimated capital expenditure of the electricity grid system is; how much has been expended to date; and if he is satisfied that the work will be carried out within the estimate?

Lieut.-Colonel HEADLAM: The annual report and accounts of the Central Electricity Board for last year showing the actual expenditure to 31st December are not yet published, but I understand they will shortly be available, and will show the actual expenditure up to that date. As regards the original estimated cost of the grid, including standardisation of frequency, I would refer my hon. and gallant Friend to the eleventh report of the Electricity Commissioners (for the year 1930-31) where the position is set out.

HOUSING (MATERIALS).

Sir C. RAWSON asked the Minister of Health if His Majesty's Government propose to take any steps to prevent syndicates subsidised by local authorities or building societies from importing foreign bricks and cement in connection with the erection of houses so long as British products are available for the purpose?

Sir H. YOUNG: I am not aware of the existence of any such syndicate as my hon. Friend apparently has in mind.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (SURPLUS PROPERTY SALE).

Mr. THORP asked the Minister of Health whether he is aware that a contract has been entered into by the London County Council for the sale of Numbers Farm, King's Langley, Herts; as this sale is subject to his approval, will he state the cause of the delay in granting or refusing consent; and, as the delay is causing some 40 men to be out of temporary employment and some 10 men to be out of permanent employment, will he expedite his decision upon the question?

Sir H. YOUNG: My consent to this sale was issued on 28th February.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

HOUSING (FINANCIAL PROVISIONS) BILL.

As amended, considered.

CLAUSE 1.—(Discontinuance of certain subsidies under 13 and 14 Geo. 5. c. 24 and 14 and 15 Geo. 5. c. 35.)

4.11 p.m.

Mr. HICKS: I beg to move, in page 1, line 19, after the word "December," to insert the words:

"or that substantial expenditure had been incurred in the acquisition of land for housing."

In the Committee stage last week we asked the Minister to accept an Amendment for advancing the date from 7th December until 1st July, 1933. We thought then that there had not been adequate alternative arrangements made for house building, and I still feel personally very uneasy about the matter. We, therefore, begged the Minister to give himself greater freedom by accepting the date which we mentioned. The Minister, apparently, was not willing to be favourably impressed by our appeal to extend the period beyond 7th December, although at that time we stated very definitely that it was still within his prorogative and right to withhold his approval from schemes which he felt inclined to reject. I listened with interest to a reply which the Minister gave to a Private Notice Question to-day regarding the setting up of a committee to assist him in this particular work, and I was interested to hear that arrangements were being made to advise upon the establishment of public utility societies, as to their wisdom or otherwise, in order to assist the Government to get on with the housing programme. I have no objection at all to such a course, and I shall be very interested to find what is the degree of public response, not only to the suggestion but perhaps even the recommendation.

The definite and specific reason of this Amendment is to give the Minister greater time and a bigger range of opportunity for sanctioning the subsidy on housing schemes. I am very apprehensive that there will be a very stiff gap between the period when this Bill becomes law and the resumption of housing activities in this country. It is for these reasons that I want to give the Minister this greater power. If the public utility societies come into existence, I am unable to understand, and perhaps the Minister will help me to understand, how those societies will be able to borrow the money from the building societies, and be able to build the houses. I am unable to see how the building societies can lend money at 4 or 4½ per cent. when they themselves are generally committed at the present time to paying 4 per cent. to people who have stock in the building societies. They are committed to pay 4 per cent. without tax, and it is generally understood that something like 1 per cent. is required for general administration expenses. A public utility society might be able to borrow this money outside the building societies, and there are people who, if they knew that the money was being raised specifically for housing, would have sympathy with the purpose, and possibly would lend the money at a lower rate. There must be many municipal authorities that in years past have purchased land for the specific purpose of house building. They have laid out the land, constructed roads and put in drainage in anticipation of a general building programme for which they would be able to get financial support from the Government. The Borough of Woolwich, one-half of which I represent, sent to me a letter and begged me to bring this matter forward. They also wrote to the Minister as follows:

> "As you are aware, the Woolwich Borough Council has purchased, with your approval, an estate known as the Middle Park Housing Estate, upon which approximately 2,200 houses are proposed to be erected, and of this number the Ministry has approved for subsidy purposes schemes of 400, 4, and 388, a total of 792, leaving approximately a further 1,408 houses to be erected on this Estate."

They further say:

> "The Estate was purchased by the borough council on the assumption that the houses to be erected would benefit by the subsidy provided for by the Housing (Financial Provisions) Act, 1924."

I presume that Woolwich is not the only borough council which has purchased land on a similar assumption. The Woolwich Council say that they would have been prepared to have accepted the modifications of the 1924 Act which have taken place from time to time. They go on:

"It is a serious matter for the borough to be left with this large area of land undeveloped, and in respect of which loan charges are payable for its acquisition, and with no prospect of receiving any Government grant towards the houses which will be constructed."

I am very glad to see the right hon. Member for West Woolwich (Sir K. Wood) in his place, and I am sure that he will be only too pleased to support me in this request by speech, if not later on in the Lobby. The position is a serious one for many councils. The sites have been laid out, plans prepared and everything made ready for building. I can only presume that in many cases it has been the industrial depression which has prevented municipal authorities from pestering the Minister with greater persistency, and that if industry had been running normally the requests for housing assistance would have come in to the Minister at a much greater rate. But industry and trade have been so uncertain and irregular that municipalities have held their hands. Yet as an indication of their intention to provide houses they have taken adequate steps at other places as well as at Woolwich. That the Minister should take to himself the power proposed seems to me a practical suggestion. If he found that the applications made to him were unfair, he has still the power to withhold his sanction. I beg him to believe us that we think the gap which will be created between the passing of this Bill and the development of housing activity in another way, is a very big gap. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to take these powers in order that he may have an opportunity of rendering assistance to those municipal authorities which have made substantial expenditure in the acquisition of land for housing. Failing such assistance, I am certain that the progress of house building will be very miserable indeed.

4.27 p.m.

Mr. McENTEE: I would add my word to that of the hon. Member who has moved this Amendment, and my plea to the Minister to give most serious consideration to this matter. I can assure him that Woolwich is not the only district where serious difficulties may arise in the local council in connection with land left on their hands as a consequence of the Government's change of policy. In my own area and that immediately surrounding it, we have land, some of which we purchased during the War period at the direct instigation of the Government of that time. The Government of that time said that they desired local authorities to purchase land for large housing schemes, to make up the wastage of war time and to try to overtake the need for housing. We purchased the land, a very considerable number of acres. The same policy was carried on by successive Governments. The land was bought under conditions entirely different from those of to-day. In many areas the price that was paid could not be secured to-day if that land had to be sold in the ordinary market, or in a forced market.

In the case of some local authorities a penny rate brings in very little, and a comparatively small loss on the sale of land might mean a considerable addition to the local rates. Apart from that, a forced sale is always a bad sale. If it became known that the policy of the Ministry of Health would compel local authorities to sell the land that they held for the purpose of building houses, it is obvious that those who would be willing to purchase would not pay as good a price as ordinarily they would pay. If there are losses on the sale, who is to bear those losses? I do not think the Government will come along and say, "A previous Government, our own predecessors, induced you by circulars that they sent to you to purchase land for housing. Government policy has changed, and now we are trying to compel you to sell that land. As a consequence of the change in public policy there will be a loss on the sale of the land, and the Government are quite willing to meet you in that loss and to make a grant from the Exchequer." I would like to believe that the Government would do that.

My own area is one of the areas affected. It is true that there are many other uses to which the land there may be put by the local authority, and I am wondering whether the Government would sanction those other uses if application were made to them. I have known of some of this housing land being wanted for other purposes by the local authority, but we had the greatest difficulty in getting the Minister to sanction the change of purpose in the utilisation of the land. If we are to be compelled to use the land for some purpose other than the purpose for which we bought it, will Government sanction be easy to obtain, or are we to be put to the trouble and expense of very protracted negotiations with the Ministry and other bodies in making the transfer? The Minister ought to give serious attention to the matters raised by the Amendment.

4.29 p.m.

Sir PERCY HARRIS: This is a comparatively narrow but still an important point. It depends largely on the interpretation of the powers, the elasticity and the latitude given to the Minister in the withdrawal of the subsidy. I understand the Mover of the Amendment wants a broader interpretation. Estates have been bought, some of them many years ago, for the development of housing. I have in mind particularly two in London. I mention them not because I want to take London as standing alone, but merely as an example of what has happened all over the country. In London just after the War—early in 1919—at the instigation of the Government, the county council went in for a very big undertaking which became known as the Becontree Estate. This is an estate covering 3,000 acres and its development has been a very slow business. It is by no means completed even now. Very large sums of money have been spent in setting up a complicated organisation. Instead of developing the estate under an ordinary contract there has been a super-contractor, the firm of Messrs. Willis and Company acting as agents for the county council, and many thousands of pounds have been spent in plans, machinery and organisation. One of the difficulties in connection with that estate has been the sewerage, in relation to Barking and various drainage areas, and a large sum has been spent in sewering.

What I would like to know is, will the Minister allow to rank for subsidy schemes which have been outlined but which have not been submitted to him in detail, that is to say, with tenders, quantities and so forth? There is another estate on a smaller scale, the St. Helier Estate. A large part of it is practically untouched. In that case land was bought with the approval of the Minister for housing purposes and laid out and planned with roads, parks and gardens. Are we to allow the rest of that estate to remain high and dry without any subsidy? The Minister may say, with some reason, that the local authority can do the job itself out of the rates. If he says so he has a higher opinion of the local authorities in these matters than I have. Local authorities are inclined to say, "If we are to do a job of this kind there must be a partnership between the local authority and the State."

I would like the Minister to say either that he can accept the Amendment or, alternatively, that his powers are to be interpreted as including the power of helping in the case of uncompleted estates. That would be a great assistance to local authorities throughout the country. The right hon. Gentleman is an optimist about housing. He has put his trust in the building societies and the private builder. He may be right. Time alone will show. Some people believe that with the large amount of money which is lying idle it is possible that the building societies and the private builders will come into operation and that ultimately there will be a large output of suitable houses to let. But before that takes place there is likely to be an interregnum and that is the real danger. It would be a great stimulus to local authorities who have bought estates with the approval of the Department but have not developed those estates if they knew that such cases would be entitled to the same consideration as cases of actual contracts and schemes for the construction of houses, submitted to the Minister.

4.35 p.m.

Colonel CHAPMAN: I ask the Minister to accept this Amendment, but not solely for the reasons which have so far been put forward, although I am in agreement with the idea of the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) that there will be an interregnum between the present provision of houses and the provision of houses under this Measure. There, however, is a type of house which up to now has not been dealt with and that is the small house for aged persons. Under the 1930 Act power was given to build two-roomed houses. Up to that time all parties seemed to be against building any two-roomed houses. There is at present in mining constituencies an urgent demand for houses of that type. In Durham for many years there has been a remarkable organisation called the Aged Miners Homes. Houses were built by the joint efforts of owners and miners and were let to old people so that after their working days they might spend the evening of their lives in comfort. The crisis through which the mining industry is passing has prevented the extension of the work of providing those homes and has also made it necessary to reduce the pensions payable to these old people.

The Amendment is after all only permissive. Under it the Minister might grant permission to build these houses and if the right hon. Gentleman accepts it an opportunity will be given to municipalities to provide two-roomed houses for aged persons where such houses are found to be necessary. I ask the Minister to consider the enormous impetus which would be given to the rehousing of the people by such a step. If those houses were provided many aged persons could go out of the three-roomed or four-roomed houses which they at present occupy. At present, in order to occupy three-roomed or four-roomed houses those aged people in many cases have to go to the public assistance committees for an augmentation of their pensions, as a pension of 25s. a week is not sufficient to enable them to pay the rents of such houses. It might be possible, however, for those old people to live on their pensions and pay smaller rents. I submit that on those grounds the Minister ought to consider the Amendment favourably.

4.37 p.m.

The MINISTER of HEALTH (Sir Hilton Young): I think I ought to clear the ground at the outset by explaining to the hon. and gallant Member for Houghton-le-Spring (Colonel Chapman) that this Amendment would have no effect whatever upon the powers of the Minister in connection with the building of small houses for aged persons. The Amendment only relates to the power of the Minister to accept plans proposed by local authorities in respect of land which they already have in hand. I am unable to accept the Amendment which is very much too wide in its extent. I recognise the motives which have led the hon. Members opposite to propose it and the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) to support it. They are anxious to obtain a further extension of what we have been calling in these Debates the buffer or the means of tiding over the transition period. I have admitted freely the desirability of having a good buffer in this respect and I have taken measures to secure it by the Amendment which was accepted during the Committee stage. What I have to represent to the House to-day is that the course which we took then was the right course for securing such a buffer as is required and that this Amendment would be a wrong way.

Consider the case of the local authorities who are in possession of land intended for housing estates. A local authority requires that land either for its immediate needs or for its future needs. If it wants the land for its immediate needs there is ample provision in the Amendment accepted during the Committee stage for making sure that the land shall be used for that purpose. The reply to the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green is that I shall be competent to consider the schemes which he has under consideration, if they answer the test established the other day. That test is indicated in the words which were inserted in the Bill:

> "Provided that if the Minister is satisfied that proposals for providing or promoting the provision of houses under those Acts had been prepared and were substantially ready to be submitted to him before the said seventh day of December, he may, subject to the approval of the Treasury, treat the proposals for the purposes of this Section, as if they had been submitted to him before that date."

That is the reasonable test. That relates the proposal to the fact of whether or not it is required for the immediate housing needs of the neighbourhood. But the question of whether or not the housing authority has already purchased land in order to provide houses, has no relation to the immediate needs of the neighbourhood. It may be that a local authority has purchased for years ahead, and that it has no need and will have no need, for many years to come, for the houses. If the House agrees to that distinction I think they will see that the Amendment is an unpractical one which would give an unreasonably wide extension to the powers for still admitting certain schemes to subsidy provided in the Bill as it now stands.

The buffer to which reference has been made consists of three springs. First there is the large number of houses which have already been approved for subsidy. The House may not be aware that no fewer than 70,000 houses have been already approved for subsidy which should be complete during or shortly after the calendar year 1933. The second spring of the buffer is the power of the Minister still to approve for subsidy schemes which had been prepared and were substantially ready before 7th December. My submission is that in those two ways ample provision is made for the immediate needs of localities. All that remains are the future needs. The land which is already in the possession of local authorities for future needs is not going to be wasted. There will still be the power of the local authority to make use of that land for housing purposes without a subsidy.

The hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green appeared to pour scorn on the idea of housing schemes being carried out by a local authority without a subsidy. I established, I think, by the figures which I gave on the Second Reading that it is now possible for local authorities, without a subsidy, to produce houses which can be let at rents within a few pence of the standard normal rents at which houses could be let under a subsidy. In these circumstances there is no insurmountable economic obstacle between the local authorities and the construction of houses without subsidy, and in that way they can make use of the land which has been purchased for future housing needs. That is the substance of the matter. There is first, the provision enabling us to take in schemes which were prepared and substantially ready. That is, as regards present needs. Then as regards future needs the local authorities will still be able to use this land for housing schemes without subsidy.

Lastly, an essential reason against admitting the Amendment is that it would practically establish an indefinite extension of the period during which subsidised building would be still on the tapis, in competition with unsubsidised building, and thereby we should be getting the worst of both worlds; we should be damping down the local authorities, and we should still be keeping the obstacle in the way of the private builder.

4.46 p.m.

Mr. GREENWOOD: I regard with the deepest regret the speech which we have just heard from the Minister. I am not surprised, but I am sorry. The right hon. Gentleman has treated us to one of his usual, quite irrelevant, speeches. The point of this Amendment is simple. Ever since 1919 Minister of Health after Minister of Health—I believe the right hon. Gentleman is the sixth—has approved the purchase of land by local authorities for the building of working-class houses. For 13 years that Ministerial approval has been given to applications by local authorities on the assumption that, once the land was bought, local authorities would be enabled, because for 13 years they have had State assistance, to build the houses. The right hon. Gentleman says that if we accept this Amendment, it means an indefinite extension of the principle of the subsidy. Had this been a commercial venture, and had it been an implied term of the contract that when local authorities purchased land for the building of houses there were to be sums provided by the State, it would have been regarded as dishonourable if the contract were broken after land had been purchased.

The plain position to-day is this, that there are thousands of acres of land in England and Wales purchased, at different times since the end of the War, with the object of building working-class houses. That land was bought, not because local authorities wanted to make a great experiment in municipal enterprise, but in order to meet what they knew to be the housing needs of their own people; and under various Acts of Parliament they have been able to proceed with different kinds of public aid. I have not got the figures, so that I cannot speak in terms of actual figures, but my submission is that a very large proportion of that land was bought at a time during the period after the War, when land values were much higher than they are now. That land is now to be left with the local authorities. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that they can use it still for the building of houses, but if that land was bought at £150 an acre, and if now, because of the general slump, land is worth only £50 an acre, how are the local authorities to compete with the private builder? It is utterly impossible. It is asking the local authorities to undertake a task which is quite beyond their power.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to a buffer and said that we had spoken about a buffer. Let me inform him that nobody in this House but himself has ever spoken about a buffer in this connection, and I was not sure in what sense he meant the term until he said that it had three springs in it. The first spring was that 70,000 houses had already been approved at the end of last year, or when the Bill was introduced, and will be built during the present calendar year. The Bill has nothing whatever to do with those houses. They were approved under existing legislation, and, if I may say so, I can take credit myself for those 70,000 houses. That is not the buffer, it is not even a spring of the buffer, it is not anything but a fact which would have gone on and been realised, irrespective of this Bill.

The right hon. Gentleman falls back on the Amendment which he accepted in Committee, dealing with schemes substantially ready, and he says that that gives him elasticity. I say what I said in the Committee stage: I mistrust his use of this power to be elastic. Had he been prepared to make a firm definition and put it in the Bill, I should have understood that he meant to carry it out, but these vague words about schemes which are substantially ready leave him, with all the influence of an economy Government behind him, to interpret the word "substantially." Where land is already in the ownership of local authorities, there is surely a case, even if this National Government continues its inglorious career for a long time, for honouring past contracts, seeing that successive Ministers have approved the purchase of land for the building of working-class houses under the Housing Acts.

This is not a Housing Act; this is an abrogation of responsibility for Housing Acts, and local authorities are morally entitled to look forward to a fulfilment of the undertaking given by successive Ministers in the past that houses built for working-class occupants shall be used for that purpose. I would suggest that there must be many Members representing constituencies where local authorities have bought land in the expectation that they would be permitted to continue their building programmes, because they could not build all the houses at once. My hon. Friend the member for East Woolwich (Mr. Hicks) is here, and I am sorry the right hon. Member for West Woolwich (Sir K. Wood) has fled at this point. Ah, there he is. I am only sorry he is not taking part in this Debate, because there is this great developing area of Woolwich. After infinite difficulty, during the time when I was in office, Woolwich succeeded in obtaining a very large estate for the building of about 2,500 houses. There was no indication then, and indeed the situation then gave no inkling of the possibility, that there would be a National Government, so-called, which would cut the cackle and get rid of its past responsibilities. That was perhaps an unfortunate term.

Woolwich has built about one-third of the houses which it intended to build on that estate. Is Woolwich to sell that land? Is it to incur very substantial expenditure on utilising that land for other purposes, without any kind of State assistance? Is it to be assumed that Woolwich did not require that land for housing needs? Woolwich is faced with the dilemma of either trying to build houses on the land without a subsidy, or possibly selling that land at existing prices below what they might have paid for it. The estate so far consists of houses built under proper organisation and under proper conditions, and Woolwich may have to allow that magnificent site to be handed over to the private builder, to build houses of any sort or kind, subject to the very vague restrictions which the Minister says he may perhaps exercise and utilise.

I submit that this is a very reasonable Amendment and one which the House might very well accept. I imagine that if hon. Members could for the moment get rid, I will not say of their party loyalty, because hon. Members opposite are such a mixed crew to-day, but of the fear of the Whip. If the Whips were not to be put on in this Division, and if hon. Members could vote according to their conscience, they would know that it was a matter of elementary justice that local authorities which have purchased land for housing purposes on the assumption, sustained for 13 years, that there would be public assistance, should be allowed to continue their work. I hope the House will accept the Amendment and reject the Minister's advice.

4.58 p.m.

Sir FRANCIS FREMANTLE: The hon. Member for East Woolwich (Mr. Hicks), in putting his case for the Amendment very moderately, said that all housing enthusiasts would agree in asking for this Amendment. It naturally appeals to many on this side, who do not give to hon. Members opposite any priority as regards their keenness on housing for the working classes, but he is not right in saying that all of us would agree with the Amendment. I regret that the right hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Greenwood) should have appealed to Members from the point of view of their heart to vote for this Amendment, and should have said that if the Whips were removed, we on this side would largely go over to the Amendment. That is just where enthusiasts, with all their striving, fail, that they let their heart get the better of their head.

Mr. GREENWOOD: When did I say that I appealed to your heart? I appealed to your reason.

Sir F. FREMANTLE: No, that is just what the right hon. Gentleman did not do, and he will see in the OFFICIAL REPORT to-morrow that he wound up with an impassioned appeal, as usual, to our heart and enthusiasm, not to our reason.

Mr. GREENWOOD: To your conscience. Is that feeling?

Sir F. FREMANTLE: Conscience it was. We have to look, however, at the business side of this matter.

Mr. GREENWOOD: Ah!

Sir F. FREMANTLE: The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that we ought not to look at the business side, but that is just the difference between Members on that side and Members on this side. The right hon. Gentleman is quite consistent in taking the line that this country can afford anything that it wants, which he said on a famous occasion. That is why he and his Government brought the country to the brink of ruin, and that is why the Government turned them out. We say that money is simply a means of barter, and every individual who really knows what the responsibilities of money are, knows that we must deal with this matter from a business point of view. We have to look at this Amendment from the business point of view. I think the right hon. Member for Wakefield recognises that his argument about land bought by local authorities, which he thinks should have been allowed to develop under the existing conditions and with existing subsidies, fails. The hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) referred to the two estates of the London County Council, which will serve as an illustration. I was responsible for buying the Becontree Estate on behalf of the London County Council and devising a scheme for 24,000 houses.

Mr. HICKS: A very good work.

Sir F. FREMANTLE: It was a very good piece of work on the part of the London County Council. Had the county council a right to say that, because the Government had passed the purchase of that land under the Addison subsidies, those subsidies should be continued for all time until the 24,000 houses had been erected? Of course not. Sir Alfred Mond came into office, and he had to use the knife and cut down the subsidies. Then the right hon. Gentleman who is now the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced his housing scheme in 1923 with a fresh scheme of subsidies at a much lower rate. Was there an outcry that the London County Council were being unjustly treated or that housing was being put back? When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wakefield was Minister, he on his own showing ought to have restored the subsidies to the rate of the Addison subsidies. As he did not do so, he showed that there was a case for lowering them, and that does away with his argument that if land were purchased when the subsidies were being paid they should be continued until the land was developed. There is a point on which we must all agree as housing enthusiasts. The policy has now been changed from a policy of subsidies to a policy of no subsidies. It may be right or wrong, but we all ought to be able to join together in saying that we will make the best use we can of the new policy. We must have a cut and dried line where we change from one policy to the other and where the new organisation for private enterprise will come into force.

[Sir F. Fremantle.]

If the London County Council, the Metropolitan borough councils and the other councils round London were still allowed to think that for the next three years they can go on developing with the existing subsidy on the estates that they have purchased, private enterprise would say that they could not yet compete with the local authorities, and it would defer the day when private enterprise could come into the market and do their work. Having once decided rightly or wrongly to change our policy we must bring it into force as soon as possible for the sake of housing development. I hope that private enterprise will be able to rise to the requirements with the lower cost of money and possibly the lower cost of building, and that we shall be able to get the lower rented houses which we all desire. There is a case for saying that the cut should not be a straight line, because we must meet the needs of the organisation and the plans that have already been prepared. The Bill meets that point, and the Minister has to be trusted to interpret his powers wisely so as to get the result that we want and to encourage private enterprise to come back. Under the Clause as it stands we can get what is required by the Amendment, and no further extension is required. Therefore, I as a housing enthusiast shall vote against it.

5.6 p.m.

Mr. PRICE: The hon. and gallant Member for St. Albans (Sir F. Fremantle) said that we have endeavoured to get support for the Amendment by appealing to the hearts of Members on the other side. I shall not trouble to do that because I have been convinced since I have been here that they have no hearts. I do not think, either, that it is any use appealing to their reason, for I doubt whether they understand reason. I will endeavour, therefore, to put the case for the Amendment from the point of view of business. The Amendment endeavours to draw a line of demarcation on which the subsidy should be paid. In the development of housing by local authorities, it would be fair to suggest that in nearly every case the councils, whether made up of Conservatives or not, had the idea that they were going to make provision for the needs of their districts. It would be interesting to know whether the Minister would be prepared to accept his own qualification and fix that as the line of demarcation. He says that councils may have bought land far in excess of the housing needs of the district. If he will take the needs of the districts as the standard, we shall be satisfied. In many cases streets have been laid out at tremendous expenses by local authorities in the firm belief that they would be allowed to continue to meet the needs of their districts, even on a subsidy lower than when the land was bought. We say that the housing needs of the people cannot yet be met by private enterprise at a rent which will fit the income and the wage of the poor men who need houses. We ask, therefore, that a reasonable line of demarcation shall be laid down so that the local authorities will be safeguarded against any loss in the layout of the land which was undertaken with the full encouragement of the Minister, and that houses should be allowed to be built under the existing subsidy until the estates are completed. In reply to a question put by an hon. Friend with regard to small houses for old age pensioners, the Minister said, I understood, that that type of house could still go on.

Sir H. YOUNG: What I said was that it had no relation to this Amendment.

Mr. PRICE: It has this relation to the Amendment, that houses of the type which are provided for old age pensioners receive subsidy assistance. Will they receive it now? I belong to an authority which has had an application turned down for the building of small houses for old age pensioners, and we are anxious to know whether the reply of the Minister still obtains and that we shall be able to continue this type of house with subsidy assistance. If not, local authorities will not be in a position to build such houses at a suitable rent. We are not satisfied with the reply of the Minister to this Amendment. We should be prepared to accept the needs of a district as the criterion for we should be able to prove to the satisfaction of the Minister that there is still any amount of need in every part of the country for working-class houses at reasonable rents. The attitude of the Minister is not to develop houses for the poor underpaid and low wage worker, but to retard the building of the type of house that is most needed and that will certainly not be built under private enterprise and the building societies.

5.11 p.m.

Sir WILFRID SUGDEN: I have listened with amusement as well as interest to the plea of those who desire to protect the landowners, and I am carefully taking note of it ready for the time when the exploitation and the spoliation of the legitimate development of land comes before the House, when I hope we shall have substantial support from the Opposition benches. I desire particularly to claim that common sense and sympathy can go together, and I want to say in support of the Minister that what is being done under this Bill will result in a saving to the pockets of the ratepayers and the taxpayers, and will produce the goods at a price which the man in the street and the poor working man can afford to pay. I have some knowledge, as an unimportant town councillor and as one with some experience of the county council, of the devious ways of local government in a county and a town which have some sort of standing. I have no recollection of any case where the county council or the town council, which has the most public spirited men upon it, can compete with private enterprise and deliver the goods. Local authorities if they have made unwise land purchases must cut their losses and in the long run it will pay them as trustees of the ratepayers. They may sometimes have purchased land which is not always of the value which a private individual would have paid for it, and they would do better to cut their losses. I repeat I hope the House will remember that sympathy and common sense go together and that the Government stands for both.

5.14 p.m.

Mr. BANFIELD: We have listened to an interesting and amusing speech. The hon. Member for West Leyton (Sir W. Sugden) said how pleased he was that the Opposition benches are supporting the landowners. I want to draw the hon. Member's attention to the fact that the landowners in the present instance are the local authorities. We shall always have the greatest possible pleasure in supporting landowners who are local authorities, and in view of the hon. Member's speech, we hope to get his sympathy and support on the appropriate occasion. It has been said that by this Amendment we are appealing simply to the heart of the House and not to its reason. The hon. Member for West Leyton spoke about sympathy. This House has always expressed sympathy with housing. It is the best place in the world in which to get sympathy; you can get buckets of it for nothing. The argument that private enterprise could provide better and cheaper houses than the subsidised houses of the local authorities is absolutely amazing. Why has the subsidy been necessary all these years? Simply because private enterprise refused to touch the working-class house, seeing there was no profit in it. From what has been said, it might be thought there was something explosive about this Amendment, something in it akin to Bolshevism. But this is all the Amendment says:

"that substantial expenditure had been incurred in the acquisition of land for houses."

That is not unreasonable to insert in the Bill. The Minister takes his stand on the wording of the Clause, where it says that he may admit housing proposals if he is satisfied:

"that proposals for providing or promoting the provision of houses under those Acts had been prepared and were substantially ready to be submitted to him."

Under the Clause however, the Minister will be the sole judge of what is meant by "substantially ready." Local authorities who took a long-range view of housing, felt they were encouraged to embark on big housing schemes, and incurred considerable expenditure on the purchase of land, will feel that they have been let down and left with land which, perhaps, they can realise only at a loss. Contrary to the view of the Minister, I am certain that the effect of this Bill will be to discourage local authorities from embarking on further housing schemes. They will say, "We have no security for the money we are going to spend, and we may be left to bear substantial losses." If this Amendment were accepted, and it were possible for an authority which had already purchased land to go on with its housing plans, we might, I think set up a new standard of rents. While it is true that thousands of houses have been erected by local authorities, the fact remains that year by year, and even month by month, it becomes increasingly difficult for people to pay the rents which local authorities demand for those houses. In view of the ever-increasing reductions in the wages of people, has not the time come when the subsidy might be made to achieve some real purpose by being used in such a way as to enable the local authorities to let the houses at considerable lower rents than hitherto?

I am certain that the Minister is too optimistic in believing that either private enterprise or the schemes of the building societies will provide the necessary houses. I am a member of a building society. A building society has, first of all, to consider its liabilities towards its members, its promises made to them that their claims for houses shall come first, and I very much doubt whether it will be found that building societies are going to provide all this money about which we hear so much. I know that the Minister has declared against the Amendment, and I presume that the House will proceed, as usual, to put the rubber stamp on whatever the Minister says is the policy of the Government; but I want to make it clear that we stand by this Amendment. We believe the Amendment would be a considerable help, we believe that by its means we could keep faith in local authorities, and we believe, further, that if faith is not kept with them the electors in many industrial constituences where the local authorities have incurred considerable expense for land will be asking seriously why the interests of the ratepayers have not been better safeguarded.

5.22 p.m.

Mr. PIKE: The right hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Greenwood) let the political cat out of the bag in the course of his speech. The strongest point he made in connection with this Amendment turned out eventually to be the weakest point. He asked whether it was right and proper to expect a local authority which had purchased land at, say, £150 an acre in the days of dear prices, to have to part with that land at a loss when values had fallen to, say, £50 an acre. The fall in the market value of land was the main reason in his submission why local authorities should be covered by this Amendment. In view of the financial position of the country, it is rather premature of the party opposite to ask the Government to hold themselves responsible for financial failures in local administration during the past 10, 15 or 20 years. Further, I think it is very unjust that we should be asked to do something by which local authorities, irrespective of the conditions that may arise in the future, would be guaranteed against loss on any of their undertakings, whether in the immediate past or the immediate future. I could not help wondering whether this Amendment would have been moved if the market values of land had risen. In that case I think it would not have been thought to be necessary to bring it forward. I do not think a local authority should ask this House to become responsible for any mistakes made in the past over the price paid for land, whether for housing or for other purposes.

It is only an assumption on the part of hon. Members opposite that all the land purchased by local authorities in the days of high prices was intended for houses, though that provides a very good reason for putting forward this Amendment. In my humble opinion any land purchased in the days of high prices for the housing of the poor would by now be covered with houses and not be a site for future houses. The hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Price) said private enterprise could not possibly be expected to provide houses at rents which, with the rates, would suit the pockets of the poor. At any rate private enterprise has done it before, and I am convinced that if it were freed from the harness and strappings of Government interference it would do it again. If we continue to harness down the activities of private enterprise we cannot at the same time expect it to produce that solution of the housing problem which we want. I am satisfied that the Minister's reply adequately covered the situation, and fully justifies the House in voting against the Amendment if the Opposition force hon. Members to go into the Lobby.

5.26 p.m.

Mr. T. WILLIAMS: We shall most certainly force hon. Members into the Lobbies. The hon. Member for the Attercliffe Division (Mr. Pike) was occupied for a few weeks in telling the electors in the Rotherham Division all about the glories of private enterprise——

Mr. PIKE: The Rotherham electors would not allow us to tell them anything.

Mr. WILLIAMS: In any case, the hon. Member was in that division for two or three weeks, and I happen to know that he is quite capable of making himself heard in spite of any noise from the outskirts of the meeting. I can pay him the compliment that he knows how to deal with a crowd. He told the Rotherham electors all about the glories of the National Government and the achievements of private enterprise, but, all the same, they did not feel disposed to accept the hon. Member's logic, and returned the hon. Member who now represents that division. There is one thing I would like to say about the hon. Member for the Attercliffe Division and the wonderful achievements of private enterprise. The electors of the Attercliffe Division know what private enterprise has done for them in housing, and if a volcano were to destroy a good part of the houses in that division I think there would be few to shed a tear. If the electors of the Attercliffe Division, looking round upon the achievements of private enterprise in that division, accept the hon. Member's view about the efficiency of private enterprise, they will accept almost anything on earth. However, that is not the point.

The real point is that the right hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Greenwood) clearly showed that Government after Government have encouraged local authorities to purchase land and erect houses for the working class, and it is perfectly true to say that for a long period after the War private enterprise made no effort at all to meet the needs of the working-class population. Despite the apparent failure of the first Government housing scheme, we had another scheme, passed by a Conservative Government, in 1923, and yet a further scheme in 1924; and even in 1928, after three or four years of Conservative Government, the State still continued to pay approximately £9 per house for houses erected for the working class—a clear acknowledgement that private enterprise was either unwilling or unable to meet the needs of working people. If the hon. Member disagrees with the Chancellor of the Exchequer perhaps he will talk to him in private, and the Chancellor will tell him all about it. The fact of the matter is that even with the reduction of the subsidy by £1 10s. per annum, there is still the acknowledgment of the fact that private enterprise, over a certain part of the country, will not meet the known and urgent need for housing in those areas.

I reside, as does the hon. Gentleman, in a working-class area, perhaps not so thickly populated, with houses that are like rows of Grenadier Guards on parade, one after another. It is one of those districts that workmen live in because they have to work there. They certainly would not live there were they not obliged to do so because they work in those neighbourhoods. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Health will remember that I referred to the case of Mexborough Urban District Council. Quite recently that authority purchased land on which to build approximately 200 houses. They erected some of them, but they did not build them all in two or three months. They were building their houses in blocks over two or three years, and they were developing the site at a rate with which they thought the district could cope conveniently. The applicants were there, and the authority knew that the need existed. Even in that small area there is at the present time a demand for new houses from approximately 700 applicants. The authority were about to erect 134 more houses, on land purchased, with the consent and the approval of the Ministry, exclusively for houses. Unless the right hon. Gentleman stretches the application of the words embodied in Clause 1, it may conceivably be that this local authority will be denied the right to erect houses on land which was bought exclusively for that purpose quite recently.

The hon. Member for Attercliffe, or any hon. Member, may say that in the London area, where houses are erected in blocks of 1,000 or 5,000, private enterprise may intervene and fulfil the function of house building, but in purely working-class areas, where labour conditions are not equal, private enterprise simply will not meet the need. In the area of the local authority to which I have referred, a penny rate collects about £180. The authority cannot afford to have land standing idle. If they were to sell it—I am not concerned about any loss of money that might result from their selling it, if they could—private enterprise would not build on it. Private enterprise will not build hundreds of thousands of houses to let to working-class people. Consequently, unless something is done to make as elastic as possible the words embodied in Clause 1, such areas as the one I represent—I have mentioned Mexborough, but I believe that Greasborough is another case—will be denied the right to develop finally the plots of land which they purchased exclusively for the purpose of building working-class dwellings.

The right hon. Gentleman ought to tell us, before we proceed to a Division, whether in a case such as I have mentioned—where a local authority purchased land a couple of years ago and decided to build some 200 or 230 houses, and built 70 first and further batches of 70 later on, and is employing its building operatives continuously—under the terms of the Bill the proposals for the last batch of houses were not substantially ready when this Bill was introduced on 7th December? There is a very definite fear on the part of certain local authorities, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be good enough to tell us, where land has been purchased so recently and where the Ministry has had a definite intimation that houses were to be erected, that in no such case the local authority will be denied the right and privilege of building on such land, in order to meet the needs of the working-class population.

5.38 p.m.

Mr. HOLDSWORTH: I am rather at a loss to know why the Minister should be so definite in refusing this Amendment. As I read it, the Amendment is purely permissive in character, and does not say that the Minister shall continue these schemes, but that he may continue them. When the Minister was replying he made the point that if he accepted this Amendment it would mean an indefinite prolongation of the subsidy. I do not see that that can be, and I would ask him to reconsider his decision on that point. There is much to be said for the completion of schemes which are at the present time only partly developed; from many points of view it would be desirable that local authorities should complete their schemes. I cannot see that the acceptance of this Amendment would make any vital difference to the Amendment which the Minister conceded on the Committee stage. I cannot accept the contention of the Minister that this Amendment would indefinitely prolong the subsidy. If he thought that undue advantages were being taken, he would have the right within the Bill to refuse.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted in the Bill."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—Major George Davies and Commander Southby.

CLAUSE 2.—(Power of Minister to reimburse part of losses sustained under guarantees to building and other societies.)

5.45 p.m.

Sir P. HARRIS: I beg to move, in page 2, line 10, to leave out the word "intended," and to insert instead thereof the words:

"for which a satisfactory guarantee has been given that they are."

The object of this Amendment is to provide that, as soon as a builder has decided that houses which he is about to build are intended to be let to persons of the working classes, he shall show his good faith by giving a satisfactory guarantee to the building society, the local authority, and the State that the houses are so to be used. We know it is said that the way to Hell is paved with good intentions. I have no doubt that those builders who will go cap in hand to the local authorities and the building societies to get the necessary financial assistance will be inspired by good intentions, but, from what I know of the custom of the trade, the habit of private builders who build the cheaper kind of property is to turn over their money rapidly. Once the buildings are constructed, they sell them. It may be argued with some reason that, as long as the houses are built, it does not matter very much what becomes of them, but recent reports show that, as regards houses for sale, the supply is at present reasonable. As I understand it, the reason why the Minister is co-operating with the building societies is that the real problem is to get houses to let to the ordinary weekly wage earner who has comparatively low wages, and who cannot tackle the purchase of a house.

There is nothing in the Bill at present —I have read it very carefully, and it is very precise—to secure the future use of the houses when once they are constructed. They may be used for any purpose. They may be converted to commercial purposes, they may be sold, they may be let to any section of the community. I suppose the real guarantee, if I may use the word, that they will be let to the working classes is the character of the house—its size, quality and situation; but, in these hard times, when everyone is feeling economic pressure, middle-class people are rather inclined to go in for cheaper accommodation, and in the great cities, especially in London, rents of middle-class property are so high that they are often only too glad to take advantage of what hitherto has been regarded as working-class property. Under a local authority there is a check that the houses will be let at reasonable rents. Under the pressure of public opinion, the elected representatives see that the rents are reasonable and of a character that the ordinary working man can pay. The pressure is still so serious that many men are prepared to pay far more than their wages would justify their paying, or than they can reasonably afford. In the report, published the other day, on a regional survey made by a society of very good people in the Manchester district, I came across the following statement, made by a woman to the inspector:

"We had to take the flat or nothing. There was no choice. But the rent leaves very little to feed the family. Poor people can't manage it without sacrificing food and clothes."

The inspector went on to say:

"I know many poor people in this block who are going hungry to pay the rent."

That is in a case in which the local authority provides accommodation. Supply and demand being what they are, unless we can get some guarantee that the people who build these houses are going to carry out what their scheme suggests, and that the houses will really be let at reasonable rents that ordinary working-class people can pay, we may find that State money—and this is the whole point of my Amendment—can be used to give guarantees to speculative builders to build houses which they will let to the highest bidder, or, alternatively, will sell or dispose of to anyone who is ready to buy.

I attach considerable importance to this Amendment. It may be said that it is difficult to operate, but I am credibly informed that it is not uncommon, in disposing of property for commercial purposes, to get some guarantee of this kind. Anyone who knows anything about business premises knows that it is the general custom to secure that the shop shall be confined or limited to one particular kind or character of trade. Is it not reasonable to ask, when the State is going into partnership for the first time with the private builder, that there should be some guarantee that the houses should be confined, first to the working classes, and, secondly, to letting, and should not be available for sale. Here we are making a new departure. We are suggesting that the co-operation of local authorities is no longer wanted. The Parliamentary Secretary has waxed eloquent on private enterprise. The private builder, he says, without the competition of local authorities, will really now for the first time meet the demand. If words of this kind are introduced into the Bill, I think the public will, anyhow, feel some assurance that the purpose of the Bill will not be defeated, and that the great need for the provision of decent houses at reasonable rents for the working-class population of our great towns will be met.

5.53 p.m.

Mr. JANNER: I beg to second the Amendment.

In my view, and I think it will be the view of the House, this Amendment ought to be considered as striking at the very root of the Bill. The Bill itself is perfectly clear, in its Preamble anyhow, although it becomes rather muddled later on. The Preamble says quite definitely that the object of the Bill is to enable the Minister > "to make contributions in certain cases towards losses sustained by authorities under guarantees given by them for facilitating the provision of houses to be let to the working classes."

There is no question there of any intention; it is purely and simply a statement of the fact that the object is to grant facilities for the erection of houses which are definitely to be let to the working classes. In these circumstances, I would ask the Minister to consider whether he cannot accept this reasonable Amendment. It contains nothing that is contradictory to the intention of the Bill. It contains, however, something substantial, for it amends a word which really upsets what was the intention of the Bill, and I think it should be clear to those who are promoting the Bill that these words should be inserted. It is for the purpose of providing houses for the working classes that we are considering this Bill. We asked at one stage that provision should be made whereby the rent to be charged in respect of these houses should be controlled in some manner or another, or that it should come within the compass of the rents charged for houses which are to-day protected by the Rent Restriction Acts. We were told that that was not necessary, though to many of us it appeared to be very substantially necessary. If we cannot get a provision of that nature, at least we ought to be assured that the working classes will be given the opportunity of using these houses as tenants, and will not, as is bound to happen in many cases in the absence of such a provision, be compelled to purchase the houses.

As my hon. Friend has indicated, the builder is only human, and he may consider it advisable in his interests to sell the houses. Although his intentions at the commencement may have been perfectly honourable, and he may have been perfectly willing to build those houses for the purpose of letting, he may nevertheless find himself at a later stage desirous of selling the houses. His intention was a good one, but, unfortunately, he finds that it does not meet his desire at a later stage, and he proceeds to sell the houses, or to let them to someone who is not a member of the working classes. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent him from doing that as long as he can honourably say that, at the time when he erected the houses, he really intended that they should be let to the working classes.

Mr. HOPKINSON: The hon. Member keeps repeating the expression "working classes." Will he tell us who they are?

Mr. JANNER: I have not introduced the term "working classes" into this matter. It is in earlier Statutes, and it is in this particular Bill, which I presume will also become a Statute. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will tell us, when he replies, what exactly he means by the term "working classes"? My view is that it is generally understood what a member of the working classes is, and, if it is not understood, the poor fellow who is going to say that it was his intention to let his houses to the working classes is going to find himself in just as big a difficulty when he expresses his intention as he will be in at a later stage if he guarantees to let them to people who are members of the working classes.

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER (Sir Dennis Herbert): I must draw the attention of both hon. Members to the fact that the question of the definition of "working classes" hardly comes within this Amendment.

Mr. JANNER: I am afraid that my hon. Friend goaded me into saying a few words which I had not really intended to say. In these circumstances, I will proceed with the argument that I was going to put forward. We ask merely that this assurance should be given. The subsidy is going to be taken away. Many boroughs are very upset, with their intimate knowledge of the circumstances in their own districts, about this removal of an opportunity that was given for them to provide houses for the working classes. The working classes will continue to exist. No one is going to prevent that unless they find themselves in the unhappy state of being workless. They must be provided with accommodation. The object of the Bill is to provide them with that accommodation and there can be no reason at all why, in view of the Preamble to the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman should not accept an Amendment which merely carries into effect what he has indicated there as his intention.

Sir H. YOUNG: The hon. Member said, no doubt in a moment of inadvertence, that the Amendment struck at the very root of the Bill. I am sure he did not mean it, but I am his most grateful debtor, because undoubtedly it strikes at the root of a part of the Bill. I cannot imagine an Amendment which could have been more ingeniously framed to deprive the second Clause of any potential value whatever. If we desire to encourage the investment of capital and the devotion of enterprise and initiative to the supply of small houses to let to the working classes, which we all desire to see, we shall not promote that end by putting unnecessary obstacles in the way of their employment. It is a very great obstacle to the investment of private capital and the devotion of enterprise to this object if you impose upon the ownership of the security, which is the result of that investment, new and strange restrictions which have been entirely unknown to the law hitherto, and which one would hope would be unknown to the law in the future. I ask those who are acquainted with business conditions to imagine what the emotions of any builder or investor would be if asked to produce houses subject to these restrictions. My first contention is that it would completely divert the stream of investment from this object or, if it did not, it would inevitably diminish the value of the security. By diminishing the value of the asset you would increase the return which the investor would expect from it. In other words, it would have a direct tendency to put up rents, and what we all want is to keep down rents.

But there is another and an even more conclusive argument against the Amendment. There are two safeguards against abuses of the sort to which the Proposer and Seconder have referred. The first is that under the Act the local authority is not to propose, and the Minister is not to accept, proposals for guarantees unless the houses are intended to be let to persons of the working class. It is at that time that the local authority and the Minister will consider all the circumstances of the case, and will only accept proposals for guarantees if they are of the sort that are reasonably and practically likely to fulfil the purposes which the Act has in mind. That is a practical guarantee, whatever lawyers may say. There is an even more important consideration. The whole danger that is feared by the two hon. Members is entirely illusory. The state of affairs that they fear cannot arise. They wish to guard against the use of the guarantee for houses that are not let but are in the possession of the owner-occupier. It is practically impossible for that state of affairs to arise. If the builder, or the investor who has bought the house, sells it to an owner-occupier, he will pay off the mortgage. If he pays off the mortgage, the guarantee ceases and there is no more public liability upon the house. A sale cannot take place without the repayment of the guarantee unless the builder or the investor is willing to be left with a personal agreement making him liable for the mortgage without any security and, if he did that, he would be a born fool. The state of affairs which will arise will be that, whenever a house ceases in practice to be a house let, and becomes a house in the possession of the owner-occupier, the mortgage and the guarantee will lapse, so what harm is done? The house has been provided for an owner-occupier and State, local authority and building society finance are set free to provide a fresh house. Is not that precisely what we all require to be done?

6.8 p.m.

Mr. GREENWOOD: The word "intended" is obviously open to criticism. Intended by whom? Intended by the builder of the house? Intended by the Minister? Intended only so far as the guarantee applies to the first builder of the house? The right hon. Gentleman speaks of a house being sold to an owner-occupier, but it may not be sold to an owner-occupier. It may be sold to another landlord who will let it, and all control is then gone. The amount of public control that we are getting for the subsidy is virtually negligible. Indeed it has been admitted now that, if the builder pays off the mortgage, the guarantee ceases and there is no public liability. One of the difficulties under which we are suffering to-day is that there are 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 houses where there has been no public liability at all. All that we are doing by this Clause is to revert to unrestricted private enterprise. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that, if the Amendment were accepted, it would destroy the second Clause. For that reason alone I am prepared to vote for it. I should be delighted if the second Clause were destroyed. Notice the argument that the right hon. Gentleman uses. "We are putting unnecessary obstacles in the way of those who wish to invest capital." We are not. The right hon. Gentleman is doing that. He is, by withdrawing all kinds of corporate assistance which have been given since 1919, discouraging the local authorities who, with assistance, could provide the necessary capital for carrying on the housing schemes that are necessary. He regards the Amendment as a great obstacle because he wants to get back at the earliest possible moment to free contract, of which he is the greatest exponent in the House.

He said that new and strange restrictions unknown to the law would be imposed. The State in times of emergency has imposed restrictions far greater than those asked for by the Amendment. It is essential that the houses that are to be built with the backing of the State shall be let to the working classes. That is not asking for new powers. It is not asking for the powers that the new President of the United States is going to ask for in order to deal with an emergency, and this is as grave if not as large an emergency. It seems to me, therefore, no argument, that the right hon. Gentleman should say that this simple Amendment imposes new and strange restrictions. The argument has been used many times by the right hon. Gentleman and by many Members on both sides that the houses that have been built and let have been let to people who are not members of the working classes. As a matter of fact, they have passed into the hands of the lower middle classes and professional people. There is a great deal of truth in that and, as I understand it, the hon. Baronet would like to provide that under the guarantee houses shall be let only to persons of the working classes. There is no reason to believe that the houses built under the guarantee will be let to any different class of persons from those to whom Chamberlain and Wheatley houses have been let in the past, unless the right hon. Gentleman takes certain steps to ensure that that is so.

Under this Clause, with the power that the guarantee gives him, it would have been possible for the right hon. Gentleman, had he so chosen, to make the wording so definite that houses would have been let to members of the working class by imposing some limitation of rent. The right hon. Gentleman asks what harm has been done in Clause 2. I am sorry that I cannot tell him yet but if he lives long enough to hear it, I shall be able to tell him, say, two years from now. What we know is that the effect of Clause 2 as it stands without this Amendment will be that there can be no certainty, first that any houses are going to be built at all and, if they are built, that they might not pass outside the occupancy of members of the working classes. I should hope—though I am afraid it will not be so—that the House on this occasion will be prepared to support the Amendment—not a very large but a reasonable one in view of the circumstances.

Question put, "That the word 'intended' stand part of the Bill."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—
Mr. Janner and Mr. Groves.

6.23 p.m.

Sir P. HARRIS: I beg to move, in page 2, line 35, at the end, to insert the words:

> "Except where otherwise approved by the Minister on the recommendation of the local authority, every house to which this section applies shall be provided with a fixed bath."

This is a very modest proposal. It has already appealed to one of the Ministers, and I hope that it will appeal equally to the Minister of Health and that he will justify his title as Minister of Health by accepting it. I frankly tell the House that I have taken the words of the Amendment out of the 1923 Act in which they were inserted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as the minimum of what was required as the national standard of a civilised home. It is desired that this symbol of civilisation should be secured to every future house constructed either by private enterprise or by local authorities. I say advisedly, "either by private enterprise or by local authorities" because local authorities, under the Act of 1925, were automatically required to put in a fixed bath unless the Minister said to the contrary. Of course, where, owing to insufficient water supply in the neighbourhood of, say, a rural district, it was not practicable, the Minister could exempt a house from this requirement. But in the ordinary way, every house under this scheme automatically will be required to have a bath.

I suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should accept the Amendment. I observe that he has left the Parliamentary Secretary in charge. The Act of 1923 was always known as the Chamberlain Act. Let this be known as the "Shakespeare bath," and he will go down for all time as the Minister who established, by Act of Parliament, the symbol of civilisation that a fixed bath should be provided in every working-class house. The Amendment cannot hurt the Bill. It will leave the right hon. Gentleman with power to exempt in necessary cases, and will do much to mollify some of the opposition to the Bill, which some people think is a reactionary Measure. At any rate, it will show that it is the object of the Government to set a good standard of what working-class accommodation should be.

6.27 p.m.

Mr. JANNER: I beg to second the Amendment.

I noticed the expression on the face of the Parliamentary Secretary when my hon. Friend was urging him to accept the Amendment, and I am induced by that fact to believe that he really desires to have the Amendment inserted. Whether the desire will be sufficiently strong to permit him to accept it, with possible pressure from without, I do not know, but I am sure that the House will consider that it is a very reasonable Amendment. We know the miserable conditions under which people have to live in some of the existing houses, and how those conditions are aggravated by the fact that there is not a fixed bath. There is no need for an hon. Member of this House to elaborate those difficulties, because any hon. Member who has taken the trouble to walk into some of the houses and has seen the conditions will know very well that a fixed bath is a desirable asset in a house for the accommodation of members of the working class.

I hope that this will not be regarded in any way in the nature of a frivolous Amendment. On the contrary, the real use to which a bath can and should be put in working-class houses should commend itself to the Minister, and he should realise that the difficulties which have existed hitherto in houses where a fixed bath is not provided are sufficiently serious to allow him to insert the Amendment in the Bill. Hon. Members who have had the fortune or misfortune to visit houses in mining districts will know how essential the proposed proviso is for the benefit of the people who have to work underground. It is equally important for all other members of the working class. In those circumstances, I do not think that any further weight of argument is needed to convince, if not the Minister or the Parliamentary Secretary, the Members present that they ought to vote for an Amendment of this description.

6.30 p.m.

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of HEALTH (Mr. Shakespeare): I can assure the hon. Member for Whitechapel (Mr. Janner) that no one could consider this Amendment frivolous. If we do not accept it, it is not because it is frivolous, but because we think it is absolutely unnecessary. I cannot help feeling that the hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) moved the Amendment with by-election eyes. He wants to be able to say: "I am the man who gave you a bath." I should like to associate my name with a new bath in every house, but I am mindful of the fact that a poet of my name might have said that "a bath in any other room would smell as sweet." The acceptance of this Amendment will make absolutely no difference to the provision of a bath. The point is, ought the matter to be left to the discretion of the Minister or should there be an express provision in the Bill? We say that it is far better to leave it to the discretion of the Minister.

I feel as strongly as the hon. Baronet, or as the hon. Member for Whitechapel, or as any other hon. Member that the provision of a bath in a working-class house is absolutely essential. Imagine what would happen in an urban area if a builder who was building several hundred houses went to the local authority for a guarantee and said: "I am building these houses, but there are no baths." Would the local authority give the guarantee? Of course, they would not. Would the building society give its guarantee? Of course, it would not. In regard to an urban area in my constituency or in any other constituency would the Minister give his guarantee in respect of houses where there was no bath? No. I suggest that this is one of those showy Amendments of which the Noble Lord the Member for Hastings (Lord E. Percy) spoke, which make no difference to the actual situation. Why should you pick out a bath? Why should you not insist on an Amendment saying that artificial light should be provided? Why not say that every house must have a sink?

Sir P. HARRIS: That is provided for already in the Act of 1923.

Mr. KIRKWOOD: They would have intelligence to put in a sink but might not have intelligence enough to put in a bath.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: The hon. Member for Dumbarton Burghs (Mr. Kirkwood) has put his finger on the point as he often does. It is no more necessary to put down an Amendment that every house should have a bath than to put down an Amendment that every house should have a sink. Baths are essential under modern conditions. If houses from the point of view of a future tenant in an ordinary urban area were provided without baths——

Mr. LANSBURY: They are doing it now.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: The object is to provide houses which will attract tenants.

Mr. LANSBURY: They are building houses now without baths.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE: I should be glad to know where they are doing it, except in a very rare case of a rural area where there is no water supply, and where if ou had a bath you would have nothing o put in it except coal. You can do two things under this Bill. You can ither assume that common sense will prevail, or you can take the opposite iew and tie it up with barbed wire or ed tape and insist that everything hould be put down in the Bill, such as he provision of sinks, baths, electric ight, and so on. If you say that there must be a bath, a fixed bath, then I have no doubt that if we accepted that Amendment we might have another Amendment hat there must be a fixed soap dish, and that not more than three people must use the bath at the same time. We ay that one condition is essential, and hat is that these houses shall be intended to be let to members of the working class. That is the only condition on which we insist. Any other restriction which is a matter of common sense is unnecessary. In point of fact a local authority, a building society, or the Minister in giving a guarantee will see so it that modern houses are up to the ordinary decent amenities of life. For these reasons, not because the Amendment is frivolous but because it is unnecessary, the Government ask the House not to accept it.

6.38 p.m.

Mr. CHARLES BROWN: I am astonished at the speech to which we have just listened, because at an earlier stage we brought forward an Amendment to secure, in general terms, the amenities of these houses which will be erected under the Bill, and the Parliamentary Secretary said that that Amendment was unnecessary, just as he has told us in more specific and definite terms that the present Amendment is unnecessary. He treated both Amendments in exactly the same way, on the assumption that all the houses that are going to be built under this Bill will necessarily have in them all the amenities which one has come to regard as necessary for the working classes in 20th century civilisation. We can find nothing in the Bill guaranteeing that set of conditions when these houses are erected. The Parliamentary Secretary told us that it is only in rural areas where there is no water supply that houses are erected nowadays without a fixed bath. I am afraid that he is wrong. He ought to make more exhaustive inquiries. I know of an urban district in my own area where only a month ago plans were passed for houses in which there were to be no fixed baths. That was an urban district in the county of Nottingham.

If the Parliamentary Secretary does make inquiries he will find that in more places than one plans are submitted to the local authorities in which there is no provision for any fixed bath, and as the local by-laws probably make no provision to the contrary such houses are being built. We say most emphatically that where you are giving a State guarantee to the speculative builder who is to put up houses which the working classes are to inhabit, we have a right to say that that builder shall include a fixed bath, which is one of the most essential features of a house for the working class. The Parliamentary Secretary agrees with me on that matter. We want to be sure that when these houses are put up they will have baths in them. Nothing that the Parliamentary Secretary has said proves clearly to me that that will be the case. I hope the House will have no hesitation in supporting the Amendment.

6.40 p.m.

Mr. HOLDSWORTH: After listening to the Parliamentary Secretary hon. Members must feel convinced that there is something more in the opposition to the Amendment than the statement that it is not necessary to put these words in the Bill. If it is essential that every house should have a fixed bath, what harm could be done to the Bill by accepting the Amendment? I cannot understand the refusal. I know that there is a desire on the part of some directors of building societies—here I am speaking with absolute knowledge—that they should not have these words in the Bill, so that they will be able to leave out the provision of a bath. There can be no question about that. The Parliamentary Secretary said that it was unnecessary to put in these words, and in the next breath he asked the House to give discretion to the Minister. Why should the Minister want discretion as to the necessity of a bath being provided? If the Parliamentary Secretary is consistent in his argument that a bath is necessary, I ask him to agree to put these words in the Bill. Then we shall be certain that a bath will be provided. It is not a mere question of the Minister carrying out the Act. Certain conditions will have to be fulfilled before permission is given for the building of the houses. The present Minister of Health and the present Parliamentary Secretary will not occupy those position for ever. It may be Socialist Ministers who will occupy them. If this is a Bill under which houses are to be built, let us make certain that whoever occupies the Government Bench a fixed bath will be provided in the houses.

6.42 p.m.

Mr. HICKS: I associate myself with the Amendment, and I am astonished, as are other hon. Members, at the reply of the Parliamentary Secretary that the Amendment is not necessary. The experience that we have of working-class houses in this country is that 75 per cent. have not a bath. I am speaking of the way that private enterprise has catered for the working classes so far as baths are concerned. Now that we are getting back to relatively unrestricted private enterprise, where sometimes they will not have to get the sanction of the Ministry of Health as to building, the question of the provision of a fixed bath may not always come before the Minister for sanction. I have lived in houses with no bath accommodation. I heard the Parliamentary Secretary the other day refer to the fact that there were some parts of the country where water was not sufficient to fill a bath. In a climate like ours there are surely two or three chances a year of filling a bath. To use such an argument that there should not be a fixed bath under such conditions is preposterous. It should be the duty of the Minister of Health to arrange to convey water if it is not available, rather than the Parliamentary Secretary should say that people should not have a bath under those conditions.

Some hon. Members have referred to mining villages, where there has been no bath accommodation. I have been in those houses. I have seen the men come from their work. I have seen a man sitting in the tub while the woman has been preparing the food and the children have been playing about in the kitchen. I have seen them all in one room, with the man in the tub, and when he has got out of the tub other members of the family have had to sit in the tub. If we pass this Amendment, we want to propose that not only should there be a fixed bath, but that there should be a bathroom. If in the Act of 1923 it was provided that there should be a bath, why in 1933 should there not be a bathroom? is it not decent where you have different members of the family, boys and girls, that there should be adequate opportunity for the members of the family to be able to have a bath without being in sight of each other? To resist such an Amendment as this indicates that there is an attitude of mind towards housing betterment that is not well for the working classes.

Reference has been made to the possibility that the present Minister of Health will not always be in that position. If this is the attitude of mind of the right hon. Gentleman towards this problem, I hope he will not be in his office very long. I suggest that we cannot allow a matter of this kind to go. We want to make quite sure that any house which receives any sort of subsidy or support from public money shall have a bath. We also want to have a fixed bath, and we also think that every house should be provided with a bathroom.

Sir F. FREMANTLE: I must confess that I am still unconvinced by the arguments put forward by the Parliamentary Secretary. I am voicing the opinion of the whole body of medical officers of health throughout the country in saying that every house should have a bath. During the last 30 years the standard of housing has changed, and while it may be possible to reduce some of the standards to which we have grown accustomed since the War without doing any harm, a bath, and that means a fixed bath, is absolutely essential so far as public health is concerned. There is not a person connected with public health administration anywhere, official or unofficial, who does not agree that for the rising generation it is absolutely necessary that every house should have a bath. I do not say that it should necessarily be a fixed bath. I have filled my own tub with cold water and got into it, and enjoyed it. I think everyone should be able to get into a bath of cold water and soak. Some of us have grown up without a bathroom and have had to put the bath in the cellar and in various other places, in the kitchen, or the scullery.

The essential thing is that a bath should be provided. It is all very well for officialdom to say that they will be provided. I have had a long experience of local authorities, I do not speak in the main of big municipal undertakings, but of the smaller councils, those who are not in the public eye, and it sometimes happens that things do slip through in certain circumstances, and I am afraid that unless it is clearly indicated that a bath must be provided this might slip through. Such a matter should not be left to local authorities. I have some experience as to their indulgence. I am speaking now of the smaller urban authorities, where there is not the same hold over the private builder as there is in the case of the large municipalities. I think the provision of a fixed bath—I do not go so far as to say bathroom—is necessary, and I hope the Government will reconsider their attitude.

6.50 p.m.

Mr. EDWARD WILLIAMS: We welcome the support of the hon. Member for St. Albans (Sir F. Fremantle), and we hope that the Minister of Health will be impressed by his remarks. It is obvious that the inability of the Parliamentary Secretary to accept the Amendment indicates the standard of houses in which the working classes are to live. I disagree with some of the remarks of the hon. Member for St. Albans, but I do not desire to enter into an argument with him, except to say that he has not lived in houses of the kind which miners are obliged to occupy. One of the most disgraceful things in this country is the fact that 99 out of every 100 miners employed to-day are obliged to wash before the fire in the family kitchen. For more than 12 years I was obliged as a working miner to do that with the whole of my family in the kitchen, mother, father, and the other children. For more than 35 years my father was obliged to do the same. It is a standing disgrace, and if we have any ethical regard for our people it is something which we should not countenance for any length of time.

The Parliamentary Secretary has certainly shown enormous faith in private enterprise. He fails to appreciate the fact that there are jerry builders to-day; that there are people who will economise at the expense of the absolute necessities and amenities of the people, and I trust that having had an expression of opinion from his own side and from Liberal Members, as well as ourselves, he will realise the necessity of including the Amendment in the Bill. We consider the proposal absolutely essential not only for ethical purposes but for sanitary purposes also. I heard the reference of the Parliamentary Secretary to places where clean water does not exist. That, I say, is a standing reflection on the Ministry of Health, and ought to be remedied at once. There should be not only a bath but a bathroom as well. A large number of mothers, particularly in mining districts, are suffering from scalds from water which they had to lift on to the hob to boil in time for their husband's and sons to wash on their return from the mine. That is also something which calls for immediate attention. In South Wales a large number of our women-folk and their children have been scalded and are suffering from permanent injuries, because baths have not been installed in their homes. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will reflect and indicate to us that he is prepared to accept the Amendment.

6.54 p.m.

Mr. PIKE: I hope that the Amendment will be accepted. The hon. Member for South-West Bethnal Green (Sir P. Harris) said that he had extracted the wording of the Amendment from the 1923 Act. If it was in the 1923 Act, I see no reason why it should not be in the present Bill. It is not satisfactory to say that local authorities and the Minister of Health, or building societies, who are to be responsible for the financing of these schemes, would not accept a scheme unless there was provision for baths. I come from a working-class dwelling and I know that they have suffered considerably from a lack of bath accommodation. In view of the doubt as to whether baths will be provided under the Bill as it stands, I hope the Minister will accept the Amendment. I think the statement of the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. E. Williams) that 99 per cent. of the miners of this country lack facilities for baths should be corrected. I agree that in a large number of miners' houses there is no such accommodation, but in the vast majority of pits there are pithead baths provided.

Mr. E. WILLIAMS: The hon. Member cannot have seen the returns from the Central Welfare Association as to the number of pithead baths that have been provided.

Mr. PIKE: If I said the majority, I withdraw that expression, but to a large degree these facilities do exist, and, in addition, on the large housing schemes which have been carried out in colliery districts during the past 10 years provision has been made for baths. I use this fact also as another reason why the Amendment should be accepted by the Government. A bath to-day is not only one of the necessary amenities of life; it is also a fact that a bath in a working-class dwelling gives an entirely new outlook not only for the parents but for the children as well. It gives them a new outlook on education. If a bath is installed and children are clean, they look upon life and the things of life in a much cleaner spirit than they would do when they lack these facilities. In view of the fact that the Amendment will not embarrass the Government, or prevent housing schemes being carried out according to the desires of the Minister of Health, and, further, that it will not prevent private enterprise providing the people of this country with a sufficient number of new houses at an economic price, I hope the Government will accept the proposal.

6.57 p.m.

Mr. SLATER: I should like to support the Amendment, and I hope that it will be pressed upon the Minister. I do not propose to repeat the arguments that have been already used, but to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to something which I think he should really understand. The proposal in the Bill is in my view a retrograde step, and will bring about a good deal of regret among one very live industry in this country. I refer to the sanitary industry. Professor Clay, dealing with unemployment, has pointed out clearly that one of our greatest tasks to-day is to create new industries, and to extend them, and he particularly mentioned the sanitary engineering industry in this country. Is it right for the Minister of Health to give a licence to any locality, or to any builder, to omit this absolute necessity in the homes of working classes? I say that the right hon. Gentleman is going to create a great deal of trouble for himself hereafter from an employment point of view. We are fighting for our position in the world's markets, where we used to have a primary position in the supply of sanitary wares. I make no excuse for saying this. I am in that business myself, and I say that His Majesty's Government ought to encourage this industry above everything else. We cannot encourage it on middle-class incomes or wealthy incomes, but we can encourage it, and make manufacturing possible, if it is based on a demand for bathrooms in working-class homes. That is how we shall get our power, not only to make sanitary wares cheaply in this country, but to meet competition abroad. It is because I realise the importance of employment in this country, and because I subscribe to everything said on both sides of the House, that I feel that the Minister of Health should accept this Amendment.

7 p.m.

Sir H. YOUNG: We have had expressions of opinion from three sides of the House, and the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Slater), looking at it from a new point of view, has given prominence to the subject of employment. I am not sure I could quite follow the argument of the hon. Member for St. Albans (Sir F. Fremantle), who gave us such interesting reminiscences. At first I thought he was prepared to have houses without baths, but his second thoughts were in favour of the acceptance of the Amendment. In view of the course which the Debate has taken, the Government will accept the Amendment. I confess that, as I listened to the argument of the Parliamentary Secretary, I thought that in common sense and prudence it was entitled to prevail. His argument was that it was the accepted standard in decent house building that there should be a bath. He spoke of what we know and what is going to be done. With this, I may say, the Parliamentary Secretary entirely agrees. It was stated by me, on the Second Reading, that one of the principles of this new housing era was to be that the standard of national housing was not to be relaxed with the assent of the Government.

If, in the opinion of the House, it is necessary in order to secure the particular results to which the Parliamentary Secretary referred, to have a statutory provision with relation to baths, let us have it. It must be subject to the discretion of the Minister to remit the requirement in proper cases. The hon. Member who spoke last, referred to those cases, mentioned by the Parliamentary Secretary, in which a bath is not possible. These cases do exist. I propose to accept the Amendment, subject to any necessary revision of the wording in another place.

7.4 p.m.

Mr. GREENWOOD: I beg to move, as an Amendment to the proposed Amendment, at the end, to add the words "in a bathroom."

I believe this is the first occasion on which we have had an Amendment of importance accepted. I am sure hon. Members of the House will welcome it. I should like the Minister to go a little further, because the Amendment permits a discretion which I do not wish to see. I do not agree that, because there is no fixed water supply, there should be no fixed bath. I think that a fixed bath in a bath room should be provided. In 1924 we fought this out in the House. It has been accepted and operated for nine years. If private enterprise is to do this job properly, then it ought to provide a fixed bath in a bath-room. Seeing that the right hon. Gentleman has some doubts himself about this, and has agreed to accept the Amendment, I hope he will also accept what is now the law of the land and agree to these words being added.

7.5 p.m.

Sir H. YOUNG: The answer to the right hon. Gentleman's question is in the negative. I will approach the bath with him, but I will not enter the bathroom. I think we have done all that is practicable and sensible in accepting the Amendment. In going further we should go too far, and have too great a degree of elaboration.

Question put, "That those words be there added to the proposed Amendment."

TELLERS FOR THE NOES.—Sir George Penny and Mr. Womersley.

Proposed words there inserted in the Bill.

7.16 p.m.

Sir H. YOUNG: I beg to move, "That the Bill be now read the Third time."

The Committee stage of the Bill has not lasted a long time, for the obvious reason that the provisions of the Bill are short and succinct. The purpose of the Bill has clearly emerged in our discussion. The purpose is the adaptation of our housing policy to the changing needs of the time. It is an adaptation to what we all agree and know are the two chief housing needs of the nation, a better and fuller supply of small houses for the working classes, and a swifter and more efficient remedy for the deep-seated evil of the slums. The policy of the Bill on that first matter has been clearly explained and clearly understood by the House. It is that we should take advantage of the changes in the times to restore to their normal activity those normal forces which alone throughout history have been adequate to provide humanity with its chief wants.

As to this matter of the provision of a sufficient number of small houses to be let to the working classes, if we look back at the recent history of housing we shall see without doubt that the system of subsidies has been substantially a failure. It has great successes in other directions to its credit. It has provided many fine housing estates; it has established new standards of housing. But for this urgent, this basic need for the supply of small houses to be let, the system of subsidy has failed. Now, after 14 years of operation, we still lack that essential supply. No doubt during the period during which subsidies have been in operation, we have, until recently, necessarily had a second best. Building costs have been such that it has been impossible to provide the supply of the smaller houses that we needed without subsidy, and so we have had to struggle and stagger along with the second best of the subsidy system imposed upon us by the height of building costs.

But surely it stands to reason that an alert nation and Government should be on the watch to take the very first opportunity that occurs of passing on from that unsatisfactory second best to a more effective system. That is what this Bill proposes to do. We seize the opportunity of the fall in building costs and the great fall in the price of capital for investment to look forward to a more fertile and more productive epoch in housing, one in which those larger forces to supply our wants may be brought into play—forces which have been so long checked by the insuperable obstacle of the competition of subsidised houses. We clear a great obstacle from the path of supply, the obstacle of subsidised competition. We bring into play all those forces which, when they are allowed free play, make for the further reduction of costs. With these forces to help us we look forward with an optimism that I believe not to be unjustified, to a more fortunate and more successful epoch in the provision of this need.

We have a second line behind the line of private enterprise. We release the forces of private capital and enterprise and initiative for our assistance by the abolition of subsidised competition. Behind that we still have a second line. We have the line of the local authorities, and their liability and duty still to attend to the housing needs of their localities. That remains in a manner that it is possible to encourage more freely in the future than in the past. We have established, in the course of these Debates, particularly on Second Reading, that it is within the possibility of local authorities, with building costs and the price of money at their present level, to provide houses at rents which are already within a few pence—3d., 4d. or 5d.—of the normal rent which was fixed as the ideal for the 1924 subsidies. We therefore can rely upon this force as our second line of defence.

A rumour spread that it was the intention of the Government and of the Ministry of Health deliberately to discourage the putting forward of schemes by local authorities for building without subsidy. In that there is not a word of truth. On the contrary we shall rely upon them as a second line of defence. Then there is the second Clause of the Bill, the building society scheme. As the House will remember, this has never been put forward by the Government as an essential part of its housing plan. It has been put forward as a valuable aid in the promotion of that free play of the forces of private enterprise which is in itself an essential part of the plan. It is a little practical step which may have great results. It is little because the guarantee and the State liability are small. The potential results are great because there can be no finer service that we can do for housing than to secure the services of the millions available in the hands of the building societies and to secure them at the rate at which the building societies have declared their willingness to lend them. I believe it to be an absolutely incontrovertible proposition that it would be impossible from any other source at the present time to obtain so free a supply of capital at such a low rate of interest. Further, this supply of capital which we have obtained is available in the hands of those who know how to use it, who are acquainted with the building trade and know the housing need of the people.

Some doubt has been cast, in the course of our discussions, upon the willingness of the building societies to discharge their part under the plan put forward in Clause 2. There is no doubt at all of that. It is a plan put forward voluntarily by the building societies. It was their own suggestion. It was framed quite frankly by them to meet their own particular needs, which they believe are in accordance with the needs of the country. As a matter of fact it has been said by one speaker in the Debates that there are only three societies willing to fulfil the scheme. That is not so. I have been in touch with nine societies who are prepared to operate the scheme, and those nine societies have capital assets of the value of £150,000,000. The House will see therefore that we have enlisted powerful forces.

Let me refer to the review of the new conditions which is about to be undertaken by the committee appointed to-day. The committee is to review whether it is possible to make use of the services of public utility societies. It is to review the ideas which are in the air about a housing corporation on a large scale. It will review whether additional powers should be granted in that direction, subject to this condition: There is no question of replacing the direct subsidies which we to-day terminate, by any indirect subsidy. That would indeed be to have the worst of both worlds, to drive subsidies out of the door and let them come back by the window. Indirect subsidies would have an even more powerful effect than direct in discouraging private enterprise and there would be also a large loss of a weapon for the encouragement of municipal enterprise.

Let me turn from that aspect to the attendant aspects which have occupied much attention in the House. When I introduced this Bill I said that the occasion of this Bill was the occasion of a declaration of war by this House and by the nation against the slums. To-night I will give some further and more particular account of the plan of campaign by which that war is to be carried on. Since those expressions of mine upon Second Reading we have seen a remarkable demonstration of public opinion upon this subject all over the country, an expression of public opinion so strong, so warm, as to leave no doubt at all in the minds of any what the resolution of the country is. The Press has declared war on the slums in a determined and effective way. There is a clear demand for action. What action is proposed?

It is no wonder that there should be a demand for action if we think of the history of the matter. It is 60 years since the first provision was made by Statute for slum clearance, and in all that 60 years the average annual rate of persons affected by the demolition of slums has been less than 3,000. It is 14 years since a subsidy was first devoted to the purpose of slum clearance, and in all those 14 years the number of houses affected by demolitions has been no more than 15,000, a few more than 1,000 a year. There has been no progress adequate to the evil. One is justified in saying that subsidies so far have succeeded only in scratching the surface of the evil of the slums.

The programme which I have now to announce has for its basis that there shall be no more delay, that we will stand no more trifling with this problem of the slums. The action that is proposed is as follows: I propose forthwith as Minister of Health to call upon every local authority that is a housing authority to prepare a survey of its area from the point of view of slums. I do not want to go too much into detail, but there are some circumstances as regards the survey and its consequences which I will mention to the House. I propose to call on every local authority that is a housing authority to follow up that fresh survey with a programme for the abolition of the slums which are revealed by the survey. As I say, I have no wish to go into details on this occasion, but I may give two particulars as regards these programmes. It will be suggested that in these programmes the areas shall be defined which can be dealt with by reconditioning and that as distinct from these, the area shall also be defined which can only be dealt with by the more radical remedy of clearance. We know that the worst of the evil can only be dealt with by clearance and not by re-conditioning. We propose that the programmes which are to be prepared following the survey shall establish those two categories, namely, areas for clearance and areas for re-conditioning.

Now we come to the essential. It will be suggested and required that the programme shall state the period within which each of these areas will be dealt with, that is the programmes shall definitely provide a date for the clearing of the clearance areas and the date at which re-conditioning shall be undertaken. It may be that the programme will also provide that where in a re-conditioning area the effects of re-conditioning are exhausted that area should become a clearance area.

Mr. LANSBURY: On a point of Order. The question often arises during a Debate of this character as to what is in order and what is not. The Minister is now making a statement of public policy which appears to me to be outside the scope of the Bill. I wish to know whether we should be allowed in the further stages of this Third Reading Debate to discuss the right hon. Gentleman's proposals?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood that the Minister was stating certain things which he proposed to do under the Bill. Of course, anything outside the scope of the Bill would be out of order. Perhaps the Minister will confirm me on the point that the matters with which he is dealing are not outside the Bill.

Lieut.-Colonel Sir JOSEPH NALL: Is it not the case that the clearances to which the Minister has referred can not be proceeded with unless the provisions of this Bill are proceeded with at the same time, and therefore the two matters are related.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the Minister of Health will confirm me on that point, namely, that what he now proposes comes under the provisions of the Bill.

Sir H. YOUNG: It is the case, Mr. Speaker, that the action to which I am now referring would only be possible if this Bill were passed and is a necessary consequence of the Bill. As the House will remember, it has been necessary at different stages of the Bill to link up these matters and to have regard both to the question of the subsidy and also to the question of what is proposed as regards dealing with existing conditions.

Mr. SPEAKER: In that case the Minister's remarks seem to be in order.

Mr. LANSBURY: I am satisfied so long as I know that we shall be entitled to discuss these matters, but we very often have a position of some doubt arising on a point of this kind. It may be that there will be someone in the Chair who has not heard the previous discussion, and the question may arise subsequently of whether we are in order or not.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a position that I am just as anxious to avoid as the right hon. Gentleman. It is for him, as it is for others, not to enter upon the discussion of matters which are not in order, but if hon. Members confine themselves to the discussion of actions which can only be taken if this Bill becomes an Act of Parliament, then that seems obviously to be quite in order.

Major MILNER: I submit that the Minister's statement is not in order. He is dealing with something which has never been mentioned before in these discussions. He states that he proposes, not as a consequence of the Bill but as an administrative decision, to call on local authorities to make surveys and draw up programmes about slum clearance. The Bill has no relation to slum clearance except indirectly in that the Minister has sought to justify doing away with the subsidy on one hand, by saying that, on the other hand, he proposes to urge certain action in regard to slum clearance. It is only in that sense that these matters are in any way related, and I submit that a new statement of policy at this stage of the proceedings is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understood the Minister's statement he was describing what he would be able to do under the Bill if it became an Act of Parliament.

Mr. GREENWOOD: There is not a single word in the Bill which alters any of the provisions of the 1930 Act with regard to slums and indeed part of my case against the Third Reading of the Bill is that the right hon. Gentleman has been misleading the public by mixing these two things. It is very difficult for us if the Minister is to make new pronouncements of policy at this stage on matters which are irrelevant to the Bill before us.

Sir J. NALL: May I submit that we are now being asked to give a Third Reading to the Bill which proposes a great change in policy relating to the provision of houses. It seems essential that in the application of these proposals the Minister should have information before him as to conditions in different areas and that information he can only ascertain by making proper application to the local authorities in the manner indicated. Indeed I suggest that the House would not be in order in giving a Third Reading to the Bill unless it was assured that the Minister was taking proper steps to ascertain the need which the Bill is designed to meet.

Major MILNER: I suggest that the hon. and gallant Member for Hulme (Sir J. Nall) is in error. This Bill deals with ordinary housing and not with slum clearance and the two things are not related.

Mr. LOGAN: I submit that the Minister's statement is relevant only to the question of slum clearance and that we are not dealing with slum clearance in this Bill at all. If the Minister has already the powers for doing what he has suggested then there is no necessity for bringing the matter before the House at all.

Lieut.-Colonel ACLAND-TROYTE: Is there any reason why Members of the Opposition should object to this information being given by the Minister?

HON. MEMBERS: None at all.

Mr. LANSBURY: We do not object at all, but the point which I have raised is very relevant to anyone who follows these discussions as industriously as I do. Occasionally, we come, I will not say into conflict, but into discussion with the Chair, as to what is in order and what is not on these occasions. If you Mr. Speaker rule that we are entitled to discuss the Minister's statement broadly, I am quite satisfied and so are my hon. Friends.

Sir H. YOUNG: I should be quite unable to commend the Bill to the House or adduce the arguments which are relevant in favour of the Bill without being able either on Second Reading or Third Reading to deal with the consequences which must flow from the Bill. Those matters were dealt with on the Second Reading and I do not understand the anxiety of some hon. Members to limit the discussion now. I perfectly understand, however, the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition who only wants to protect his own right of discussion but as to that I imagine he need not have any fear.

I was observing that there are two matters in connection with these programmes on which special emphasis will be laid; first, the distinction between clearance areas and reconditioning areas and secondly, the fixing of a definite period during which those areas will be dealt with. By means of such a time limit we shall secure for every dweller in the slums the assurance that within that limit of time he will see deliverance from the conditions under which he lives. That is the only means by which we can secure the ending of this evil. I am aware that there are in existence five-year programmes which were prepared under the Act of 1930. They are not sufficient for our present purposes because they were not drawn up with the specific object which we have in view, namely, the concentration of effort upon the ending of the slum. They were drawn up more in relation to the general provision of houses. They must therefore be replaced by these special provisions and programmes.

Such will be at the outset the part of the local authorities in the campaign which I am now sketching. The part of the Government will be no less direct and clear. Its first part will be the provision of the essential finance through the form of subsidy, such provision of finance as may be required from the Exchequer in order that the work may be proceeded with on an ordered plan and with the greatest possible speed and efficiency. We set no limit to the number of houses that may be thus dealt with. Every house which is unfit for human habitation ought to be dealt with as soon as possible and the quicker the better. That will not exhaust the active part of the Government in this plan of campaign. There will be other essential functions to be discharged by the Ministry.

There will be the essential function of the stimulation and assistance of the local authorities in the preparation of their surveys and programmes. That is, in the first place, the function of the general inspectors of the Ministry, but we have a certain weight of inertia to lift. A new start has to be made and I propose to devote special assistance to the local authorities in the preparation of their surveys and programmes. I propose to do so by means of a flying squad of special experts from the Ministry whose function will be the stimulation of initiative where that stimulation is needed and the giving of technical assistance and advice in the preparation of those programmes. The point on which I dwell is that this work of the preparation and the carrying out of programmes will be required at the hands of the local authorities. There is ample power under the Act of 1930 for the Minister to ensure the carrying out of programmes prepared in consequence of the passage of this Bill. Under Section 52 he is enabled to order local inquiries to be held and, where satisfied after investigation that there has been failure on part of the local authority, he can make an Order declaring that authority in default and directing how and when that default should be remedied. But except in a very clear case of ultimate need, there would be no putting into force of the powers of that Section. I look in another direction for the real sanction and force behind this fresh attack on the slums. I look to the irresistible force of public opinion to which I have already referred.

There will be three allies in this campaign. There will be the ally of public opinion. Of that we are sure. The voice of public opinion has been heard in an unmistakable manner of late, and Members of this House can do much in directing and concentrating that public opinion on the conditions of their own divisions. The second ally will be the Government, which will use its whole power and influence to carry out this programme. The third, and essential, ally is the local authorities themselves. I would express warm confidence, not only in the ability, but in the willing enthusiasm of the great bulk of the local authorities to join with the country and the Government in this campaign. They have given proof in the past of their readiness to do so, and I am confident that that readiness will be repeated and increased in the future. I am confident that it will not be necessary to use any of those sanctions and forms of compulsion to which I have referred in order to secure that the essential work shall be done. I am confident also that the local authorities will realise that there is no further opportunity for postponement and delay, that the work has got to be done, and that it is the intention of the country and of the Government to see the work through.

Sir HERBERT SAMUEL: The essence of this matter, of course, is finance, and I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Government would provide the necessary finance. Does that mean that the cost will be borne by the Exchequer rather than by the local authorities?

Sir H. YOUNG: The necessary finance under the machinery of the Act of 1930; that is, the subsidies which are provided by that Act.

Sir H. SAMUEL: Will a large charge devolve upon the local authorities?

Sir H. YOUNG: £3 15s. per house, but the figures under that Act are as familiar to the right hon. Gentleman as to myself. The third partner will be the local authorities, whose willingness to join freely, and in free co-operation, in this campaign I do not doubt.

Mr. DAVID MASON: Does it not involve fresh legislation?

Sir H. YOUNG: No. There are many favouring circumstances which will assist the country and the Government in this campaign which now lies before us, and those are the favouring circumstances which are produced by the passage of this Bill. I believe that without the passage of this Bill any such effort would have been foredoomed to failure. Those circumstances are, first, the concentration of the energies of the local authorities upon this work of slum clearance, because it will only be by the work of slum clearance in future that they will be able to attract subsidies of public money for the purposes of the improvement of the housing conditions in their areas, and I am confident that, as good and reasonable authorities, as good and reasonable men, they will be eager and anxious to continue those forms of activity which will enable them to attract money from the Exchequer for the assistance of their areas.

Major MILNER: On a point of Order. The right hon. Gentleman has been referring for the last 10 minutes to slum clearance alone. He has referred to

[Major Milner.]

Section 52. There is no Section 52 in this Measure, and he presumably referred, therefore, to the Act of 1930. He is urging local authorities—quite rightly, no doubt, at the proper time—to get on with the Act of 1930, but I submit that the whole of this statement is out of order now, that there is other urgent business before the House, and that it is not right that he should be permitted to make that statement on the Third Reading of this Bill, a statement which I say, unhesitatingly, deserves a full day's debate, not merely the odd hour or two which we are likely to have to-night. I submit that the right hon. Gentleman should take an early opportunity of putting forward his proposals for pushing on with slum clearance, which in no direct sense arise under this Bill.

Sir H. YOUNG: I was engaged, when I was interrupted, in pointing out to the House that for a successful attack upon the slums we must have a concentration of the energies of the local authorities, which can only be obtained by the passage of this Bill. The matter, therefore, is not only relevant, it is vital to the Bill itself, and I am very sorry that the hon. and gallant Member has not yet found himself able to understand that fact. The next matter that I would refer to in this connection is the second essential, favourable condition for the success in this operation against the slums which I have described. That is the condition which enables us to pass this Bill, and it is the sharp fall in building costs and in the cost of money. The opportunity for one is the opportunity for the other. By taking advantage of the opportunity to pass the Bill, we set the forces produced by that opportunity free to assist us to clear the slums. The fall in the cost of building operations, their cheapness at the present moment, is the second circumstance that make a favourable condition to carry out this new programme of slum clearance.

One word as regards the review of the new conditions which will be produced by this Bill that is to be carried out by the Committee, the appointment of which I have announced this afternoon. That Committee will be dealing in particular with any fresh powers which it may be desirable to grant to local authorities in respect of re-conditioning slums, not excluding the provision of financial help in order to assist those powers of re-conditioning. That Committee will have a most important and valuable task to perform, in relation to the new era produced by this Bill, in order to decide upon what fresh powers it may be useful to add to the existing framework, but I desire to make it particularly clear that no such change in the framework is contemplated as need be looked upon by any local authority as any reason for postponing that survey and that programme to which I have already referred. The way is clear for an immediate start to be made upon the new campaign. I have described a very powerful engine for putting an end to the evil of the slums. In the past there has been a history of failure and disappointment in this respect, and that has been for this reason, I believe, above others, that there has been a divided responsibility, a responsibility divided as between local authorities and the central Government. By such means as I have described, we concentrate that responsibility, because the Government itself accepts the responsibility for undertaking to see this thing through.

Such are the principal reasons for which I commend this Bill to the House. I commend it to the House as inaugurating an era of greater hope in the meeting of one great need, namely, the provision of small houses for the working classes. I commend it to the House as inaugurating an era, not only of hope, but of assurance in dealing with another great need, namely, the abolition of the slum evil through those steps which I have to-night described. Too long has that last evil existed, too long has the slum acted as a radiating centre of disease, of disease not only of the body, but of the mind and of the social order. I believe that by securing the greater freedom and power which we shall obtain by the passage of this Measure to eliminate the final centre of that great evil, we shall indeed have achieved no small thing. It will be all the more to our credit if we succeed in achieving it at a time of difficulty, because the nation will finally judge us, not by success in times of prosperity, but by the courage and the foresight which are shown in bad times. To-night we look to the resolution to make use of the opportunity given by this Bill to convert our extremity into an opportunity for the achievement, upon which the Government is determined, of fixing a definite term to the slum evil, a great work in which we enlist the sympathy of the local authorities on the one hand and of the public opinion of the country on the other.

Mr. GREENWOOD: I beg to move, to leave out the word "now," and, at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day six months."

The right hon. Gentleman's name will go down in history as that of the second Minister of Health who has conceived nothing constructive in the cause of the housing of the people. The first was the late Lord Melchett, who was given the rather difficult task of liquidating all responsibility under the Addison Act of 1919. His successor, a Conservative Minister of Health, was bound to re-establish the principle of public aid which his predecessor had overthrown, and there will come a successor of the right hon. Gentleman the present Minister of Health who will treat him as ignominiously as the late Lord Melchett was treated by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer.

In this Bill there is not a single constructive proposal; not one word, not one comma, of the Bill deals either directly or indirectly with the question of slum clearance. There is only one idea in it, and that is not constructive—the idea of a return to the free play of economic forces, the free play of private enterprise. He has not even a friend on the Government Benches in favour of that policy to-day. He is a lone voice crying in the wilderness, using the language of a century ago—I have had to remind him of it before—a lingo unknown since the days of our great grandfathers. He alone stands for a return to private enterprise, and the only idea in his Bill is a return to private enterprise. In the long Title of the Bill we have its scope defined:

"to bring to an end the power of the Minister of Health to grant subsidies under the Acts of 1923 and 1924) and to enable him to undertake to make contributions in certain cases."

From the day of the Second Reading of this Bill the right hon. Gentleman has been misleading this House and misleading the public. He has very carefully and skilfully mixed the destructive provisions of this Bill with slum clearance. There is nothing whatever in agreement between the two. He has asserted to-night, but not proved, that the solution of the housing problem is to leave the normal provision of houses to the free play of private enterprise, and to get local authorities to concentrate on what I can only call to-day the dirty work of slum clearance. There is no necessary connection of that kind between the two. On the Second Reading the right hon. Gentleman talked of slum clearance, in the country he has talked of slum clearance, the Lord President of the Council made a moving speech in the country in favour of slum clearance, and the right hon. Gentleman comes back to-day on the Third Reading of this Bill, when we thought we were dealing with the rather narrow point of the Bill as it stands now, to tell us of his proposals. I do not call them new, because they are not new. There is not a single suggestion that he is making except about another committee, and that is not new. Having suffered castigation about the appointment of new committees from hon. Members opposite when I sat on that side of the House, I cannot say that even his proposal for a committee is new.

It is no good the right hon. Gentleman working himself up into a frenzy to-day about slum clearance and saying, as he said in an earlier part of his speech, that there must be no more delay and no more trifling. The very day that the right hon. Gentleman took office he discouraged the local authorities, and he has pursued that policy persistently and deliberately for nearly 18 months. He has not said to them, "You are the people who might aid us in solving the housing problem." On the contrary, he has discouraged them—not one authority, but scores of authorities. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned a five-year programme, which he said was not enough. There are scores of cases to prove that it was not too big and many local authorities to-day are not building up to the level of the five-year programme. The right hon. Gentleman has discouraged local authorities, he has knocked the heart out of them, and he has done everything he can to destroy municipal enterprise in housing; and now, after 18 months, he appeals to them with his hand on his bosom, and says, "We need the assistance of local authorities to help us in the solution of the problem of the slums."

Sir JOSEPH NALL: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what progress he made when he was Minister?

Mr. GREENWOOD: I can answer the hon. Gentleman in two ways. I did a good deal more than the right hon. Gentleman, and the situation to-day would have been a good deal better if I had been sitting where the Minister is now sitting. Where do we stand on this great question of slum clearance? What have we been offered? Not a new policy, but a committee. We are being offered reconditioning as a partial solution of the slum problem. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that that is only a partial, and, indeed, only a minor solution. Where houses are bad, reconditioning is bound to be a hopeless failure and it will not be an economic proposition. I am becoming a little tired, as one who has lived in a second-hand house, of this new policy of passing off the houses of the middle classes to the working classes, only to more of them—one middle-class house being handed over second hand, third hand and fourth hand to four or five working-class families. That kind of thing can be found within a mile of this House; hundreds of middle-class houses not good enough for the middle classes are now being cut into small sandwiches and divided up into working-class houses. If the most that the right hon. Gentleman can suggest, apart from this talk about surveys—which does not mean anything—is a committee to consider the possibility of reconditioning, the solution of this problem will not only be nil, but it will be worth less than nothing, and may possibly be disastrous.

If time permitted I should like to spend as great a proportion of my speech on irrelevancies as the Minister. He said very little about this Bill. He did not say a great deal about it on Second Reading, and to-night he has said even less. He is trying to cloud the negative character of this Bill by taking advantage of an Act of Parliament for which he was not responsible, and which he is going to supplement by another committee. I do not wish to pursue that question any further, but I wish the House to understand that the right hon. Gentleman has not contributed one constructive idea to the solution of the slum problem. He has not altered the law in any way. The law is as the late Labour Government left it in 1931, and it is important that the country should know that, because the Press are giving the impression that the right hon. Gentleman is a kind of crusader in this matter. I remember the Minister of Mines when he was crusading with me. He has now changed sides and is crusading with the present Minister. This is not a new crusade that the right hon. Gentleman has undertaken. He has added no new power behind the movement for slum clearance. His only contribution is to deter local authorities for nearly 18 months, to reduce them to a state of hysteria and panic, and to discourage them from the work that they ought to have been doing.

A further reason which I have against the Bill is that it is a reversal of an established national policy at a most inopportune time. It has been said that houses can be built without subsidy. That may be true, but that does not answer the question whether they will be built at the lowest price. It does not answer the question whether under the provisions of this Bill houses will be provided for working-class families at the lowest cost and at rents which they can pay. I am certain that in certain areas, both urban and rural, particularly in rural areas, private enterprise will not fill the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman dealt with this point most ineffectively on the Committee stage last week. Private enterprise never has filled the bill. It has not done it effectively in the towns, and it certainly cannot do it in the semi-rural and rural areas; and we are to be left now solely with private enterprise, except, as the Minister admits, for the very difficult and the complicated business of slum clearance. When the building of working-class houses was a costly business, local authorities were allowed to do it. Now that the building of working-class houses appears to provide an opportunity for private profit, private enterprise is to be allowed to come in, and the difficult job of slum clearance is to be left to the local authorities. I can understand hon. Members opposite favouring a return to private enterprise in the building industry. That raises a question in which

There is a conflict of principle between hon. Members opposite and us.

Whatever might be the right solution, if the Minister thinks that private enterprise can solve this problem, we ought to have guarantees that it will solve it as well as municipal enterprise. That is a reasonable thing to ask. Ever since the War, we have gradually established under the power of the Minister a national housing standard which is as good as, and in most cases better than, the local building by-laws. We have established a national tradition under public auspices. Houses for the most part have been built by private contract, but under the auspices of the local authorities. If the right hon. Gentleman believes that private enterprise can do this job, surely the House is entitled to ask him to ensure that it will do the job as well as public enterprise has been doing it in the years since the War. A point on which I think there will be universal agreement in the House is that the standard of houses which have been built for working-class families since the War are infinitely higher than the standard before the War. That is all to the good. Having achieved that standard—it may be at very great public expense—we are entitled in this golden era of lower prices and lower rates of interest, about which we have heard so much, to ask that private enterprise shall live up to that standard. The right hon. Gentleman says that Clause 2 of the Bill is not important and is not essential. The point is, however, that he has in that Clause kept a shred of public control. That guarantee, even if it is worth only 8s. per house, gives him a locus standi, an authority in this matter, and it is reasonable to ask that he should use that authority to safeguard housing standards.

One of the difficulties that we had on Committee stage and again on Report stage of the Bill was the reluctance of the Minister to commit himself to anything. He has to-night, after speeches from all sides of the House, agreed to a fixed bath, but even that concession does not appear as big as it did when hon. Gentlemen behind him cheered, because he still keeps his discretion. His discretion is worth nothing. If the housing problem of the people is to be treated seriously, there ought to be some kind of statutory authority, not merely the power, but the duty imposed on the Minister to see that houses are built adequately according to modern standards. The right hon. Gentleman talked about the changing times in which we are living. Let him remember that there are changing standards in working-class life which have been embodied in scores of thousands of working-class homes. I fear that under the operation of this Bill we shall revert to the old period of unrestricted private enterprise, where the jerry builder and the speculator, careless of the interests of the people who live in their houses, will build the smallest and the meanest type of house because they themselves will not have to live in them. The master builders have expressed their view that this idea of building only 12 houses to the acre is a monstrous waste of land. They do not believe in providing for the people who are to be tenants of their houses the kind of amenities that they want for themselves and their families.

Without the restraining hand of the Minister I am satisfied that the effect of this Bill will be, within the next three years, to degrade the standard of working-class houses. For that reason alone I should be prepared to vote against the Bill. I would vote against every word in this Bill not with pleasure, but with sadness, because it seems to me that this is about the worst possible time to discourage local authorities and to expect that private enterprise, having had imposed on it these ideas of economy, will live up to anything like reasonable standards of working-class houses. The right hon. Gentleman in his final words spoke about cheap capital and low rates of interest, and said that out of this time of adversity we ought to make great progress, and that it would be all the more credit to us if we did. That is perfectly true, but if the right hon. Gentleman means business it is a complete reversal of the Government' policy.

If local authorities are to forge ahead, then the economy policy of the Government goes to pieces. If it does so I shall be delighted; but I should like to know whether, in making his new declaration about the slums, the right hon. Gentleman has been making a new declaration about economy, though I imagine not. I should say that his dearest ambition is to hand over the housing of the people to those who, in the generations before the War, failed to deal with it effectually. One thing has been proved, and that is that the housing of the people is so fundamental to national interests that it cannot be left to the unrestricted play of private enterprise. It is so vital, not merely to physical wellbeing but to moral wellbeing, that there ought to be a Minister's hand upon the wheel. That hand the right hon. Gentleman is prepared, indeed he is anxious, to withdraw, in order that he can get back to an outworn creed which even members of his own Government do not to-day accept. With the Government accepting the principle of intervention in trade, whether through Regulations or tariffs, it has scrapped the old-fashioned ideas for which the right hon. Gentleman alone stands. On the ground that the right hon. Gentleman is really a relic from the past, and not speaking in terms of to-day, I hope this House, elected so lately as 1931, will be prepared with me to reject the Bill.

8.18 p.m.

Sir FRANCIS ACLAND: Those with whom I am associated have handed in a reasoned Amendment to this Third Reading Motion, which naturally cannot be called upon. I make no complaint about that, and I will save the time of the House by not even reading it, partly because I understand that it is out of order, and if I were to read it it might be expected that I should frame my speech mainly upon it. I do not intend to do that but to follow definitely on lines which are in order, namely, the Bill, or those extensions naturally arising out of it which were dealt with by the Minister, by leave of the Speaker—I refer to slum clearance and reconditioning. I have been asked to speak on behalf of my party in this matter for what seem to them the good and sufficient reason that my name happens to begin with " A," and that when the party meeting decided that I should speak I chanced not to be present and had no opportunity of suggesting somebody who was better qualified, as at the time I was taking the chair at a meeting of the housing committee of my county council in Devonshire.

In preparation for my task I have read through the Debates on this Bill, and two points remain definitely in my mind. First of all there is admiration for the skill, clarity, persuasiveness and good temper shown by the Minister of Health and the Under-Secretary in their conduct of the Bill. To make a practical point, noticing that the Minister of Health has sat continuously on the Treasury Bench for four and a half hours I shall not take it amiss if he thinks he will be better employed somewhere else than in listening to what I have to say. My second point is that in examining what I have to say I shall not more than I can help dispute the central principle of the Bill which is, of course, to abolish the main housing subsidy. I regard that as more or less settled, and at any rate pretty well everything that can be said about it has been said already. But I think we should not part, either temporarily or permanently, with the Wheatley Act without, in our minds at any rate, paying a tribute of respect and admiration to John Wheatley. His Act was a great personal achievement. It did what, at the time it was passed at any rate, by the admission of all of us, could not have been done in any other way. Many hundreds of thousands of people have good reason to bless his name for having helped to provide houses which otherwise would not have been built; and although this Bill is meant to bury his Act for good and all I would like to suggest, before we do that, and without prejudice to the question of its resurrection, that we ought to pay our tribute to the ardent and high-minded man who was its author.

Summing up the general results and effects of this Bill, however large may be the majorities here and in another place by which its remaining stages are to be affirmed there will remain anxiety, not only in the minds of its critics but among its supporters, on four main points. First, the question of how, and how quickly, reconditioning can be pressed forward in rural areas. Second, the speed of slum clearance, and in particular the re-housing of those whom slum clearance dispossesses. Third, whether the building societies will adequately perform the important role which this Bill assigns to them. Lastly, whether the machinery which will remain in our rural districts after the main Wheatley subsidies are swept away will provide adequately for the needs of agricultural workers and similar classes. The Minister in his statement just now referred to the fact that the new survey which he is intending to have set up at once will cover the question of reconditioning, and he made it clear that it was only with the passing of this Bill that local authorities would be free to tackle it. So be it. If it had not been that even at this eleventh hour, he did include that matter, I am quite sure that the conscience of the House and the nation would have remained profoundly stirred by speeches such as the noble speech of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Sir A. Chamberlain) on the Second Reading of this Bill. Nothing so far, until, perhaps, the statement of this evening, had set our minds at rest about it. It is a difficult problem, as is shown by the fact that it puzzled even my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, who, I see, has taken the Minister's place, and whom I welcome. In the Debate on the Second Reading he looked the problem of reconditioning fairly and squarely in the face and passed it by on the other side. He referred to the necessity for reconditioning which had been urged, and said:

> "I ask: At whose expense? At the expense of the State, the landlord, or the tenant?"—[OFFICIAL REPORT, 15th December, 1932; col. 649, Vol 273.]

I respectfully suggest that the Government could not possibly leave the matter there, with a large question mark appended to it. It is much too serious a matter. My knowledge such as it is is rural rather than urban and I want to make a suggestion concerning the Rural Reconditioning Act which is a special Act. The State and the ratepayers helped, but only under rather special conditions, only if the landlord will accept for at any rate a long period—20 years I think—a considerably lower rate than would be legally enforceable or required under the Rent Restrictions Act. The acceptance of help for reconditioning would carry with it an obligation to keep rents low. It might be possible, not this evening and not perhaps by any Amendment to this Bill—I do not know whether it would be in order in another place—that reconditioning questions in our towns might follow that analogy. That analogy might be useful. Could not owners of bad property be offered help in putting them in order, if rents were effectively reduced and restricted, and, if they declined to agree to that, could they not be forced to recondition at their own expense? It would be a fair offer—help from public funds if rents are kept really low, as is the case now in our country districts. Perhaps the survey which is to proceed will take a note of this. Notwithstanding all that is sometimes said in this House about houses owned by poor widows, I do not think that it will be hard, if that offer is made, to insist that reconditioning shall be done. Even the poorest people are forced to have sanitary and suitable premises if they carry on any business, and the business of house-letting is surely important.

Mr. DEPUTY - SPEAKER (Captain Bourne): I think that the right hon. Gentleman is going far beyond what is in the Bill.

Sir F. ACLAND: Your intervention was not wholly unexpected, and I admit its justice. My point is that this question of reconditioning, having been raised, must be very definitely pressed forward, even, if necessary, by using new powers in tackling the problem which the Minister now contemplates. I come to what will be more strictly in order, the question of slum clearance. That, we all know, is not only a problem of housing, from which it takes its difficulty, but it is a problem of livelihood. Slums exist mainly in the districts in which large pools of casual labour are required, as near the docks and the railway stations, and, as was recently well said, I think it was in the "New Statesman and Nation," until that sort of labour can be decasualised, it is no use to suggest to the Thames-side docker that he should go and live at Becontree, or to the Merseyside worker that he should go and live in one of the new housing estates provided by the Liverpool Corporation. That is one of the main difficulties that confronts the Minister in his rather newly-developed anxiety that this question should be fundamentally tackled. It is a problem, not of housing only, but if decasualisation and of transport.

It is not unfair to the Minister to call the attention of the House to the way in which the views of the Government on this matter have developed and improved in the course of these Debates. It is sometimes said that whatever the Government brings in is passed cut-and-dried, without any alteration. Here is a case, in regard to slum clearance, in which public opinion, expressed inside and outside this House, has had a real effect upon the Government's mind. I find it difficult to agree with what was said by the right hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Greenwood) about the Governments slum-clearance proposals meaning nothing. I think that they are going to mean a very great deal. I am very glad that that part of the speech was declared to be in order. It was new, of course, and it was rather unexpected, but it was very much better to have a statement of that kind now than not at all; better late than never. It shows what I have felt in my practical acquaintance with this matter, that the inspectors in the Minister's Department are not now regarded as they used to be, and as some inspectors still are, as unreasonable, interfering people, who think that they know much better what ought to be done than people who have been devoting half a life-time to housing. Those inspectors are regarded as friends anxious to help.

I am very glad that the Minister has now announced that he intends to take advantage of that position to have definite plans made with the great municipal authorities for carrying through this job. I was glad that the Minister added that it would be done within a definite time. We know the difficulty of time. None of us expects that slum clearance can be done within one, two or three years. As the Minister said, it has dragged on for 50 or 60 years already. Cannot we take in a favourable light the recent statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that we shall have great difficulty in unemployment for the next 10 years, and can not we make up our minds, as the Minister seemed inclined to do, that within that period, shorter, one hopes, the problem shall be tackled and put right? If we knew that for certain, and the Minister's statement this afternoon goes a long way in that direction, we should feel less uneasy about this Bill than some of us have hitherto done. It would do a good deal to lift these questions out of party politics, not only nationally, but locally, and that would be all to the good.

The Minister has at last realised that. He realises also that definite action is required with the local authorities. Until he said what he said this afternoon, I did not think that he realised quite so fully as some of us do who are actively at work in the localities, the change that has come over local authorities in many districts in the last two years. In all authorities, so far as my experience goes, and I expect that the experience of other hon. Members on local authorities is much the same, there are two classes of people, those whose constant inclination it is to explain why things cannot be done, and those who have the power of showing how things can be done and of getting them done. Naturally, and perhaps inevitably—I am not blaming anybody—the economy crisis of nearly two years ago put on top the first class of people who do not wish to spend anything on anything. They were able to bring out into the light of day their constant desire to do little or nothing and to parade it as patriotism. If the statement of the Minister of Health means anything, it surely means that it is no longer patriotic to do as little as possible on our local authorities in this matter of slum clearance.

It will require more than speeches in this House to reverse the wheels and to convince our local authorities that that is so. The only way in which it can be done is by writing to the local authorities, as the Minister has now said he is going to do, and by sending his experts to confer with them; by mapping out areas and by having a definite programme year by year, until the task is done. It is a very difficult thing to reverse large engines, and it will require all the effort that the Minister and his Department can put into it to persuade the local authorities that their duty now is something very different from what in so many quarters it has been represented to be for many months past. It will need very purposeful and constructive organic planning if they are to realise that, and we shall watch, and shall, I am sure in no spirit of distrust, want to have accounts from time to time of, the effect that the Minister's action is having on local authorities and how his plans are proceeding, and to have reports from time to time as to how this great work is going forward, as we all now hope, and most of us believe, it is going forward.

My third point arises directly out of Clause 2 of the Bill. It is as to whether the building societies will adequately perform the large rôle which the Bill signs to them. I cannot say much bout that, because my right hon. Friend e Minister has done me the honour of king me to serve on a committee which ay shed a certain amount of light on at question. There has been some ntroversy about the Committee's terms reference, and on that subject it ould not be right for me to say any- ing, but, when I was asked to be a ember of the Committee, it did not em to me to be right that, if one of ose who are pursuing the attitude of dependence of the Government that we rsue were asked to help, in however hall a degree and under however limited rms of reference, he should refuse, cause independence in this House ems to me to have its duties as well as rights.

I only want to make two points in that gard. I have tried, with the best will the world, to see where that margin 10 per cent. is to come from. These ouses are not going to be bought, but e going to be leased, and the man who kes a lease will not want to "cash up" e 10 per cent. as a sort of premium efore taking his house. That point is so puzzling people who have had a oser connection with the matter than I n claim to have had. The other point at I want to make is this: The terms reference of that Committee are ecessarily official terms, but can the arliamentary Secretary, or whoever eaks on behalf of the Government efore the Bill finally passes away from s, make a little clearer to us than it ow is, what the Minister expects from e work of the Committee He must ave anxieties about it, or he would not ave asked us to help him; but it is ifficult to gather from the terms of eference what his anxieties and his esires are.

I would like to know whether he ex- ects, when the committee reports, that rther legislation will be required. I now, of course, what the answer to that uestion will be, namely, that it depends pon what they report, and when they eport, and what the state of Government usiness is at the time when they report. hat, of course, is the proper, the cor- ect and the inevitable official answer to question of that kind. But it is always asy to give correct answers, and the inister of Health always does it supremely well; but, besides that admirable official side which he shows to the House, he has, as many of us know, an equally admirable human side, and we should be glad to see a little more of that. I know very well, from my own experience, how much more difficult and often injudicious it is to be human than to be official, but, if the Minister would permit himself to think aloud a little more about the really difficult matters ahead in this big new experiment that he is trying with the building societies, we should be glad. It would help public opinion to look forward to what might be coming, and we should like him, if he would trust himself a little more, even more than we do at present, which is a great deal.

I come now to my last point, and that is the case of the rural districts. The Minister knows rural England and loves it, and I think I may claim that I do also, but I have, in the matter of housing, this small advantage over him, that, as chairman of my parish council in its capacity as a parochial committee acting for the district council, as a member of a district council which has done a great deal under the Wheatley Act, and as chairman of the Housing Sub-committee of my county council, I have had a certain amount of actual experience of the housing difficulties in the countryside which may not have come in the way of even the Minister himself. It has been said that the Wheatley Act did not help the agricultural worker, and that all that needs doing for him can now be done under the Reconditioning Act and the Slum Clearance Act. With respect, however, I would say that the Wheatley Act did help the agricultural worker, though, perhaps, not directly.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Mr. H. Johnstone) gave a case the other day in which houses built under that Act were let at rents which would have been directly within the power of the agricultural worker to pay; but such instances are not common. What normally happened was that the Wheatley houses, let at rents of from 5s. or 6s. to 7s. or 8s., helped primarily the artisan, the postman, the pensioner, and people of that class—not the week-ender. The idea that Wheatley houses went to week-enders is a myth, a pure invention. I do not believe that there is a single instance of it from one end of the country to another; there have always been tenants more eligible than that. But, when the new council houses were occupied by that slightly superior class from the point of view of ability to pay rent, one of two things always happened instantaneously. I am speaking as regards a very large range of villages. Either bad overcrowding in the villages was mitigated owing to one of two families in a house clearing out and leaving it for the other family, or people of the agricultural worker class, or others who could not afford to pay higher rents than the agricultural worker can afford, moved into the houses out of which the better-off people had moved in order to go into the Wheatley houses. There was an instantaneous closing up, and an instantaneous bettering of housing all round, because it meant that the most insanitary houses ceased to be in demand, and possibly ceased even to be occupied at all—and a very good thing too. But, if it had not been for the progress with council houses, there would have been much less relief and much less improvement in the actual condition of housing for the agricultural worker than there actually has been.

The cutting short of the Wheatley Act will stop all that, and we shall be thrown back on reconditioning and on the Slum Clearance Act. The right hon. Gentleman made a statement about his plan under the Reconditioning Act. He said that he intended to rely more on district councils in some cases. His statement about relying on district councils for reconditioning was reported in some quarters as if it contemplated a universal and compulsory transfer of powers from the county council to the district councils, but I do not think that anything of that kind was contemplated at all. I think the Minister intends only to use district councils in suitable cases, where he is convinced that that would be the best way of getting some action taken; but his statement has caused doubt in some counties, like my own, where the county council is willing to work the Act as well as it can, and is working it to-day. I hope that that important matter may be cleared up, although it is only a small one.

Then I would say, let the Minister not hope too much from the action of district councils if and when he transfers the present powers of the county council to them. Speaking for a county which I think, when I saw the last figures, had done about one-fifth of the whole work done in England and Wales under the Reconditioning Act, I believe that the reason why we have been able to do so much good in Devonshire has been primarily that we have a very competent and devoted county architect, with his staff, who not only, when he gets schemes, says quite clearly what must be done in order that public money shall be spent upon them, but, in addition, reviews the proposals put forward by the owner, and very often helps to show the owner how he can best do what he proposes to do, even to the extent, frequently, of practically re-drawing the plans that have been submitted by some small builder on the unaided ideas of the small owner. District councils cannot do that. They have not the skilled staffs. The surveyor may do his best, but he cannot give the same help as a really experienced architect can do, and neither can district councils maintain the same standard of what they require in order to earn the grant that the county councils can do. Our work in Devonshire is only popular because in each case we can make a good job of the house that is done, often requiring a great deal to be done—extra bedrooms, better sanitation and water supply and so on.

Mr. DEPUTY-SPEAKER: I must warn the hon. Baronet again that he is not making a Third Reading speech.

Sir F. ACLAND: Perhaps I may be allowed a short reference to the Slum Clearance Act, upon which reliance is placed under the Bill to do a good deal of necessary work in rural districts. I know no department of housing work in which less will be done unless the Minister reverses the engines in the same way that he says he intends to reverse the engines with regard to slum clearance. That Act came at a time which proved unfortunate. It was very soon followed by the economic crisis of 1931. Our local authorities had only begun to get going when the necessity for economy, and stringent economy, arose. In my county only six out of 18 district councils have taken it up. They applied only in respect to 124 dwellings, of which only 47 were approved by the Ministry, and in only about two dozen cases has anything been done. That was very likely necessary at the time, but if, as the Minister says, he welcomes action by the local authorities to clear slums in the towns he must also be prepared to welcome similar action in the country districts. I am simply saying the same thing for the country districts as he has said for the towns. He cannot leave things where they are. There must be definite circulars to district councils in the country, just as he intends to send them to the municipalities of the towns, inviting those who have not applied at all under the Act to apply and promising to review the cases that were rejected under the special financial stringency of 18 months ago. It comes to this. Will the same action of asking for active operation in slum clearance be taken in the country as was held out to us as being a definite part of the Minister's policy in the towns?

A statement was made by the Minister which rather horrified me in its implications. It was that there was not really any considerable need for new houses in rural districts because, judging from the figures that were available, the population is going down. That is the reason that he gave for what is the main purpose of the Bill so far as rural districts are concerned, namely, bringing the subsidy to an end. How much is that decline of our rural population due to bad housing? Cannot the tide be reversed by making better housing available? Can that be tackled satisfactorily only by these acts of reconditioning and slum clearance? The standard of housing has changed—not only the standard provided but the standard expected by the people who are going to live in the houses. The newer generation of young men and women in the last 20 years expect something better for themselves than they were brought up to. Sixty, 80 or 100 years ago cottages were built, as I know on my own estate, mainly with one consideration, and that was warmth. The newer generation seem not to mind about cold as much as the older people did. When you look at the silk stockings and the modest V, you perceive that cold is a secondary matter. But what the older generation did not seem to want so much is air and, above all, light. The newer cottages—the council cottages—now differ entirely from the older ones to which our fathers and grandfathers were accustomed in the matter of light more perhaps than in anything else. The young men and women now growing up have got accustomed to light. They see it in their friends' houses in the towns and in the new council houses where their friends live.

If we are to repopulate the countryside, we must make sure that there shall be available for country workers houses of a different type from what they regard as the pretty, snug, sweet country cottages that they see as they whirl past in their motor cars and take no further real interest in. Houses of the kind that people now want in order that the country districts may be filled up will not be provided by reconditioning, by slum clearance or by private enterprise. The building societies do not operate outside urban areas at all so far as I have heard. I pray that the attitude that the Minister has expressed may not be the last word of this or any other Government. If it is, it will be a disaster to rural England. Rural England deserves better than that.

8.54 p.m.

Miss CAZALET: While I feel myself in sympathy with the main provisions of the Bill, I cannot disguise the fact, in spite of what the Minister has said, that I am still somewhat apprehensive with regard to the building by private enterprise of a sufficient number of the smaller houses to let at low rents. I realise that in different parts of the country some of these will be built, but I cannot persuade myself that very much will be done in this direction in big cities such as London, where land is extremely dear, and it is often far more profitable to use it for other purposes, and where there is a crying need for this type of accommodation. The theory on which the abolition of the subsidy is based seems to be sound enough, but, with regard to the really low-rented houses, I fear that the ordinary laws of supply and demand are to-day so complicated by outside factors, such as unemployment and poverty, that they may prove to operate far too slowly for our needs. We have to remember, that if the Rent Restrictions Acts are to cease in five years' time, a great deal of leeway will have to be made up unless decontrol is to bring hardship to many of our people. In the Circular which the Minister of Health issued soon after he took office he showed that he was alive to this problem of the smaller type of houses. He concentrated upon their production by local authorities and received a certain amount of success. I think that many of us would be grateful if, in summing up this evening, the Parliamentary Secretary would give us some still further reassurance upon this matter, and also if he would indicate what course he will pursue if the desired type of small houses fails to materialise in sufficient numbers.

There is one word I should like to say with regard to slum clearance. Everyone in this House must rejoice in the enormous publicity which has been given to this matter up and down the country recently by speeches, by newspaper articles, and, above all, by broadcasts. The declaration of war upon the slums made by the Minister of Health seems to me to open a campaign in which every man and women in this country can unite. It will not be a war which can be won by pegging away. Pegging away in separate units has been the process ever since people first began to talk about slum clearance, which we heard to-night from the Minister was 60 years ago, and we know that this method has only advanced us a mere trench or two, and that, only on certain parts of the line.

I am very glad that the Minister has asked for a complete survey and programme with regard to slum clearance from every local authority. I look to the waging and the winning of this war for one of the biggest economies that the Government can possibly make. Few of us wish to see any of our social services reduced to the detriment of any section of the community, but who would not rejoice to see a reduction in Government expenditure if it were the result of the healthier conditions of the people, and the immense economy of good housing has been proved over and over again by fact and figure. I welcome very much indeed the appointment of the committee which the Minister has set up to-day, showing, as it does, that the Government are fully alive to every aspect of the housing problem. In supporting the Bill to-night, I look upon it only as the foundation of our future housing policy and in no way as a complete structure in itself.

8.59 p.m.

Mr. TINKER: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Cornwall (Sir F. Acland) delivered an interesting speech, but it was hardly upon the lines I expected. I understood that the Liberal party were going to oppose the Government tooth and nail, but in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman there was not the vim one expected, probably it was because he might not have been present at the meeting. If I had been on the Government benches, I should have thought that the whole trend of his speech was more in praise of the Bill than against it. If this is a sample of the opposition of the Liberal party, they will have to become more full hearted than has been the case upon this Measure to-night. I dare say that they are retiring carefully and perhaps do not want to throw over their friends so badly at the outset, but it is a poor exhibition of the fight which I understood they intended to put up.

The Minister of Health, in dealing with the Bill—and I listened very carefully—did not seem to be very happy. He appeared to cover up his retreat by eulogising the Greenwood Act of 1930. Indeed, anybody listening to him who had not read the Bill but had read the Greenwood Act, would have thought that he was dealing with the Greenwood Act, that he was going to put greater pressure upon its application, and that, although it had been somewhat lax up to now, his job as Minister of Health was to see that its progress became greater. That seemed to be practically the object of a large part of his speech to-night. Whether it was because he wanted to obscure the real issue of the Bill or not, I do not know. The Bill tells us clearly that no contributions will be made in the future, apart from what is held to come under slum clearance. It means that for the future private enterprise will be given full opportunity in dealing with the housing problem of this country.

I understood the Minister to say that he was backed up by public opinion upon this matter. I should like to know what public opinion? The letters which I have received from my constituency, from every council, appeal to me to try and get the subsidy kept on. I have written to them asking if they have sent a communication to the Minister of Health, and I have received an affirmative reply to the effect that they have made their protest to him as they have made it to me. Therefore, however the Minister of Health can say that he has public opinion behind him in putting a stop to the giving of the subsidy, I fail to see. I should be interested to know from the Minister, or from the Parliamentary Secretary, whence they get their public opinion?

Another point brought forward in speeches by the Minister of Health is that money is cheaper now and that because of that fact we shall get better houses, at rents almost equal to what obtains under municipalities. Is the Minister dealing fairly with the municipalities by taking from them, when money is cheaper, an opportunity of putting up the type of houses required by the people? Surely, if they were able to pass through the hard times when money was dear and were able to meet the situation in the manner they did, they are entitled to a further lease while money is cheaper and should be given an opportunity of dealing with the problem and enjoying the privileges now being given to private enterprise. The Minister is himself the last remnant standing for private enterprise. I do not think that on the whole of the Government Benches there is a man equal to the Minister of Health in taking a stand for private enterprise, and I believe that he is now determined to give, once and for all, a further opportunity to private enterprise. He thinks that here is their greatest chance. Everything is in their favour, cheap money, the Government is defending them, and every opportunity which can be given, is to be given to them by the Minister of Health.

We on these benches feel, after the experience which we have had, that housing by private enterprise has absolutely failed. We ought not at a time like this to allow the question to pass from our grasp. It is unfair to the House of Commons and to the people in the country to hand it back to a body of men who have already had an opportunity and have failed to provide for the necessities of the people. It is on these grounds that, as a last effort, we are raising our voices in protest. We know very well, as the House is at present constituted, that we shall not be able to succeed, but we should be lacking in our duty to the people we represent if we did not take a stand to-day and show our discontent. I trust that the Liberal Members will go into the Lobby with us, as I understand they will, so that we may give the greatest vote we can against the Third Reading of a Bill which cannot b a success but must be an absolute failur as time goes on.

9.6 p.m.

Sir JONAH WALKER SMITH: I was a little surprised at the dissertation by the Minister upon the matter of slum clearance, because I have failed to observe any mention whatever of slum clearance in the Bill. I was not, however, particularly surprised at the terms in which he made his reference to slum clearance. I have become so accustomed to proclamations of that kind from that Box. Many times has that particular Front Bench laboured, and a very ridiculous mouse has been born as a result of it. I thought that at first it must be an attempt on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to draw a red herring across our path and to divert our attention from the possible practical effects of this Bill. I was not impressed with the fact that the Minister intends to have a survey, a programme and certain periods and dates prescribed, when various things will be done. There is nothing new in that. There have been many programmes and many surveys and extremely little has been done.

I was not impressed with the Minister's intention to use the big stick upon the local authorities in case, forsooth, they should not proceed with more diligence in slum clearance. The Minister has had that big stick in his hand for a considerable time and other Ministers before him have had the big stick, but nothing have they done in regard to it. I can only conclude that the dissertation must have been used for the purpose of letting it be inferred by the House that for the purpose of rehousing the dispossessed from the slums an enormous number of new houses will be required. The inference that we were presumbly asked to draw from the right hon. Gentleman's observations was that a large number of houses will be built. That is a matter on which I propose to offer a few observations. I am in entire agreement with the right hon. Member for Wakefield

[Sir J. Walker Smith.]

(Mr. Greenwood) when he said that it is not quite so much a question of legislation or statutory powers for the purpose of producing houses as it is a question of energetic and effective administration. I have not noticed that the administration of housing by the Minister of Health has been particularly effective and energetic in the matter of producing houses. As far as it has been within the power of the present Minister to restrict the flow of houses under the Housing Acts, he has restricted it. He has restricted it to the extent of 50 per cent. compared with the number of houses that were approved during previous years. Compared with previous years the total is only half of what it was. That is an indication of the energy with which he applies himself to the production of houses.

He now proposes to use his flying squad, or whatever it may be, and he hopes that it will be efficient and effective. I could have wished that he had used it efficiently and effectively under the Housing Act which was passed in 1931, whereby it was anticipated that about 40,000 houses would be built within 12 months. I think the flying squad must have been in cold storage, for in 18 months there has been arranged to be built about 400 houses. I am at one with the right hon. Member for Wakefield when he says that this is very largely a question of effective administration, but I am not at one with him when he says that the housing standards are greatly endangered by this particular Measure. I do not think that in regard to such houses as may be built—I do not think there will be a great number built—the standards will be gravely affected, when it is remembered that those who may be sufficiently intrepid as to venture upon the building of houses under this particular Bill will first have to run the gamut of the building societies, who will have a great deal to say in regard to standards, then the gamut of the local authorities, and also the gamut of the Minister of Health. I do not think they will get through that filtration any houses of an unsatisfactory standard. If they happen to pass through that filtration, it must be borne in mind that the houses are not houses readily to be got off the hands of the builders or of the persons who may be responsible for providing the houses. They are to be let and to be held as an investment. Unless the builder is extremely unwise he must remember that the houses must be made sufficiently attractive to attract tenants at decent rentals, and also sufficiently well built to prevent his being mulcted in very large subsequent costs. Therefore, the question of the standard of the houses will not be seriously affected.

The Minister relies upon various means for providing houses after having removed by Clause 1 subsidies of all kinds. He relies first upon private enterprise, secondly upon the local authorities, and thirdly upon private enterprise assisted by the building societies. I could have understood the right hon. Gentleman relying upon private enterprise if it had not been for the second Clause. I could have understood it if he had relied upon the first Clause and then said: "For the remainder, I rely enirely upon the free play of economic forces. I leave it entirely to private enterprise to build such houses and at such rents as they like, and if they make large profits, it will create competition." But he does not do that. He does not leave it to the free play of private enterprise. He now tells the whole world that he is setting up a committee who are going to consider a great number of questions, including the establishment of a National Housing Corporation, or something of that kind. Is that an encouragement to private enterprise? Not at all. Private enterprise will say: "We do not know what may come of this. We had better wait a bit, and see." By the provisions of Clause 2 he proposes to give certain guarantees. Those guarantees are to be from the State, from the local authorities and from money supposedly at a lower rate of interest on a very large percentage of the total valuation. Is that encouraging to private enterprise in the ordinary way? Not at all. Private enterprise will stand back and say: "We had better wait and see what is coming along."

If it is a question of opportunism, the right hon. Gentleman has judged well the time to get rid of subsidies. But he has deluded himself into the belief that the cost of houses at the present time represents the market value. They do not. The manner in which he gets his low costs is simplicity itself. It is a simple device. He carried it to extreme lengths in the case of the Rural Workers Act, 1931. Instead of getting a large number of houses built he passed a comb through and through every application, and, naturally, he ultimately only approved a small number of houses. He takes the aggregate and deludes himself into the belief that the average cost is very low. Having deluded himself in this way and by juggling with these fantastic figures he comes to the conclusion that the average cost is this very low figure. It is absurd. His first line of defence fails.

His second line of defence is the local authorities. I do not know what the local authorities are going to say to him. I do not know what their reaction is going to be to the removal of the subsidy. They have been receiving this subsidy for years and have been supplying houses, now, through the Minister of Health, His Majesty's Government announce that it is to be taken away from them, that it is going to be scrapped. I am afraid that their reaction will be the reverse of what the right hon. Gentleman anticipates. It will certainly be so in the case of rural authorities. Rural authorities have had at their disposal £14 15s. by way of subsidy, and they have not been able to supply the goods. The whole of that has now gone, and the Minister of Health comes along with his big stick and says "get along with the work." Is it not absurd to think that he can have any possible success under arrangements of that kind? That disposes of his second line of defence.

His third line is the arrangement with the building societies. I am really perturbed in regard to this arrangement. My first fear is that building societies are really not seriously intended to operate this particular Clause of the Bill. I have no doubt that they will do so if they have heaps of money to spare and have no better use to which to put it but they are not in the least likely to do it if they can find any other outlet for their money. I do not suppose that they have any such enormous sums of money available. If they have gone carefully into the question of the valuation of their assets they will come to this unfortunate conclusion, that they have no enormous sums of money because the fact that prices have been falling rapidly will show that their assets are not particularly well secured.

They may believe that the flow of money will continue into their coffers. I quite agree that it has been flowing into the coffers of building societies for some years; but why has it been flowing there? It has not been coming from the class of person who was originally expected to make his investments in building societies. It has come from the capitalist class, who thought that it was a fairly safe and lucrative form of investment. They have put their money into building societies, not in shillings and pounds, but in thousands of pounds, up to £5,000. That is where the money has been coming from, simply because it was looked upon as good security. Furthermore, building societies have been able to pay fairly high rates of interest, comparatively high rates, and they have been able to do so because they made arrangements with the Inland Revenue whereby they have escaped about one-half of the normal Income Tax. Now the Inland Revenue people are alive to this, and they have made such alterations that building societies will have to pay twice the Income Tax which they have previously paid; with the consequence that money will not flow freely and rapidly into the coffers of building societies as it has done in the past.

Imagine, however, that these difficulties are overcome and that an intrepid developer decides to try his luck under this scheme. He purchases his land and prepares his scheme. He submits it to the building society. The building society may say, "we will have nothing whatever to do with your scheme. We do not like the land; we do not like the plans; we do not like anything about it. We do not want to argue the point with you; there is no money for you." But they may think that there may be some money in it and tell the developer that the rate of interest is at such a rate. The developer may think that it is not quite so favourable as he anticipated. The society say, "never mind, take it, or leave it." Then in regard to the question of valuation, the building society is bound to look into this matter as they intend to advance 90 per cent. of the money, whereas previously they have been accustomed to advance 70 per cent., on a rather good class of house to be occupied by the owner. They may say, "our security is not quite so good and we shall have to be much less optimistic in making our valuation." Therefore, the valuation will be low and the developer will be disappointed.

If these difficulties are overcome and the developer decides to carry on, he goes to the local authority. The local authority is not pleased to see him. They will be either keen on housing or they will not be keen. If they are keen they will want to build the houses themselves and continue under some such arrangements as they have been working under in the past. Those authorities which are particularly keen on housing will not be particularly keen to give him the guarantee. He will find the cold shoulder there. And those local authorities which are not keen, there is no reason why they should enter into any such guarantee at all. Whether the developer goes to those authorities which are keen or to those which are not, he is going to get the cold shoulder just the same.

But suppose all these difficulties are surmounted, there is still another in the person of the Minister of Health. He goes into all these questions, into the number of houses to be erected per acre, into the superficial area, in feet and inches; he is going to fix paths, he is going into any mortal thing that he cares to inquire into. Is it conceivable that many houses will be built under arrangements of this kind? That is the whole idea of a Bill which the Minister of Health has introduced for his great attack upon slum clearance. He thinks that under this Measure he will get an enormous number of houses built. I do not agree with him. No one knows better than I what effective administration will do at any time. Under the administration of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer no less than 300,000 houses were built in one year, and they employed about 600,000 operatives. Now we are down to a miserable dribble. Much could be done with greater drive and greater administrative efficiency.
